PREFACE

This collection of cases and other materials has been made for well qualified students who are preparing for the practice of law. To afford them broad training while in the law school the historical method has been used as to a few of the important doctrines. This has been done rather elaborately in the topics of judicial review of legislation and of the due process of law clauses as limitations upon the substance of legislation. No more interesting and important examples of the growth of legal concepts can be found.

My principal effort has been to attain variety of treatment. In a few sections a broad treatment, giving the larger aspects and tendencies, is all that has been attempted. In others there is more detail both in the cases selected and in the annotations. In one instance, at the end of Section 2, of Chapter I, there is a reprint of an exhaustive law review note which is not intended to be "learned" by the student but to indicate how much more there is to almost any topic than a law school course includes.

Two chapters have attempted to do what is commonly called taking the law in cross-section. These are the chapter on Taxation and the chapter on Foreign Corporations. Cases in taxation and foreign corporations are kept out of the other chapters when it is possible to dispense with them and are reserved for these special chapters. Yet the logical completeness of showing the operation of every phase of the Constitution on these subjects has not been attempted. The chapter on Foreign Corporations, for example, covers principally the operation of Art. IV, Sec. 2, Cl. 1, the equal protection, due process, and commerce clause, in respect to foreign corporations.

The use of an essay to present the subject matter of Chapter IV is an experiment. Certainly no better essay than that of Professor Frederick Green is available. I shall welcome reports from others as to their experience in trying this experiment. I am still convinced that case study should be the chief mode of studying law. I believe also that law students should acquire ability to read profitably closely reasoned essays. There is no danger of supplanting case study with treatise study so long as there is for a given subject no comprehensive treatise comparable to the better articles in the legal periodicals.

Against my desire I refrain from quoting all that Professor James Bradley Thayer said in the preface to his scholarly collection. He regretted having to compress his material on the topics he selected into two volumes, totaling twenty-four hundred pages, instead of "three or four volumes." In spite of the immense growth of the subject in the subsequent thirty-four years still greater compression has been forced by the crowded curriculum of law schools and the value of time for other purposes. Has time become so valuable for other purposes that no one has time adequately to study so great a subject as constitutional law, even though it is also so fascinating? Constitutional law, said Thayer, is "law in a strict sense, as distinguished from constitutional history, politics or literature, since it deals with the principles and rules which courts apply in deciding litigated cases." "It is an exact and technical subject." (This last sentence is open to doubt but perhaps no more than if it were made about many other branches of law that formerly were considered much more definite than present day masters find them.) Yet "the study of constitutional law is allied not merely with history, but with statecraft, and with the political problems of our great and complex national life." No doubt Thayer meant to include in political problems the relation of government and law to all phases of human conduct and human welfare. The social, the economic, the commercial welfares constitute the purposes of politics, of the science and art of government.

[CONSTITUTION

OF THE

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA]

WE THE PEOPLE of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this CONSTITUTION for the United States of America.

ARTICLE. I.

SECTION. 1. All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

SECTION. 2. [1.] The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature.

[2.] No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the Age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

[3.] Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons.[2] The actual Enumeration shall be made within three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by Law direct. The Number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty Thousand, but each State shall have at Least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New-York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight,

It is reprinted with the consent of Professor Hart and the publishers. The paragraph numbers in brackets are not in the original, neither are the bracketed numbers of the first twelve amendments, nor the bracketed title of the document.

Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

[4.] When vacancies happen in the Representation from any State, the Executive Authority thereof shall issue Writs of Election to fill such Vacancies.

[5.] The House of Representatives shall chuse their Speaker and other Officers; and shall have the sole Power of Impeachment.

SECTION. 3. [1.] The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof,[3] for six Years; and each Senator shall have one Vote.

[2.] Immediately after they shall be assembled in Consequence of the first Election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three Classes. The Seats of the Senators of the first Class shall be vacated at the Expiration of the second Year, of the second Class at the Expiration of the fourth Year, and of the third Class at the Expiration of the sixth Year, so that one third may be chosen every second Year; and if Vacancies happen by Resignation, or otherwise, during the Recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary Appointments until the next Meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such Vacancies.

[3.] No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

[4.] The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided.

[5.] The Senate shall chuse their other Officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the Absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the Office of President of the United States.

[6.] The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

[7.] Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law.

SECTION. 4. [1.] The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators.

[2.] The Congress shall assemble at least once in every Year, and such Meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by Law appoint a different Day.

SECTION. 5. [1.] Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each shall constitute a Quorum to do Business; but a smaller Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent Members, in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide.

[2.] Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for Disorderly Behaviour, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member.

[3.] Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy; and the Yeas and Nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the Desire of one fifth of those Present, be entered on the Journal.

[4.] Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other Place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

SECTION. 6. [1.] The Senators and Representatives shall receive a Compensation for their Services, to be ascertained by Law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place.

[2.] No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been encreased during such time; and no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his Continuance in Office.

SECTION. 7. [1.] All Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with Amendments as on other Bills.

[2.] Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a Law, be presented to the President of the United States; If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent, together with the Objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a Law. But in all such Cases the Votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and Nays, and the Names of the Persons voting for and against the Bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a Law, in like Manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return, in which Case it shall not be a Law.

[3.] Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.

SECTION. 8. The Congress shall have Power [1.] To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

[2.] To borrow Money on the credit of the United States;

[3.] To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes;

[4.] To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization, and uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States;

[5.] To coin Money, regulate the Value thereof, and of foreign Coin, and fix the Standard of Weights and Measures;

[6.] To provide for the Punishment of counterfeiting the Securities and current Coin of the United States;

[7.] To establish Post Offices and post Roads;

[8.] To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries;

[9.] To constitute Tribunals inferior to the supreme Court;

[10.] To define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations;

[11.] To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water;

[12.] To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a longer Term than two Years;

[13.] To provide and maintain a Navy;

[14.] To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces;

[15.] To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions;

[16.] To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;

[17.] To exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten Miles square) as may, by Cession of particular States, and the Acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like Authority over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the Erection of Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, dock-Yards, and other needful buildings; —And

astic Clause

[18.] To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof.

SECTION. 9. [1.] The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person.

[2.] No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress.

[3.] No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE. II.

SECTION. 1. [1.] The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected, as follows

[2.] Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector.

[3.] The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by Ballot for two Persons, of whom one at least shall not be an Inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a List of all the Persons voted for, and of the Number of Votes for each; which List they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the Presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the Certificates, and the Votes shall then be counted. The Person having the greatest Number of Votes shall be the President, if such Number be a Majority of the whole Number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such Majority, and have an equal Number of Votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by Ballot one of them for President; and if no Person have a Majority, then from the five highest on the List the said House shall in like Manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the Votes shall be taken by States, the Representation from each State having one Vote; A quorum for this Purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a Majority of all the States shall be necessary to a Choice. In every Case, after the Choice of the President, the Person having the greatest Number of Votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal Votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by Ballot the Vice President.[4]

[4.] The Congress may determine the Time of chusing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States.

[5.] No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

[6.] In Case of the Removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation, or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the Same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation, or Inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

[7.] The President shall, at stated Times, receive for his Services, a Compensation, which shall neither be encreased nor diminished during the Period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that Period any other Emolument from the United States, or any of them.

[8.] Before he enter on the Execution of his Office, he shall take the following Oath or Affirmation:—"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

SECTION. 2. [1.] The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

[2.] He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law: but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments.

[3.] The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session.

SECTION. 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such Measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

SECTION. 4. The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

ARTICLE. III.

SECTION. 1. The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office.

SECTION. 2. [1.] The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;—between a State and Citizens of another State;—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

[2.] In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

[3.] The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by Law have directed.

SECTION. 3. [1.] Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the Testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

[2.] The Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attainted.

[3.] No Person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein, be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered up on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due.

SECTION. 3. [1.] New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

[2.] The Congress shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

SECTION. 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence.

ARTICLE. V.

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate. 1808

ARTICLE. VI.

[1.] All Debts contracted and Engagements entered into, before the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution, as under the Confederation.

[2.] This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

[3.] The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

ARTICLE. VII.

The Ratification of the Conventions of nine States, shall be sufficient for the Establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the Same.[5]

Done in Convention by the Unanimous Consent of the States present the Seventeenth Day of September in the Year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and Eighty seven and of the Independence of the United States of America the Twelfth In Witness whereof We have hereunto subscribed our names.

[7] Amendments I to X, inclusive, were proposed by Congress on September 25, 1789 and became effective December 15, 1791 by ratification by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states.

[ARTICLE VIII.]

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

[ARTICLE IX.]

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

[ARTICLE X.]

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

[ARTICLE XI.][8]

The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

[ARTICLE XII.][9]

The Electors shall meet in their respective states, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate;—The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.—The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President, shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of Electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

For one thing, it may be asked, if these phrases are necessary to give the federal courts power to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress, what becomes of the similar pretention of state courts with reference to state legislation under the state constitutions, from which these or equivalent phrases are usually absent?"—Edward S. CALVIN'S CASE.

The question of this case as to matter in law was, whether Robert Calvin the plaintiff (being born in Scotland since the Crown of England descended to His Majesty) be an alien born, and consequently disabled to bring any real or personal action for any lands within the realm of England. After this case had been argued in the Court of King's Bench, at the Bar, by the counsel learned of either party, the Judges of that Court, upon conference and consideration of the weight and importance thereof, adjourned the same (according to the ancient and ordinary course and order of the law) into the Exchequer Chamber, to be argued openly there; first by the counsel learned of either party, and then by all the Judges of England; * * *

[Coke, then Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, states that he attempts in his report to give the "sum and effect" of the reasoning of all the judges, which "the reporter himself thinketh to be fittest and clearest for the right understanding of the true reasons and courses of the judgment." The gist of these was that allegiance is a personal relation between subject and King, that upon the union of the Crowns of Scotland and of England in the person of James I, his subjects thereafter born in Scotland were born subjects of the King of England, that the King did not have separate personality with respect to each kingdom severally, and had but one body of subjects, and so the decision was that subjects born after the Union, in Scotland, could hold lands in England. The following appears as part of this reasoning.]

The law of nature[3] is that which God at the time of creation of the nature of man infused into his heart, for his preservation and direction; and this is lex acterna, the moral law, called also the law of nature. * * * And certain it is, that before judicial or municipal laws were made, Kings did decide causes according to natural equity, and were not tied to any rule or formality of law, but did dare jura. * * *

Now it appeareth by demonstrative reason, that ligeance, faith, and obedience of the subject to the Sovereign, was before any municipal or judicial laws. * * * Seeing then that faith, obedience, and ligeance are due by the law of nature, it followeth that the same can not be changed or taken away; for albeit judicial or municipal laws have inflicted and imposed in several places, or at several times, divers and several punishments and penalties, for breach or not observance of the law of nature, (for that law only consisted in commanding or prohibiting, without any certain punishment or penalty), yet the very law of nature itself never was nor could be altered or changed. * * * By the statute of 25 Ed. 3. cap. 22. a man attainted in a praemunire, is by express words out of the King's protection generally; and yet this extendeth only to legal protection, as it appeareth by Littleton, fol. 43. for the Parliament could not take away that protection which the law of nature giveth unto him; and therefore notwithstanding that statute, the King may protect and pardon him.

DR. BONHAM'S CASE.

1610. 8 Co. Rep. 114a.

In April, 1606, Thomas Bonham was summoned to appear before the President and Censors of the Royal College of Physicians, who examined him, and finding that he was deficient in medical science, imposed upon him a fine of a hundred shillings and forbade him under pain of imprisonment to practice physic until he had been admitted by the College. Bonham continued to practice, however, and in October was resummoned. This time he defaulted, and was sentenced in his absence to a fine of ten pounds, and a warrant was issued for his arrest. Early in November he appeared and refused to submit to reëxamination, on the grounds that he was a Doctor of Medicine of the University of Cambridge, and that the Royal College of Physicians had therefore no jurisdiction over him. Thereupon the Censors (without the President) committed him to prison in the Counter of Fleet Street, whither he was conveyed by the servants of the President and Censors. Bonham now brought an action for false imprisonment against the leading members of the Royal College of Physicians.

[3] On the various meanings and history of "the law of nature," see Bryce, Studies in History and Jurisprudence (1901) Essay XI and Pollock, The History of the Law of Nature (1901) 1 Col. L. Rev. 11-32. The latter states that the reliance upon the law of nature in Calvin's case did not represent a usual habit of mind of English lawyers; yet he calls attention to the statement in St. German, Doctor and Student (1531) ch. 5, that where the canonist or civilian spoke of the law of nature, the common lawyer spoke of reason. See B. F. Wright, Jr., American Interpretations of Natural Law (1926) 20 Am. Pol. Sci. Rev. 524-547; Charles Grove Haines, The Law of Nature in State and Federal Judicial Decisions (1916) 25 Yale L. J. 617-657.

The pleadings of the defendants set forth that letters patent dated 10 Hen. VIII had incorporated them as the Royal College of Physicians, with powers to fine practitioners in London who were not admitted by them, and further general powers to govern all the physicians in London and district with fine and imprisonment—in all cases one-half of the fine was to go to the King, and one-half to the College. This patent was confirmed by the statute 14 & 15 Hen. VIII, c. 5, which in turn was confirmed by the statute 1 Mar. c. 9, with the addition of a general command to all gaolers to keep such persons as the President and College shall commit to them, without bail or mainprise. It was in pursuance of these statutory powers that the College claimed to have committed Dr. Bonham. * * *

After argument in several terms by counsel and long discussion among the justices, the chief justice of the Common Pleas, Sir Edward Coke with whom concurred Warburton and Daniel, J. J., gave judgment for the plaintiff, chiefly for two reasons. In the first place, the College did not possess the powers they claimed over unlicensed (as distinct from incompetent) practitioners; and secondly, even if they did, they had not pursued them aright. One of the five lines of reasoning in support of the first of these conclusions was that the Royal College of Physicians were to receive one-half of all the fines, and are therefore not only judges, but also parties in any case that comes before them, and it is an established maxim of the common law that no man can be judge in his own case.

"And it appears in our books, that in many cases the common law will controul Acts of Parliament, and sometimes adjudge them to be utterly void: for when an Act of Parliament is against common right and reason, or repugnant, or impossible to be performed, the common law will controul it, and adjudge such Act to be void;" [and in support of this proposition several earlier cases were cited.][4]

[4] Only so much of Dr. Bonham's Case is here digested by the editor as is required to show the setting of the passage quoted. The statement of the case by Professor Plucknett in the essay from which the next fragment is taken has been liberally drawn upon.

"Moreover, Coke was prepared to advance mediaeval precedent for his theory, and in so doing has drawn upon his head the criticisms of later investigators. Just as these criticisms are, from the point of view of modern scholarship, it is only fair to the Chief Justice to insist that his view of history was not ours, and that it is only by the standard of his own day that a true evaluation of his learning and intellectual honesty can be formed. Although it must be confessed that even then he cannot be found altogether faultless, yet it is believed that a sufficient explanation will be found to establish his bona fides. His doctrine is certainly based largely upon mediaeval precedents and the extent to which they justify it is an interesting subject for investigation. But if we reach a different estimate from his of the Year Book authority for his dogma, this must not be taken as necessarily involving a severe censure of Coke. He himself has told us that though the fields are old, the corn is new. * * *

"His second instance is the anonymous case printed by Fitzherbert from an inedited Year Book as Cessavit 42 [Natura Brevium (1553) clvii d; Fitzherbert, Natura Brevium (Hale's ed. 1755) 209] * * * it is plain that the judgment was in complete accordance with that in an earlier case, Copper v. Gedderings, Y. B. 3 Edw. II, 105, * * *. Here then is no mere caprice of one particular judge but a catena of authorities extending from the middle of the fourteenth century down to Coke's own day. The statement of Sir Frederick Pollock that 'no case is known, in fact, in which an English court of justice has openly taken on itself to overrule or disregard the plain meaning of an Act of Parliament' must be taken subject to this exception (and others will appear later), which the publication of the Selden Society's Year Books has brought to light. The courts in these cases did undoubtedly 'disregard the plain meaning of an Act of Parliament'; but in telling the story Lord Coke has made the important addition of the words 'because it would be against common right and reason, the common law adjudges the said act of parliament as to that point void.' There is no such judgment as this in the report; the statute is not held void; it is just ignored. To this fact Coke has ~~really added an explanation and a theory~~ all his own—an addition that was to be of immense importance in subsequent history. * * * A few more instances are extant of this strange habit of quietly ignoring a statute without assigning any constitutional grounds for doing so, or specifying what powers the court claimed to possess in that behalf, and they have already been discussed elsewhere."[5]—T. DAY v. SAVADGE.

1614. Hobart, 85.

[Matthew Day brought an action of trespass against John Savadge for taking away a bag of nutmegs. The defendant justified as collector of wharfage and that the nutmegs were taken in distraint for non-payment of wharfage all in accordance with a custom of the City of London, confirmed by Parliament, and prayed the King's writ to the mayor and aldermen to certify to the existence of the custom. And the plaintiff said that the existence of the custom ought to be tried by jury, whereupon the defendant demurred.]

After some arguments at the Bar pro & contra, wherein nothing was questioned, but whether the custom in this special case were good, that the mayor and aldermen should certifie a custom which concerned the interest of the corporation whereof they were a part. The Court now being agreed determined to give judgment, and intreated me [Sir Henry Hobart, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas,] to pronounce it for them all, and so we gave judgment, that this custom was not to be tryed by certificate, but by the jury, whereof I gave three reasons. * * * Thirdly, it was against right and justice, and against natural equity to allow them their certificate, wherein they are to try and judge their own cause. * * *

By that which hath been said it appears, that though in pleading it were confessed, that the custom of certificate of the customs of London is confirmed by Parliament, yet it made no change in this case, both because it is none of the customs intended, and because even an Act of Parliament, made against natural equity, as to make a man Judge in his own case, is void in itself, for jura naturae sunt immutabilia, and they are leges legum.

THE CITY OF LONDON v. WOOD.

1701. 12 Mod. 669, 678, 687-688.

[A by-law enacted by the Common Council of the City of London provided that any freeman elected sheriff should not be excused from serving unless he took oath that he was not worth £10,000 and verified the oath by six compurgators, and that any person who refused without good excuse satisfactory to the Mayor and Court of Aldermen should forfeit £400, one hundred to the next sheriff and three hundred to the use of the Mayor and commonalty, to be recovered in the Court of Record held before the mayor and aldermen. In an action in the Court of Record against Wood for the penalty judgment went against him. On writ of error this judgment was reversed.]

Holt, Chief Justice. * * * So in this case it is plain he is guilty of a wrong in not obeying the Act of Common Council, for it is a law in London; and every by-law is a law, and as obligatory to all persons bound by it, that is, within its jurisdiction, as any Act of Parliament, only with this difference, that a by-law is liable to have its validity brought in question, but an Act of Parliament is not; but when a by-law is once adjudged to be a good and reasonable by-law, it is to all intents as binding to those that it extends to as an Act of Parliament can be. * * * But the true great point is, that the Court is held before the mayor and aldermen, and the action brought in the names of the mayor and commonalty; and that very man, who is head of the city, and without whom the city has no ability or capacity to sue, is the very person before whom the action is brought; and this cannot be by the rules of any law whatever, for it is against all laws that the same person should be party and Judge in the same cause. * * * And what my Lord Coke says in Dr. Bonham's case in his 8 Co. is far from any extravagancy, for it is a very reasonable and true saying, that if an Act of Parliament should ordain that the same person should be party and Judge, or, which is the same thing, Judge in his own cause, it would be a void Act of Parliament; for it is impossible that one should be Judge and party, for the Judge is to determine between party and party, or between the Government and the party; and an Act of Parliament can do no wrong, though it may do several things that look pretty odd; for it may discharge one from his allegiance to the Government he lives under, and restore him to the state of nature; but it cannot make one that lives under a Government Judge and party. An Act of Parliament may not make adultery lawful, that is, it cannot make it lawful for A. to lie with the wife of B. but it may make the wife of A. to be the wife of B. and dissolve her marriage with A.[6]

Willes, J., in Lee v. Bude & Torrington Junction Railway Co. (1871) L. R. 6 C. P. 576, 582: It is further urged that the company was a mere nonentity, and there never were any shares or shareholders. That resolves itself into this, that parliament was induced by fraudulent recitals (introduced, it is said, by the plaintiffs,) to pass the Act which formed the company. I would observe, as to these Acts of Parliament, that they are the law of this land; and we do not sit here as a court of appeal from parliament. It was once said,—I think in Hobart,[7]—that, if an Act of Parliament were to create a man judge in his own case, the Court might disregard it. That dictum, however, stands as a warning, rather than an authority to be followed. We sit here as servants of the Queen and the legislature. Are we to act as regents over what is done by parliament with the consent of the Queen, lords, and commons? I deny that any such authority exists. If an Act of Parliament has been obtained improperly, it is for the legislature to correct it by repealing it: but, so long as it exists as law, the Courts are bound to obey it.

[6] In King v. Earl of Banbury (1694) Skinner, 517, involving inheritance of a peerage the jurisdiction of the court was questioned. Holt, C. J., said that the judges "adjudge things of as high a nature every day; for they construe and expound Acts of Parliament, and adjudge them to be void."

GIDDINGS v. BROWNE.[8]

1657. Magistrate's Court. Ipswich, Massachusetts Bay Colony.
2 Hutchinson Papers 1.

[A general town-meeting of Ipswich voted a tax of £100 toward building or buying a house for Mr. Cobbet, minister of the gospel, to be his in personal right and not merely as a manse to be occupied by a minister during his incumbency. Giddings and others refused to pay the tax. The selectmen of the town ordered the town marshall, Browne, to distrain the goods of those who had refused. To recover damages incurred by such a distraint this action was brought against Browne.]

And the case being of very weighty concernment in the countrey (I conceive) I shall expresse the groundes of my judgment.

[8] The above report is abbreviated from that in 2 Hutchinson Papers, pp. 1-25 (Publications of the Prince Society, 1865) and is made up from the brief opinion written by Magistrate Symonds at the close of the trial and from his longer, supplemental opinion apparently written on account of the appeal. The defendant appealed to the county court at Salem which certified a question of law to the General Court at Boston (the legislature of the colony which was possessed of both legislative and judicial powers, see 2 Mass. Law Quart. 85-86), namely, whether a tax voted by a town-meeting for such a purpose bound those who dissented. The General Court voted in the affirmative.

[9] Mr. Symonds the Justice who tried this cause was descended from an ancient and honorable family in Yuldham in Essex, where he had a good Estate. The proceedings are somewhat singular and the arguments give us some idea of the notions of government prevailing in that day. [Hutchinson.]

Samuel Symonds was son of Richard, and born at Great Yeldham in 1595. He came to Ipswich in 1637, and was constantly and prominently employed in

I understand this to be about a fundamentall law, and that a fundamentall law properly so called. It is such a law as that God and nature have given to a people. So that it is in the trust of their governors in highest place and others, to preserve, but not in their power to take away from them.

Of which sort are these, viz. * * *

2. That every subject shall and may enjoy what he hath a civell right or title unto, soe as it cannot be taken from him, by way of gift or loan, to the use or to be made the right or property of another man, without his owne free consent. * * *

First, This may be given as a reason, that it is against a fundamentall law in nature to be compelled to pay that which others doe give. For them no man hath any certaynty or right to what he hath, if it be in the power of others (by pretence of authority or without) to give it away (when in their prudence they conceive it to be for the benefit of the owner soe to doe) without his owne consent. * * * I dare say, if search be made into histories, lawyers bookes of reports, records, &c. it cannot be made to appeare that in the most exorbitant times any man hath had his estate taken from him as by the guift of others, under colour of lawe, or countenance of authority. * * *

This I say further, and I doe argue it from the greater to the lesse. That if noe kinge or parliament can justly enact and cause that one mans estate, in whole or in part, may be taken from him and given to another without his owne consent, then surely the major part of a towne or other inferior powers cannot doe it. But shew us any man that can produce any footstep for such a way, either directly or indirectly.

But to the contrary it appeareth unto me. See Dalton, page 401, where it is to this effect. That the kinge cannot release a man out of prison (being in at a private mans suit) to his damage, without his owne consent. Also to the same purpose see Sir Henry Finch, recorder of London, in his first booke of lawe, page 74, having ended his rules about native or fundamentall lawes, he saith in the next page, Therefore lawes positive doe lose their force and are noe lawes at all, which are directly contrary to the former, viz. native or fundamentall.

The parliament may tax (and that justly) the whole country to give a guift or reward to one man for some service; for they are betrusted soe to doe. The reason is, it is levied upon the whole country, with their consent, and for the immediate benefitt of the whole.

But if they should doe it between persons (though they should soe doe by power, and the person wronged hath noe remedy in public duties till his death in 1678. He was Deputy Governor from 1673. A. [Note by the editor of the Hutchinson Papers.]

this world) yet it would be accounted tyranny. Is it not to take from Peter and give it to Paul?[10]

If one man, for such or such a turne or good end, may justly be deprived of a fundamentall right or liberty, then an other and an other, and so every man. In England there is but one sort of men that might be deprived of their goods; which kinde are usually called slaves but there they are called villeynes to the lord of the mannor.

Thus much touching fundamentall lawe, in reference to mine and thine, not to be given or taken away without his owne consent.

But now to answer some objections that may be made to the case in hande.

Objection. Suppose it be true what is expressed, and granted that he were a strange man that should deny the same in the generall: Yet, notwithstanding, it hindereth not but that a towne (when and as often as they thinke good, in their prudence) may doe it for good ends, and soe (in speciall cases) it may lawfully be done in the particular, upon the lawe made page the 9th, that every inhabitant shall contribute to all charges in church and commonwealth (whereof he doth or may receive a benefit) else he shall be strayned.

Answer. I conceive that it is an extreame dishonour cast upon the generall court, to make such a construction of their positive laws as doth infringe the fundamentall law of mine and thine; for it must needs be voyd, if it should indeed be necessarily construed against the right or liberty of the subject. But the law in its true sense is good.

Before this recited law was made, though some churches, or townes rather, did agree how much yearely maintenance the minister should have, yet it was not rated, at least in any compellable way, by the towne, but men did pay their proportion in a way of voluntary contribution. But some (especially non members) some of them did grow slacke; and so the burthen grew too hevy upon church members, &c. And upon consideration it was found lawfull to make a law to compell every one to beare his owne share; forasmuch as by hearing the word and publique prayer, &c. he did or might receive a benefitt and (in a way of God) be received as a member with the rest. * * *

But it is not understood that any law doth provide that every towne shall buy or build a house for the minister as often as there is a removall by death or otherwise, I mean to be his in propriety.

[10] "Certainly no one would claim that funds may be raised by taxation to aid a private person in constructing a private building on his own lot, although, incidentally, it will enhance the value of all the lots in the city or village." Gilfillan, C. J. in Coates v. Campbell (1887) 37 Minn. 498, 500, 35 N. W. 366.

Let us a little examine the poynt of benefitt that a man doth or may receive, as a motive to such a gift.

First, suppose or admitt the giver (compelled by the act of others against his will) should gaine twenty fold thereby, viz. by the use of such a smith, or person obtained into towne, yet that doth nothing at all warrant the act. * * *

Now a little about interpretation of lawes and of rules to be attended therein.

Let us not (here in New-England) despise the rules of the learned in the lawes of England, who have both great helps and long experience.

1. First rule is, that where a law is such as that, by wresting, a man may give such an interpretation as will overthrow it, when it might be construed to be good; this is a corrupt interpretation. So holy scripture may be wrested.

If repugnant to fundamentall law, it's voyd; as if it gives power to take away an estate from one man and give it to another.[11]

It is then consonant, if it be to compell men to pay necessary duties in church and common wealthe, as yearely maintenance. * * *

Quest. If it be demanded whether there be any difference betweene disposing mens estates by way of guift (under colour of lawe and countenance of authority) unto other men against or without the consent of the owners and the doctrine of levellisme.

Ans. It may be answered (I conceive) to this effect, viz. That of the levellers, though wicked and absurd, yet it is as yet but doctrinall (I thinke) but this kinde of transposeing mens estates is both doctrinall and practicall alsoe, and soe leadeth more directly to tiranny as it seemeth.

Secondly, Levellisme (I take it) reacheth but to the estate, &c. But this (if accounted legall) men may for a debt soe obtained (as in other cases) upon execution for a debt inforce the person to prison. * * *.[12]

[12] A similar decision is Loan Association v. Topeka (1874) 20 Wall. (U. S.) 655, 22 L. ed. 455. The United States Supreme Court held that a Kansas statute which purported to authorize any city in Kansas to appropriate tax-raised money to private persons as a bounty to induce them to locate manufactories in the city was unconstitutional and void, without specifying what provision of any constitution was violated. It was said that taxation must be for public purposes only, that the statute was an "unauthorized invasion of private right. It must be conceded that there are such rights in every free government [state?] beyond the control of the state [the government?]. * * * There are limitations on such [governmental?] power which grow out of the essential nature of all free governments [states?]. PAXTON'S CASE OF THE WRIT OF ASSISTANCE.

1761. Quincy's Rep. 51.

Charles Paxton, "Surveyor and Searcher" of customs duties in Boston applied in 1761 to the Superior Court of Judicature of the Colony of Massachusetts "for the Writ of Assistants as by Act of Parliament to be granted to him," which was a general warrant to search "any house, shop, cellar, warehouse or room or other place and in case of resistance to break open doors, chests, trunks, etc." for "prohibited and uncustomed" goods or merchandise. Against the application, James Otis argued:

"As to Acts of Parliament an Act against the Constitution is void: an Act against natural Equity is void: and if an Act of Parliament should be made, in the very Words of this Petition, it would be void. The Executive Courts[13] must pass such Acts into disuse—8 Rep. 118. from Viner.—Reason of the common law to control an Act of Parliament."

tion which the legislature may commit in the exercise of the power it possesses can not be corrected by the courts, for the reason that the courts cannot adjudge an act of the legislature void unless it is in violation of the federal or state constitution. * * * Courts can not nullify an act of the state legislature on the vague ground that they think it opposed to a general latent spirit supposed to pervade or underlie the constitution, where neither the terms nor the implications of the instrument disclose any such restriction. Such a power is denied to the courts, because to concede it would be to make the courts sovereign over both the constitution and the people, and convert the government into a judicial despotism. Subject to the federal constitution the legislature of the state possesses the whole legislative power of the people, except so far as the power is limited by the state constitution." Pages 668, 669.

Another similar decision partly rested on the same vague grounds is Michigan Sugar Co. v. Auditor General (1900) 124 Mich. 674, 83 N. W. 625, 56 L. R. A. 329.

The student may also find interest in reverting to Giddings v. Brown when later studying the liability of the officer in such circumstances, and also when studying cases on "due process of law."

[13] The term "executive courts" was commonly applied to Courts of Justice, as distinguished from the Legislative or "General Court."—Horace Gray.

was an act of the Assembly, of 1682 which declared certain classes of Indians to be slaves. Mason, for the plaintiffs, argued:

"Now all acts of legislature apparently contrary to natural right and justice, are, in our laws, and must be in the nature of things, considered as void. The laws of nature are the laws of God; whose authority can be superseded by no power on earth. A legislature must not obstruct our obedience to him from whose punishments they cannot protect us. All human constitutions which contradict his laws, we are in conscience bound to disobey. Such have been the adjudications of our courts of justice. And cited 8 Co. 118. a. Bonham's case. HAM QUI TAM V. M'CLAWS AND WIFE.

1789. Superior Court of South Carolina. 1 Bay 93.

[An act of Mar. 28, 1787 prohibited the importation of slaves except slaves brought in by persons coming to settle within the state. An act of Nov. 4, 1788 prohibiting importation omitted this exception. While the former act was in force, Mrs. M'Claws and her children with slaves belonging to the latter sailed from British Honduras to settle in South Carolina and arrived a few days after the latter statute was enacted and took effect. In proceedings to forfeit the slaves in accordance with the statute, it was argued by counsel for the claimants (the owners) that "there were certain fixed and established rules, founded on the reason and fitness of things, which were paramount to all statutes; and if laws are made against those principles, they are null and void. For instance, statutes made against common right and reason, are void. 8 Rep. 118. So statutes made against natural equity are void; and so also are statutes made against Magna Charta. Ibid. 118."]

The Court. It is clear, that statutes passed against the plain and obvious principles of common right, and common reason, are absolutely null and void, as far as they are calculated to operate against those principles. In the present instance, we have an act before us, which, were the strict letter of it applied to the case of the present claimants, would be evidently against common reason. But we would not do the legislature who passed this act, so much injustice, as to sit here and say that it was their intention to make a forfeiture of property brought in here as this was. We are, therefore bound to give such a construction to this enacting clause of the act of 1788, as will be consistent with justice, and the dictates of natural reason, though contrary to the strict letter of the law; and this construction is, that the legislature never had it in their contemplation to make a forfeiture of the negroes in question, and subject the parties to so heavy a penalty for bringing slaves into the state, under the circumstances and for the purposes, the claimants have proved.

BOWMAN ET AL. v. MIDDLETON.

1792. Superior Court of South Carolina. 1 Bay 252.

[An act of the colonial assembly in 1677 granted a tract of land to Nicholls. By an act of 1701 a grant was made to John Cattel which included 146 acres of the former grant. In 1712 by another act the second grant was confirmed in William Cattel, the second son of John, though the latter died intestate. The only important point of law was whether this legislation was void which attempted (1) to divest Nicholls' title and (2) to deprive the eldest son of John Cattel of his inheritance.]

The Court, (present, GRIMKE and BAY, Justices,) who, after a full consideration on the subject, were clearly of opinion, that the plaintiffs could claim no title under the act in question, as it was against common right, as well as against magna charta, to take away the freehold of one man and vest it in another, and that, too, to the prejudice of third persons, without any compensation, or even a trial by the jury of the country, to determine the right in question. That the act was, therefore, ipso facto, void. That no length of time could give it validity, being originally founded on erroneous principles. That the parties, however, might, if they chose, rely upon a possessory right, if they could establish it.[15]

> "But the existence of the principle of fundamental law does not necessarily mean that the court has the right to declare an act unconstitutional. This is true; I maintain, however, that, if all men and all officers are thoroughly imbued with this doctrine and recognize it as the controlling principle of the state, nothing can be left for the judges in their judicial capacity except to recognize the fact and the principle. Acting in their independent position, the judges will announce that a law contravening these fundamentals does not bind them or the litigants. Whether the courts will or logically must, in American history they did; and they did so because of the commonly accepted and active principle of American jurisprudence. I do not mean to assert that the courts actually did adopt the practice of declaring laws void because contrary to the fundamental law as long as that law was unwritten and not formally announced in constitutions; my contention is that the continuous declaration that there was a fundamental law necessarily made impression and established a principle and that when the written constitutions were formed and new governments founded, the courts were prepared to put into actual operation the principle of fundamental law.[16]

"In this country this principle of the existence of fundamental law was first clearly stated in one of the most popular and influential pamphlets of the early Revolutionary days—Otis' The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved (1764). Otis says among other things, 'The supreme legislature cannot justly assume power of ruling by extempore arbitrary decrees, but is bound to dispense justice by known settled rules, and by duly authorized independent judges (p. 55). * * * These are their bounds, which by God and nature are fixed, hitherto have they a right to come, and no further. * * * These are the first principles of law and justice, and the great barriers of a free state, and of the British constitution in particular. To say the parliament is absolute and arbitrary, is a contradiction. The Parliament cannot make 2 and 2, 5: Omnipotency cannot do it. The supreme power in a state, is jus dicere only:—jus dare, strictly speaking, belongs alone to God' (p. 70). It is, however, unnecessary to multiply quotations, although it is only by reading these contemporary documents that one can get anything like a comprehensive impression as to the extent to which men appealed to this principle.

"No one who knows anything of the Revolution can doubt the immense influence of James Otis and his writings in forming opinion and the basis for argument and theory. I am inclined to think that Otis was in large measure responsible for the main drift of the documents put forward by Massachusetts in 1768, which were doubtless known to the reading public in America. One of these documents, the Circular Letter, was, of course, widely distributed, and probably every lawyer and politician, from one end of the land to the other, knew its contents and was familiar with its principles. The Circular Letter contains the central element of the American argument in the Revolution. This letter declares 'That in all free States the Constitution is fixed; and as the supreme Legislative derives its Power and Authority from the Constitution, it cannot overleap the Bounds of it without destroying its own foundation: That the Constitution ascertains and limits both Sovereignty and allegiance, and therefore, his Majestys American Subjects who acknowledge themselves bound by the Ties of Allegiance, have an equitable Claim to the full enjoyment of the fundamental Rules of the British Constitution. That it is an essential, unalterable Right in nature, ingrafted into the British Constitution, 'as a fundamental Law * * * that what a man has honestly acquired is absolutely his own * * *.'[17]

[16] As I point out later, it was a mooted question whether the courts would actually exercise the power of declaring a law void because it violated fundamental principles of justice. But whether they did so or not, the way for the simpler doctrine, the power and duty of the court to declare a law void because contrary to the fundamental law embodied in a written constitution, was prepared by the old assertions of fundamental law, the assertions which played so prominent a part in the whole Revolutionary argument.—McLaughlin.

"The other letters of which I have spoken reiterate this doctrine of fundamental law. 'The supreme legislative, in every free state, derives its power from the constitution; by the fundamental rules of which, it is bounded and circumscribed' (ibid., 134). 'There are, my Lord, fundamental rules of the constitution, which, it is humbly presumed, neither the supreme legislative nor the supreme executive can alter. In all free states, the constitution is fixed; it is from thence, that the legislative derives its authority; therefore it cannot change the constitution without destroying its own foundation' (ibid., 156). 'But, in all free states, the constitution is fixed; it is from thence, that the supreme legislative, as well as the supreme executive derives its authority. Neither, then, can break through the fundamental rules of the constitution, without destroying their own foundation' (ibid., 170).[18]

"Perhaps these citations are alone sufficient to establish my assertion that a central cardinal element of American contention against Great Britain was that the legislature could not overstep its authority and that such principles were firmly fixed in the English system. It was characteristic of the American Revolution that, as in other English revolutions, men contended that they already possessed rights and privileges, which in reality they were seeking to establish.

"The Circular Letter and the other letters or documents of 1768, which have just been quoted, were probably drafted by Samuel Adams, but, as I have said, the line of argument was probably furnished by Otis. Once again we are led back to Otis' widely read pamphlet, and there we find the source of his statement.[19] He gives an excerpt from Vattel's Law of Nature and of Nations. Speaking of the legislative power Vattel says: 'It is here demanded whether, if their power extends so far as to the fundamental laws, they may change the constitution of the state? The principles we have laid down lead us to decide this point with certainty, that the authority of these legislators does not extend so far, and that they ought to consider the fundamental laws as sacred, if the nation has not in very express terms given them the power to change them. For the constitution of the state ought to be fixed; and since that was first established by the nation, which afterwards trusted certain persons with the legislative power, the fundamental laws are excepted from their commission.' In another portion of the paragraph from which Otis quoted these words—in fact in the very next sentence—Vattel says, 'In short, it is from the constitution that those legislators derive their power: how then can they change it without destroying the foundation of their own authority?'

See also ibid., 452 where the House of Representatives in Massachusetts is engaged in this famous argument with Hutchinson: "Your Excellency has not thought proper, to attempt to confute the reasoning of a learned writer on the laws of nature and of nations, quoted by us on this occasion, to shew that the authority of the legislature does not extend so far as the fundamentals of the constitution. * * *", etc. See also ibid., 325 (1772), with references to Vattel and Locke.—McLaughlin.

"Naturally these assertions and this idea were taken up and expressed by the courts, and the source is evident. Whether they gathered the statement of the principle first from the Circular Letter or from Otis' pamphlet is immaterial. In the case of Bayard vs. Singleton[20] and in Varnum's argument in Trevett vs. Weeden, two of the cases already referred to among the state decisions between 1776 and 1787, we find the assertion that the legislature can not violate the constitution without destroying its own foundation. Varnum quoted at length from Vattel." —Andrew C. McLaughlin, The Courts, the Constitution and Parties (1912), pp. 67-74.

[20] James Iredell of North Carolina, who became a federal judge after the founding of the federal government, was strongly of the opinion that a court had the power and the duty to declare a law void. He was much interested in the case of Bayard v. Singleton [infra, p. 28] and his letters at that time (1786-87), one a public letter printed in the press, fully discloses the line of thought. It was consonant in most respects with that of Otis on the fundamental law. Judging from Iredell's expression, one would believe he had read Vattel. See especially McKee, Life and Corr. of Iredell, II, 173. His letter discloses the intimate connection between this argument in defense of the court's right and the experiences of the Revolution: "We were not ignorant of the theory of the necessity of the legislature being absolute in all cases, because it was the great ground of the British pretenses" (ibid., 146). "Without an express Constitution the powers of the legislature would undoubtedly have been absolute (as the Parliament of Great Britain is held to be), and any act passed, not inconsistent with natural justice (for that curb is avowed by the judges even in England), would have been binding on the people. The experience of the evils which the American war fully disclosed, attending an absolute power in a legislative body, suggested the propriety of a real, original contract between the people and this future government, such, perhaps, as there has been no instance of in the world but in America" (ibid., 172). The whole of these letters should be carefully read, for Iredell had as much influence probably as anyone, possibly more than anyone, in maintaining the doctrine of judicial power. His words show, as I have said, that the power of the court was a product of Revolutionary experiences and of Revolutionary argument. —McLaughlin.

COMMONWEALTH v. CATON ET AL.

1782. Court of Appeals of Virginia. 4 Call 5.

This case came before the court[21] by adjournment from the general court; and was as follows: 3

John Caton, Joshua Hopkins and John Lamb were condemned for treason, by the general court, under the act of assembly concerning that offence, passed in 1776, which takes from the executive, the power of granting pardon in such cases.[22] The house of delegates by resolution of the 18th of June, 1782, granted them a pardon, and sent it to the senate for concurrence; which they refused. The men, however, were not executed, but continued in jail under the sentence; and, in October 1782, the attorney general, moved in the general court, that execution of the judgment might be awarded. The prisoners pleaded the pardon granted by the house of delegates: The attorney general denied the validity of the pardon, as the senate had not concurred in it: and the general court adjourned the case, for novelty and difficulty, to the court of appeals. * * *

The attorney general, in reply, insisted, that compassion for the prisoners could not enter into the case; and that the act of assembly pursued the spirit of the constitution. But that, whether it did or not, the court were not authorized to declare it void.

Cur. adv. vult.

WYTHE, Judge. Among all the advantages, which have arisen to mankind, from the study of letters, and the universal diffusion of knowledge, there is none of more importance, than the tendency they have had to produce discussions upon the respective rights of the sovereign and the subject; and, upon the powers which the different branches of government may exercise. For, by this means, tyranny has been sapped, the departments kept within their own spheres, the citizens protected, and general liberty promoted. But this beneficial result attains to higher perfection, when those, who hold the purse and the sword, differing as to the powers which each may exercise, the tribunals, who hold neither, are called upon to declare the law impartially between them. For thus the pretensions of each party are fairly examined, their respective powers ascertained, and the boundaries of authority peaceably established. Under these impressions, I approach the question which has been submitted to us: and, although, it was said the other day, by one of the judges, that, imitating that great and good man lord Hale, he would sooner quit the bench than determine it, I feel no alarm; but will meet the crisis as I ought; and, in the language of my oath of office, will decide it, according to the best of my skill and judgment.

[21] Which at that time consisted of the judges of the High Court of Chancery; those of the General Court; and those of the admiralty assembled together. Chancery Rev. 102. And the sitting members, upon the present occasion, were Edmund Pendleton, George Wythe and John Blair, judges of the High Court of Chancery: Paul Carrington, Batholomew Dandridge, Peter Lyons and James Mercer, judges of the General Court: and Richard Cary, one of the judges of the Court of Admiralty.—Call.

[22] The words of the act are, "The governor, or in case of his death, inability, or necessary absence, the councillor who acts as president, shall in no wise have or exercise a right of granting pardon to any person or persons convicted in manner aforesaid, but may suspend the execution until the meeting of the general assembly, who shall determine whether such person or persons are proper objects of mercy or not, and order accordingly." Chancery Rev. 40.—Call.

I have heard of an English chancellor who said, and it was nobly said, that it was his duty to protect the rights of the subject, against the encroachments of the crown; and that he would do it, at every hazard. But if it was his duty to protect a solitary individual against the rapacity of the sovereign, surely, it is equally mine, to protect one branch of the legislature, and, consequently, the whole community, against the usurpations of the other: and, whenever the proper occasion occurs, I shall feel the duty; and, fearlessly, perform it. Whenever traitors shall be fairly convicted, by the verdict of their peers, before the competent tribunal, if one branch of the legislature, without the concurrence of the other, shall attempt to rescue the offenders from the sentence of the law, I shall not hesitate, sitting in this place, to say, to the general court, Fiat justitia, ruat coelum; and, to the usurping branch of the legislature, you attempt worse than a vain thing; for, although, you cannot succeed, you set an example, which may convulse society to its centre. Nay more, if the whole legislature, an event to be deprecated, should attempt to overleap the bounds, prescribed to them by the people, I in administering the public justice of the country, will meet the united powers, at my seat in this tribunal; and, pointing to the constitution, will say, to them, here is the limit of your authority; and, hither, shall you go, but no further.

Waiving, however, longer discussion upon those subjects, and proceeding to the question, immediately, before us, the case presented is, that three men, convicted of treason against the state, and condemned by the general court, have pleaded a pardon, by the house of delegates, upon which that house insists, although the senate refuses to concur; and the opinion of the court is asked, whether the general court should award execution of the judgment, contrary to the allegation of the prisoners, that the house of delegates, alone, have the power to pardon them, under that article of the constitution, which says, "But he (the governour) shall, with the advice of the council of state, have the power of granting reprieves or pardons, except where the prosecution shall have been carried on by the house of delegates, or the law shall otherwise particularly direct; in which cases, no reprieve, or pardon, shall be granted, but by resolve of the house of delegates."

art

Two questions are made,

1. Whether, this court has jurisdiction in the case?
2. Whether the pardon is valid?

The first appears, to me, to admit of no doubt; for the act constituting this court is express, that the court shall have jurisdiction "In such cases as shall be removed, before them, by adjournment from the other courts before mentioned, when questions, in their opinion, new and difficult, occur." Chan. Rev. 102: which emphatically embraces the case under consideration.

The sole enquiry therefore is, whether the pardon be valid?

If we consider the genius of our institutions, it is clear, that the pretensions of the house of delegates cannot be sustained. For, throughout the whole structure of the government, concurrence of the several branches of each department is required to give effect to its operation. * * *

This view of the subject confines the object of the provision of the constitution, now under consideration, to cases where the prosecution is carried on by the house of delegates; and justifies the first interpretation contended for by the attorney general, of reading the words "Or the law shall otherwise particularly direct," in parenthesis: so as to limit the power of pardoning, by the house of delegates, to cases of impeachment prosecuted, by them, under the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of the constitution. Which is, manifestly, the intention of the clause. * * *

The word cases, in the plural number, makes no difference, 1. Because it was probable there would be more than one case of a prosecution by the house of delegates; and therefore the plural number was properly used, with a view to that possibility. * * *

This mode of considering the subject, obviates the objection made by the prisoners' counsel, relative to the constitutionality of the law concerning treason; for, according to the interpretation just discussed, there is nothing unconstitutional in it.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that the pardon pleaded by the prisoners is not valid; and that it ought to be so certified, to the general court.

Pendleton, President. * * * I shall pass to the two great points into which the question has been divided, whether, if the constitution of government and the act declaring what shall be treason are at variance on this subject, which shall prevail and be the rule of judgment? And then, whether they do contravene each other? The constitution of other governments in Europe or elsewhere, seem to throw little light upon this question, since we have a written record of that which the citizens of this state have adopted as their social compact; and beyond which we need not extend our researches. It has been very properly said, on all sides, that this act, declaring the rights of the citizens, and forming their government, divided it into three great branches, the legislative, executive, and judiciary, assigning to each its proper powers, and directing that each shall be kept separate and distinct, must be considered as a rule obligatory upon every department, not to be departed from on any occasion. But how far this court, in whom the judiciary powers may in some sort be said to be concentrated, shall have power to declare the nullity of a law passed in its forms by the legislative power, without exercising the power of that branch, contrary to the plain terms of that constitution, is indeed a deep, important, and I will add, a tremendous question, the decision of which might involve consequences to which gentlemen may not have extended their ideas. I am happy in being of opinion there is no occasion to consider it upon this occasion; and still more happy in the hope that the wisdom and prudence of the legislature will prevent the disagreeable necessity of ever deciding it, by suggesting the propriety of making the principles of the constitution the great rule to direct the spirit of their laws. * * *

The language of the clause is inaccurate, and admits of both the constructions mentioned by the attorney general, that is to say, 1. By throwing the words, "or the law shall otherwise particularly direct," into a parenthesis, to confine the power of pardoning, by resolution of the house of delegates alone, to cases of impeachment only: and to leave those which the general assembly might take from the executive, to the direction of the laws made for the purpose. 2. By taking the clause altogether, to make the representatives of the people the source of mercy, provided the consent of the senate was obtained. Either view of the subject satisfies the present enquiry; but I prefer the first, as most congenial to the spirit, and not inconsistent with the letter, of the constitution.

The treason law appears to have been framed upon this idea; and, in passing it, the legislature have, in my opinion, pursued, and not violated, the constitution. Indeed the house of delegates appear to have understood it so themselves, as they sent the resolution to the senate for their concurrence, which not having been obtained, the resolution is of no force, and the pardon falls to the ground.

Chancellor BLAIR and the rest of the judges, were of opinion, that the court had power to declare any resolution or act of the legislature, or of either branch of it, to be unconstitutional and void; and, that the resolution of the house of delegates, in this case, was inoperative, as the senate had not concurred in it. That this would be the consequence clearly, if the words, "or the law shall otherwise particularly direct," were read in a parenthesis; for then the power of pardoning by the house of delegates, would be expressly confined to cases of impeachment by that house; and, if read without the parenthesis, then the only difference would be, that the assent of the two houses would be necessary; for it would be absurd to suppose that it was intended, by the constitution, that the act of the whole legislature should be repealed by the resolution of one branch of it, against the consent of the other.

The certificate to the general court was as follows:

"The court proceeded, pursuant to an order of the court of Thursday last, to render their judgment on the adjourned question, from the general court, in the case of John Caton, Joshua Hopkins and James Lamb; whereupon it is ordered to be certified, to the said general court, as the opinion of this court, that the pardon, by resolution of the house of delegates, severally pleaded and produced in the said court, by the said John Caton, Joshua Hopkins and James Lamb, as by the record of their case appears, is invalid."[23]

TREVETT v. WEEDEN.[24]

1786. Superior Court of Judicature of Rhode Island.

Upon the last Monday of September, in the eleventh year of the Independence of the United States, in the city of Newport, and State of Rhode Island, &c., was heard, before the Superior Court of Judicature, Court of Assize, and General Jail-Delivery, a certain information, John Trevett against John Weeden, for refusing to receive the paper bills of this State, in payment for meat sold in market, equivalent to silver or gold; and upon the day following, the court delivered the unanimous opinion of the judges, that the information was not cognizable before them. [Coxe (Jud. Power and Unconst. Legis. 245) adds this: "The following constitutes the whole of the brief extant report of what was said by them:[25] 'The court adjourned to next morning, upon opening of which, Judge Howell, in a firm, sensible, and judicious speech, assigned the reasons which induced him to be of the opinion that the information was not cognizable by the court—declared himself independent as a judge—the penal law to be repugnant[26] and unconstitutional—and therefore gave it as his opinion that the court could not take cognizance of the information! Judge Devol was of the same opinion. Judge Tillinghast took notice of the striking repugnancy of the expressions of the act—Without trial by jury, according to the laws of the land—and on that ground gave his judgment the same way. Judge Hazard voted against taking cognizance. The Chief Justice declared the judgment of the court without giving his own opinion.'"]

[23] Wythe, J., Blair, J., and Edmund Randolph, Attorney General, were subsequently members of the convention of 1787 that drafted the Constitution of the United States, and Pendleton was president of the convention in Virginia that voted in 1788 to ratify the Constitution. In the latter convention John Marshall said, without contradiction, "Has the government of the United States power to make laws on every subject? * * * Can they make laws affecting the mode of transferring property, or contracts, or claims, between citizens of the same state? Can they go beyond the delegated powers? If they were to make a law not warranted by any of the powers enumerated, it would be considered by the judges as an infringement of the Constitution which they are to guard. They would not consider such a law as coming under their jurisdiction. They would declare it void." 3 Elliot's Debates, (ed. of 1866) 553.

[24] Pamphlet, by James M. Varnum. Providence: John Carter. 1787. An account of the case is given in 2 Chandler's Crim. Tr. 269.—Thayer. [This case is reprinted here by permission as abbreviated in James Bradley Thayer's scholarly collection of Cases on Constitutional Law (1895) vol. 1, pp. 73-78.—Ed.]

That this important decision may be fully comprehended, it will be necessary to recur to the Acts of the General Assembly, which superinduced the trial. At the last May session, an Act was made for emitting the sum of one hundred thousand pounds, lawful money, in bills, upon land security, which should pass in all kinds of business and payments of former contracts, upon par with silver and gold, estimating an ounce of coined silver at six shillings and eightpence. Another Act was passed in the June following, subjecting every person who should refuse the bills in payment for articles offered for sale, or should make a distinction in value between them and silver and gold, or who should in any manner attempt to depreciate them, to a penalty of one hundred pounds, lawful money; one moiety to the State, and the other moiety to the informer; to be recovered before either of the Courts of General Sessions of the Peace, or the Superior Court of Judicature, &c.

Experience soon evinced the inadequacy of this measure to the objects of the administration: and at a session of the General Assembly, specially convened by his Excellency the Governor, upon the third Monday of the following August, another Act was passed, in addition to and amendment of that last mentioned, wherein it is provided, that the fine of one hundred pounds be varied; and that for the future the fine should not be less than six, nor exceed thirty pounds, for the first offence. The mode of prosecution and trial was also changed, agreeably to the following clauses: "That the complainant shall apply to either of the judges of the Superior Court of Judicature, &c., within this State, or to either of the judges of the Inferior Court of Common Pleas within the county where such offence shall be committed, and lodge his certain information, which shall be issued by the judge in the following form," &c. It is then provided, that the person complained of come before a court to be specially convened by the judge, in three days; "that the said court, when so convened, shall proceed to the trial of said offender, and they are hereby authorized so to do, without any jury, by a majority of the judges present, according to the laws of the land, and to make adjudication and determination, and that three members be sufficient to constitute a court, and that the judgment of the court, if against the offender so complained of, be forthwith complied with, or that he stand committed to the county jail, where the said court may be sitting, till sentence be performed, and that the said judgment of said court shall be final and conclusive, and from which there shall be no appeal; and in said process no essoin, protection, privilege, or injunction shall be in anywise prayed, granted, or allowed."

In consequence of a supposed violation of this Act, John Trevett exhibited his complaint to the Hon. Paul Mumford, Esq., Chief Justice of the Superior Court, at his chamber, who caused a special court to be convened; but as the information was given during the term of the court, it was referred into the term for consideration and final determination.

John Weeden, being demanded and present in court, made the following answer; "That it appears by the Act of the General Assembly, whereon said information is founded, that the said Act hath expired, and hath no force: also, for that by the said Act the matters of complaint are made triable before special courts, uncontrollable by the Supreme Judiciary Court of the State; and also for that the court is not, by said Act, authorized and empowered to impanel a jury to try the facts charged in the information; and so the same is unconstitutional and void." * * * [Omitting only the verbatim report of the writer's argument, the report continues at page 37 as follows]:—

The consequences of the foregoing determination were immediately felt. The shops and stores were generally opened, and business assumed a cheerful aspect. Few were the exceptions to a general congratulation, and lavish indeed were the praises bestowed upon the court. The dread and the idea of informations were banished together, while a most perfect confidence was placed in judicial security. The paper currency obtained a more extensive circulation, as every one found himself at liberty to receive or refuse it. The markets, which had been illy supplied, were now amply furnished, and the spirit of industry was generally diffused. Every prospect teemed with returning happiness, and nothing appeared wanting to restore union and harmony among the contending parties.

The demon however of discord was not entirely subdued; for upon the next succeeding week a summons was issued from both Houses of Assembly, requiring an immediate attendance of the judges, "to render their reasons for adjudging an Act of the General Assembly unconstitutional, and so void." Three of the judges attended, the other two being unwell. This circumstance induced the Assembly to dismiss them at that time, but they were directed to appear at the October session next following.

Accordingly three of the judges attended, and gave notice in writing to both Houses, "that they waited their pleasure." They were informed that the Assembly was ready to hear them, and would proceed immediately upon the business for which they were in attendance.

Certain ceremonies being adjusted, and the records of the court produced, the Honorable Mr. Howell, the youngest justice, addressed himself to the Assembly in a very learned, sensible, and elaborate discourse, in which he was upwards of six hours upon the floor.

He observed, that the order by which the judges were before the House might be considered as calling upon them to assist in matters of legislation, or to render the reasons of their judicial determination, as being accountable to the legislature for their judgment.

That in the former point of view, the court was ever ready, as constituting the legal counsellors of the State, to render every kind of assistance to the legislative, in framing new or repealing former laws: but that for the reasons of their judgment upon any question judicially before them, they were accountable only to God and their own consciences.

Under the first head, the honorable gentleman pointed out the objectionable parts of the Act upon which the information was founded, and most clearly demonstrated, by a variety of conclusive arguments, that it was unconstitutional, had not the force of a law, and could not be executed. His arguments were enforced by many authorities of the first eminence, in addition to those produced upon the trial. But as this part of the subject hath in a great measure been anticipated, we shall not enter into a further detail, concluding that the legal defence of the court, in showing "that they were not accountable to the legislature for the reasons of their judgment," will be more interesting to the public.

Here it was observed, that the legislature had assumed a fact, in their summons to the judges, which was not justified or warranted by the records. The plea of the defendant, in a matter of mere surplusage, mentions the Act of the General Assembly as "unconstitutional, and so void;" but the judgment of the court simply is, "that the information is not cognizable before them." Hence it appears that the plea hath been mistaken for the judgment.

Whatever might have been the opinion of the judges, they spoke by their records, which admitted of no addition or diminution. They might have been influenced respectively by different reasons, as the whole Act was judicially before them, of which, it being general, they could judge by inspection, without confining themselves to the particular points stated in the plea. It would be out of the power, therefore, of the General Assembly to determine upon the propriety of the court's judgment, without a particular explanation. If this could be required in one instance, it might in all; and so the legislative would become the Supreme Judiciary. A perversion of power totally subversive of civil liberty!

If it be conceded, that the equal distribution of justice is as requisite to answer the purposes of government as the enacting of salutary laws, it is evident that the judiciary power should be as independent as the legislative. And consequently the judges can not be answerable for their opinion, unless charged with criminality. * * *

Judge Tillinghast observed, that nothing could have induced the gentlemen of the court to accept the office to which they were appointed, but a regard to the public good; that their perquisites were trifling, and their salaries not worth mentioning. The only recompense they expected, or could receive, was a consciousness of rectitude, which had supported them, and he was confident would support them, through every change of circumstances; that melancholy indeed would be the condition of the citizens, if the Supreme Judiciary of the State was liable to reprehension, whenever the caprice or the resentment of a few leading men should direct a public inquiry!

That, as one member of the court, he felt himself perfectly independent, while moving in the circle of his duty; and however he might be affected for the honor of the State, he was wholly indifferent about any consequences that might possibly respect himself.

That the opinion he had given resulted from mature reflection and the clearest conviction; that his conscience testified to the purity of his intentions, and he was happy in the persuasion, that his conduct met the approbation of his God!

Judge Hazard. My brethren have so fully declared my sentiments upon this occasion, that I have nothing to add by way of argument. It gives me pain that the conduct of the court seems to have met the displeasure of the administration. But their obligations were of too sacred a nature for them to aim at pleasing but in the line of their duty.

It is well known that my sentiments have fully accorded with the general system of the legislature in emitting the paper currency; but I never did, I never will, depart from the character of an honest man, to support any measures, however agreeable in themselves. If there could have been a prepossession in my mind, it must have been in favor of the Act of the General Assembly; but it was not possible to resist the force of conviction. The opinion I gave upon the trial was dictated by the energy of truth: I thought it right—I still think so. Be it as it may, we derived our understanding from the Almighty, and to Him only are we accountable for our judgment.

To the observations of the judges, succeeded a very serious and interesting debate among the members, wherein many arguments and observations were adduced on both sides. At length a question was taken, "whether the Assembly was satisfied with the reasons given by the judges in support of their judgment?" It was determined in the negative.

A motion was then made, and seconded, "for dismissing the judges from ~~their office." * * *~~ [A memorial and protest from the judges, dated Nov. 4, 1786, was here presented to the Assembly, and Mr. Varnum was allowed to address the House in support of it.]

The claim and demand of the judges, as stated in their memorial, and enforced by their counsel, were followed by a concise, but rational debate, in which the fury of passion, excepting in one or two instances, surrendered to cool reflection, and prepared the way for vindicating the honor of the law, and the dignity of the State. In vain did any endeavor to recall the mind to a predetermined resolution! Truth, "which is lodged in a secret corner of the heart," exerted her gentle influence, while prejudice and malice retired abashed!

A motion was made by an honorable member, seconded, and agreed to, that the opinion of the Attorney-General be taken, and the sentiments of the other professional gentlemen requested, whether constitutionally, and agreeably to law, the General Assembly can suspend, or remove from office, the judges of the Supreme Judiciary Court, without a previous charge and statement of criminality, due process, trial, and conviction thereon? * * * [Addresses were then made by "Mr. Channing, the Attorney-General," and three others, to the effect that the judges could only be removed by impeachment or other regular process.] The two professional gentlemen in the House, the Honorable Mr. Marchant and Mr. Bourne, confirmed the sentiments of their brethren, in the leading points, by a masterly display of legal talents.

The only question remaining was, whether the judges should be discharged from any further attendance upon the General Assembly, as no accusation appeared against them? The question was put, and decided by a very great majority, "that as the judges are not charged with any criminality in rendering the judgment, upon the information, Trevett against Weeden, they are therefore discharged from any further attendance upon this Assembly, on that account."[27]

EJECTMENT. This action was brought for the recovery of a valuable house and lot, with a wharf and other appurtenances, situate in the town of Newbern.

The defendant pleaded not guilty, under the common rule.

He held under a title derived from the state, by a deed, from a Superintendent Commissioner of confiscated estates.

At May Term 1786, Nash, for the defendant, moved that the suit be dismissed, according to an act of the last session, entitled, an act, to secure and quiet in their possession all such persons, their heirs and assigns, who have purchased or may hereafter purchase lands and tenements, goods and chattels, which have been sold or may hereafter be sold by commissioners of forfeited estates, legally appointed for that purpose, 1785, 7, 553.

The act requires the Courts, in all cases where the defendant makes affidavit that he holds the disputed property under a sale from a commissioner of forfeited estates, to dismiss the suit on motion.

The defendant had filed an affidavit, setting forth that the property in dispute had been confiscated and sold by the Commissioner of the district.

This brought on long arguments from the counsel on each side, on constitutional points. * * *

as it went, was a written constitution. It continued to have the same character throughout.—Thayer.

Holmes v. Walton, decided by the Supreme Court of New Jersey in 1780, seems to be the first instance of a court holding a State statute inoperative because in conflict with the constitution of the State. The statute prescribed a jury of six men in a particular type of cases and it seems probable that the court regarded the guaranty of jury trial expressed in the constitution as requiring a jury of twelve. The case is summarized in the opinion in State v. Parkhurst (1804) 9 N. J. L. 427, 444. That it was known outside of New Jersey is evidenced by the statement of Gouverneur Morris in an address in 1785 to the legislature of Pennsylvania: "A law was once passed in New Jersey, which the judges pronounced unconstitutional, and therefore void. * * * Such power in judges is dangerous; but unless it somewhere exists, the time employed in framing a bill of rights and form of government was merely thrown away." Among the New Jersey delegates to the Federal Convention of 1787 that drafted the present Constitution of the United States were David Brearly, chief justice at the time of the decision, William Livingston, and James Patterson, governor and attorney-general respectively at that time. It seems that both the governor and the legislature accepted the decision as shown by his recommendation and their enactment of legislation to cure the defect in the statute in question. The opinion of the court was probably oral, at least there seems to be no extant published opinion. See Dr. Austin Scott, Holmes v. Walton: The New Jersey Precedent, 4 Amer. Hist. Rev. 456-469.

[28] Though called "Superior Court" it had supreme jurisdiction; in fact the three judges who composed it constituted the entire judiciary of the state, nisi prius and appellate. See 103 N. Car. 467, 469.—Ed.

At May term, 1787, Nash's motion was resumed, and produced a very lengthy debate from the Bar.

Whereupon the COURT recommended to the parties to consent to a fair decision of the property in question, by a jury according to the common law of the land, and pointed out to the defendant, the uncertainty, that would always attend his title, if this cause should be dismissed without a trial; as upon a repeal of the present act (which would probably happen sooner or later) suit might be again commenced against him for the same property, at the time when evidences, which at present were easy to be had, might be wanting. But this recommendation was without effect.

Another mode was proposed for putting the matter in controversy on a more constitutional footing for a decision, than that of the motion under the aforesaid act. The court then, after every reasonable endeavor had been used in vain for avoiding a disagreeable difference between the Legislature and the judicial powers of the state, at length with much apparent reluctance, but with great deliberation and firmness, gave their opinion separately, but unanimously for overruling the aforementioned motion for the dismission of the said suits.

In the course of which the Judges observed, that the obligation of their oaths, and the duty of their office required them, in that situation, to give their opinion on that important and momentous subject; and that notwithstanding the great reluctance they might feel against involving themselves in a dispute with the Legislature of the state, yet no object of concern or respect could come in competition or authorize them to dispense with the duty they owed the public, in consequence of the trust they were invested with under the solemnity of their oaths.

That they therefore were bound to declare that they considered, that whatever disabilities the persons under whom the plaintiffs were said to derive their titles, might justly have incurred, against their maintaining or prosecuting any suits in the Courts of this state; yet that such disabilities in their nature were merely personal, and not by any means capable of being transferred to the present plaintiffs, either by descent or purchase; and that these plaintiffs being citizens of one of the United States, are citizens of this state, by the confederation of all the states; which is to be taken as a part of the law of the land, unrepealable by any act of the General Assembly.

That by the constitution every citizen had undoubtedly a right to a decision of his property by a trial by jury. For that if the Legislature could take away this right, and require him to stand condemned in his property without a trial, it might with as much authority require his life to be taken away without a trial by jury, and that he should stand condemned to die, without the formality of any trial at all: that if the members of the General Assembly could do this, they might with equal authority, not only render themselves the Legislators of the state for life, without any further election of the people, from thence transmit the dignity and authority of legislation down to their heirs male forever.

But that it was clear, that no act they could pass, could by any means repeal or alter the constitution, because if they could do this, they would at the same instant of time, destroy their own existence as a Legislature, and dissolve the government thereby established. Consequently the constitution (which the judicial power was bound to take notice of as much as of any other law whatever,) standing in full force as the fundamental law of the land, notwithstanding the act on which the present motion was grounded, the same act must of course, in that instance, stand as abrogated and without any effect.

Nash's motion was overruled.

And at this term the cause was tried. * * *[29]

[29] James Iredell and William R. Davie were counsel for the plaintiffs. The latter was attending the Convention at Philadelphia that drafted the present Constitution of the United States as a member at the time of the decision. He must have known the argument that Iredell proposed to make for it is highly probable that this followed the thought of Iredell's public letter published at Newbern, Aug. 17, 1786. It is not improbable that Davie participated in the argument at the first hearing at the May term, 1786. In part, Iredell's letter read: "in forming the constitution [of North Carolina] * * * which we considered as the fundamental basis of our government, unalterable, but by the same high power which established it * * *. It was, of course, to be considered how to impose restrictions on the legislature, that might still leave it free to all useful purposes, but at the same time guard against the abuse of unlimited power, * * *. Theories were nothing to us, opposed to our own severe experience. We were not ignorant of the theory of the necessity of the legislature being absolute in all cases, because it was the great ground of the British pretensions. But this was a mere speculative principle, which men at ease and leisure thought proper to assume. When we were at liberty to form a government as we thought best, without regard to that or any theoretical principle we did not approve of, we decisively gave our sentiments against it, * * *. I have therefore no doubt, but that the power of the Assembly is limited and defined by the constitution. It is a creature of the constitution. * * *. The great argument is, that though the Assembly have not a right to violate the constitution, yet if they in fact do so, the only remedy is, either by a humble petition that the law may be repealed, or a universal resistance of the people. But that in the meantime, their act, whatever it is, is to be obeyed as a law; for the judicial power is not to presume to question the power of an act of Assembly.

"To these positions, not unconfidently urged, I answer:—

"1. That the remedy by petition implies a supposition, that the electors hold their rights by the favour of their representatives. * * *

"But 2. The whole people may resist. A dreadful expedient indeed. * * *

"These two remedies then being rejected, it remains to be inquired whether the judicial power hath any authority to interfere in such a case. The duty of that power, I conceive, in all cases, is to decide according to the laws of the State. It will not be denied, I suppose, that the constitution is a law of the State, as well as an act of Assembly, with this difference only, that it is the fundamental law, and unalterable by the legislature, which derives all its power from it. One act of Assembly may repeal another act of Assembly. For this reason, the latter act is to be obeyed, and not the former. An act of Assembly cannot repeal the constitution, or any part of it. For that reason, an act of Assembly, inconsistent

"That the members of the Convention of 1787 thought the Constitution secured to courts in the United States the right to pass on the validity of acts of Congress under it cannot be reasonably doubted. Confining ourselves simply to the available evidence that is strictly contemporaneous with the framing and ratifying of the Constitution, as I think it only proper to do, we find the following members of the Convention that framed the Constitution definitely asserting that this would be the case: Gerry and King of Massachusetts, Wilson and Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania, Martin of Maryland, Randolph, Madison, and Mason of Virginia, Dickinson of Delaware, Yates and Hamilton of New York, Rutledge and Charles Pinckney of South Carolina, Davie and Williamson of North Carolina, Sherman and Ellsworth of Connecticut.[30] True these are only seventeen names out of a possible fifty-five, but let it be considered whose names they are. They designate fully three-fourths of the leaders of the Convention, four of the five members of the Committee of Detail which drafted the Constitution,[31] and four of the five members of the Committee of Style which gave the Constitution final form.[32] with the constitution, is void, and cannot be obeyed, without disobeying the superior law to which we were previously and irrevocably bound. The judges, therefore, must take care at their peril, that every act of Assembly they presume to enforce is warranted by the constitution, since if it is not, they act without lawful authority. This is not a usurped or a discretionary power, but one inevitably resulting from the constitution of their office, they being judges for the benefit of the whole people, not mere servants of the Assembly. * * * But it is said, if the judges have this power, so have the county courts. I admit it. The county courts, in the exercise of equal judicial power, must have equal authority. * * * The objection, however, urged by some persons, that sheriffs and other ministerial officers must exercise their judgment too, does not apply. For if the power of judging rests with the courts, their decision is final as to the subject matter."

Spaight then also attending the convention as a member from North Carolina wrote Iredell criticizing the decision. The latter replied in defense of it. For Iredell's two letters, see Coxe, Judicial Power and Unconstitutional Legislation (1893), pp. 253-263, also see p. 266; for Spaight's letter see, ibid. p. 385. In the North Carolina convention of 1788, Davie expressed his understanding that the proposed federal constitution gave power to the federal judiciary to enforce the restrictions imposed upon the states. 4 Elliot's Debates (ed. of 1866) pp. 156-158.

It is placing the opinion of an individual, or two, or three, above that of both branches of Congress, a doctrine which is not warranted by the Constitution, and will not, I hope, long have any advocates in this country"; quoted from Wharton's State Trials, 412, by Mr. Horace A. The entries under these names, in the Index to Farrand's Records occupy fully thirty columns, as compared with fewer than half as many columns under the names of the remaining members. We have in this list, in other words, the names of men who expressed themselves on the subject of judicial review because they also expressed themselves on all other subjects before the Convention. They were the leaders of that body and its articulate members. And against them are to be pitted, in reference to the question under discussion, only Mercer of Maryland, Bedford of Delaware, and Spaight of North Carolina, the record in each of whose cases turns out to be upon inspection of doubtful implication. For while Spaight, for instance, undoubtedly expressed himself, during the period of the Convention, as strongly adverse to the theory of judicial review,[33] yet he later heard the idea expounded both on the floor of the Philadelphia Convention and the North Carolina convention without protest. The words of Bedford which are relied upon in this connection are his declaration that he was "opposed to every check on the legislature." But these words were spoken with reference, not to judicial review, but to the proposition to establish a council of legislative revision.[34] Mercer of Maryland did not sign the Constitution and opposed its adoption. It is by no means impossible that one of the grounds of his opposition was recognition of the fact that the Constitution established judicial review.[35] Although it seems a warrantable assertion that on no other feature of the Constitution with reference to which there has been any considerable debate is the view of the Convention itself better attested."—Edward S. Corwin, The Doctrine of Judicial Review (1914) pp. 10-13.

"Judicial Review in the State Ratifying Conventions: The power that the courts would have with reference to unconstitutional acts of Congress was expounded at length in the Pa. convention by Wilson: Elliot, Debates, II, 417, 454 (Ed. of 1836); also by Ellsworth in the Conn. convention, ib. 198-9. It was referred to directly by Hamilton in the N. Y. convention, ib. 336-7. Several references occur to it in the N. C. convention that failed to ratify; loc. cit. IV, 87, 93-4, 152, 165, 167, 192. The report of the debate in the Mass. Convention on the judiciary appears in only very abbreviated form on account of the illness of the reporter at this stage of the proceedings. But Samuel Adams made a direct allusion to the power of judicial review affecting acts of Congress; loc. cit. II, 142, and other speakers used language showing their recognition of some such power in courts; see ib. 97-8, 100-6, 110-11, 138, 154, 167, 171-4. In the Va. convention, judicial review was referred to, either as touching acts of Congress or in more general terms no fewer than twelve times: loc. cit. III, 182 and 309 (Henry); 197, 208, and 431 (Randolph); 287 and 498 (Pendleton); 409 (Nicholas); 441 (Mason); 484-5 (Madison);

503 (Marshall); 514 (Granger). Much of this and further evidence is presented by Mr. Horace Davis in his article in the Am. Pol. Sc. Rev. Mr. Davis himself, however, endeavors to reject the obvious verdict of this evidence. The explanation of his attitude is that he confuses the question of whether judicial review of acts of Congress was believed to be a feature of the new system with the question whether it was expected to prove an effective limitation upon Congress. The absence of a Bill of Rights and the presence of the 'general welfare' and 'necessary and proper' clauses caused opponents of the Constitution to charge that the judges would never be able to stamp any act of Congress as invalid, that Congress' power was practically unlimited to begin with. See Elliot, I, 545; II, 314-15, 318, 321-2; IV, 175; also, McMaster and Stone, Pennsylvania and the Federal Constitution, 467, 611; also, Ford, Pamphlets, 312; also and especially, Federalist No. 33. Reading, Supreme Court of New Jersey, (1795 or 1796), see reference to this case in 4 Halstead 444; Lindsay et al. v. The Commissioners, Court of Appeals of South Carolina, (1796) 2 Bay 38 (The four judges divided equally on whether the statute conflicted with the constitution, two asserted power to hold unconstitutional statutes inoperative and the others did not disclaim it); Stidger v. Rogers, Court of Appeals of Kentucky (1801) 2 Ky. 52; Whittington v. Polk, General Court of Maryland (1802) H. & J. 236; Ogden v. Witherspoon (1802) U. S. Cir. Ct. 2 Hayw. (N. Car.) 227, Fed. Cas. No. 10, 461, holding a state law inoperative because of conflict with the state constitution, is sometimes cited as a case of this class but query, unless the requirement of Sec. 34 of the Judiciary Act of 1789 that state laws should be the rules of decision where they and not federal law apply leads to the result that such a decision of a federal court is based on a tacit decision that a state court would have that power in a like case. Of course, such a holding would not preclude a decision by the state court that the state constitution did not give it the power. For a like case in 1795 see infra p. 35, note 42.—Ed.

"In June, 1792, Chief Justice Jay, Judge Cushing, and District Judge Henry Marchant, sitting in the Circuit Court for the District of Rhode Island, held a law of that State to be unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of contract, in the case of Alexander Champion and Thomas Dickason v. Silas Casey.[36] The statute involved was an Act of the Rhode Island General Assembly passed in February, 1791, in response to a petition of a debtor for an extension of three years' time in which to settle his accounts with his creditors and for an exemption from all arrests and attachments for such term of three years. The decision was as follows: 'The Court also determined in the case of Champion and Dickason against Silas Casey that the Legislature of a State have no right to make a law to exempt an individual from arrests and his estate from attachments for his private debts, for any term of time, it being clearly a law impairing the obligation of contracts, and therefore contrary to the Constitution of the United States.' Another newspaper stated that: 'The defendant's counsel pleaded a resolution of the State in bar of the action, by which he was allowed three years to pay his debts and during which he was to be free from arrests on that account. The Judges were unanimously of opinion that, as by the Constitution of the United States, the individual States are prohibited from making laws which shall impair the obligation of contracts, and as the resolution in question, if operative, would impair the obligation of the contract in question, therefore it could not be admitted to bar the action.'[37] Though this decision was given great publicity in newspapers throughout the States, it seems to have aroused no opposition to the Federal Courts; and though, thirty years later, the right of these Courts to declare a State statute to be invalid was hotly attacked by many States, the exercise of this right in 1792 was accepted without protest by the very State which, five years before, had sought to impeach its State Judges for holding a State law invalid;[38] and its acquiescence was expressed formally (as described by contemporary papers) as follows: 'In conformity to a decision of the Circuit Court, the Lower House of Assembly voted on Wednesday that they would not grant to any individual an exemption from arrests and attachments for his private debts, for any term of time.'[39] Following this decision in Champion v. Dickason [Casey] holding a Rhode Island State law unconstitutional, the Federal Circuit Courts proceeded to exercise this judicial power in a series of cases involving statutes of other states;[40] in 1793, the validity of a Connecticut statute was involved in a case;[41] in 1795, a statute of Pennsylvania was held invalid by Judge Paterson in VanHorne's Lessee v. Dorrance, 2 Dallas, 304;[42] in 1799, a statute of Vermont was held invalid as violating the impairment of obligation of contract clause of the Federal Constitution.[43] So far as can be ascertained from the comments in the press and from other contemporary documents, the action of the Federal Courts in these cases met with no opposition, and no claim was ever then advanced that their action was without constitutional authority.[44]

[36] This case has hitherto escaped the notice of legal historians; the original records are now on file in the United States District Court for the District of Rhode Island.—Warren.

[37] For these reports of the decision, see Columbian Centinel, June 20, 1792; Providence Gazette, June 16, 1792; United States Chronicle (Prov.), June 14, 1792; Salem Gazette (Mass.), June 26, 1792; New York Daily Advertiser, June 22, 1792; Connecticut Journal, June 22, 1792, and many other newspapers.

One month before this decision, the Federal Circuit Court sitting in Pennsylvania (Judges Wilson, Blair, and District Judge Peters) had decided a case involving the validity of a statute of that State; but had held it not violative of the Federal Constitution. See Collet v. Collet (1792), 2 Dall. (U. S.) 294; Fed. Cas. No. 3001; Gazette of the United States, May 2, 1792; New York Daily Advertiser, May 2, 1792.—Warren.

This cause involves consequences of immense magnitude, and we trust will not be decided without full deliberation." This case has not hitherto been noted.—Warren.

[42] [The Federal Circuit Court in this case, involving title under grants of two states, held a state statute inoperative because in conflict with the State constitution.—Ed.] This case has always been cited hitherto by legal historians (though erroneously) as the first instance of a decision by a Federal Court on the validity of a State statute. See Aurora, May 15, 1795, New York Daily Advertiser, May 16, 1795, Connecticut Journal, May 27, 1795, for interesting facts concerning the case; see also a pamphlet published in Lancaster, Pa., in 1801, by William Hamilton, entitled Connecticut Claim (Pickering Papers MSS, L, LVII). A writ of error was taken from this decision of the Circuit Court to the United States Supreme Court, but five years later, it was dismissed for failure to prosecute.—Warren.

[43] This case, hitherto unnoted by legal historians, is described in Farmer's Weekly Museum, April 20, 1799, as one which "was lately brought to trial before the Circuit Court of the United States at Rutland, Vermont, the Church Land Cause, brought by the selectmen of Manchester, by virtue of a statute of that state authorizing the selectmen of each town to take possession of all church lands, and to appropriate the avails to other purposes than originally intended. The Court, after a fair, impartial examination of the merits of the cause, adjudged the statutes to be unconstitutional and that the Church should hold their lands.—Warren.

[44] The only criticism of any of the decisions was that voiced by certain Federalists against Judge Paterson (himself a Federalist) owing to his decision in Van Horne v. Dorrance, [2 Dall. (U. S.) 304, 1 L. ed. 391, Fed. Cas. No. 16857;] it was based purely on political and personal grounds, and arose out of the fact that the decision had resulted in damage to large numbers of Connecticut Federalist settlers on lands in Pennsylvania; see Georgia Republican, Feb. 14, 1803. In Aurora, Sept. 20, 28, 1803, it is said that Judge Paterson's decision lost him the appointment as Chief Justice in 1801, owing to opposition by certain prominent Federalists.—Warren.

Act of March 23, 1792, it was provided that the Circuit Courts should pass upon certain claims of invalid pensioners, subject to revision by the Secretary of War and by Congress. When the first case under this Act arose in the Federal Circuit Court sitting in New York, April 5, 1792, Chief Justice Jay and Judge Cushing, after stating that, under the Constitution, the Government was divided into three 'distinct and independent branches, and that it is the duty of each to abstain from and to oppose encroachment on either, that neither the Legislative nor the Executive branch can constitutionally assign to the Judicial any duties but such as are properly judicial, and to be performed in a judicial manner', decided to construe the Act as appointing the Judges as Commissioners to perform nonjudicial duties, with power to accept or decline the office; and, out of desire to show high respect for Congress, they professed willingness to act as such Commissioners.[45] These views the Judges communicated to Congress by means of a letter addressed to the President, April 10, 1792. Judge Iredell, sitting in the Southern Circuit, also wrote to President Washington that in his view the Act was unconstitutional, and he expressed a doubt as to whether he would be justified in acting even as a Commissioner. Judges Wilson and Blair, however, sitting in the Circuit Court in Pennsylvania, met the question boldly, and (without filing any further written opinion) entered an order in the case of an invalid claimant named Hayburn that: 'it is considered by the Court that the same be not proceeded upon.'[46] Following the decision, they addressed a letter to the President, setting forth 'the sentiments which, on a late painful occasion, governed us with regard to an Act passed by the Legislature of the Union.' They stated that 'it is a principle important to freedom that, in government, the Judicial should be distinct from, and independent of, the Legislative department', and they held that the business directed by the Act was not of a judicial nature. 'These, Sir, are the reasons of our conduct. Be assured that, though it became necessary, it was far from being pleasant. To be obliged to act contrary, either to the obvious direction of Congress, or to a constitutional principle, in our judgment equally obvious, excited feelings in us, which we hope never to experience again.'[47] This action of the Federal Judges, holding for the first time an Act of Congress to be in conflict with the Constitution, at once became the subject of consideration in Congress. On a memorial presented by Hayburn, April 13, 1792, asking for relief, the following statement was made in the House of Representatives, setting forth more in detail the view of the Judges:[48]

[45] That the subject matter of the statute was such as to enlist popular sympathy, and therefore to bring possible odium on the Judges for failing to act under the statute, may be seen from an editorial in the National Gazette, April 12, 1792: "Our poor, starving invalids have at length some provision made for them by Congress; and as the distresses of many of them are urgent in the extreme, it is to be hoped that not a moment's delay will be made by the public officers who are directed to settle their accounts; for although men who are accustomed to plentiful tables do not perhaps know it, it is nevertheless a melancholy truth that a few days fasting would kill not only a feeble, war-worn veteran, but even a hearty well-fed member of Congress or head of a department. If through unavoidable delay any of those unfortunate men should starve before their pittance is paid, then it is to be hoped their widows and orphans will on the very first application receive it, that they may at least have something to purchase coffins for the deceased."—Warren.

[46] See the First Hayburn Case, by Max Farrand, Amer. Hist. Rev. (1907), XIII. Judge Peters, who also sat in this case, wrote, June 23, 1818, to Charles J. Ingersoll relative to a later pension act: "Having been among the first Judges who resisted the danger of Executive control over the judgments of Courts when the first Invalid Law gave power to the Secretary of War to review such judgments, I am confirmed in the opinions I then held by the circumstances now occurring; tho' I do not now act as a Judge in a Court." Peters Papers MSS. —Warren.

"'It appeared that the Court thought the examination of invalids a very extraordinary duty to be imposed on the Judges—and looked on the law which imposed that duty as an unconstitutional one; inasmuch as it directs the Secretary of War to state the mistakes of the Judge to Congress for their revision; they could not, therefore, accede to a regulation tending to render the Judiciary subject to the Legislative and Executive powers, which, from a regard for liberty and the Constitution, ought to be kept carefully distinct, it being a primary principle of the utmost importance that no decision of the Judiciary Department should under any pretext be brought in revision before either the Legislative or Executive Departments of the government, neither of which have, in any instance, a revisionary authority over the judicial proceedings of the Courts of Justice. * * * This being the first instance in which a Court of Justice had declared a law of Congress to be unconstitutional, the novelty of the case produced a variety of opinions with respect to the measures to be taken on the occasion. At length a Committee of five were appointed to enquire into the facts contained in the Memorial and to report thereon.'

* * * "The decision evidently caused considerable excitement not only in Congress but in the community; and while, fifteen years later, it was the Anti-Federalists who assailed this form of exercise of judicial power, the curious fact should be noted that, at this time, the Federalists were apparently the opponents and the Anti-Federalists the upholders of the Judiciary." —1 Charles Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922) pp. 66-72.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That a final judgment or decree in any suit, in the highest court of law or equity of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favour of such their validity, or where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the constitution, or of a treaty, or statute of, or commission held under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege or exemption specially set up or claimed by either party, under such clause of the said Constitution, treaty, statute or commission, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error, the citation being signed by the chief justice, or judge or chancellor of the court rendering or passing the judgment or decree complained of, or by a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same regulations, and the writ shall have the same effect, as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered or passed in a circuit court, and the proceeding upon the reversal shall also be the same, except that the Supreme Court, instead of remanding the cause for a final decision as before provided, may at their discretion, if the cause shall have been once remanded before, proceed to a final decision of the same, and award execution. But no other error shall be assigned or regarded as a ground of reversal in any such case as aforesaid, than such as appears on the face of the record and immediately respects the before mentioned questions of validity or construction of the said constitution, treaties, statutes, commissions, or authorities in dispute.—The Judiciary Act, enacted by Congress, Sept. 24, 1789.

MARBURY v. MADISON.

1803. Supreme Court of the United States. 1 Cranch. 137.

At the last term, viz. December term, 1801, William Marbury, Dennis Ramsay, Robert Townsend Hooe, and William Harper, by their counsel, Charles Lee, Esq. late attorney general of the United States, severally moved the court for a rule to James Madison, secretary of state of the United States, to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding him to cause to be delivered to them respectively their several commissions as justices of the peace in the District of Columbia. This motion was supported by affidavits of the following facts; that notice of this motion had been given to Mr. Madison; that Mr. Adams, the late president of the United States, nominated the applicants to the senate for their advice and consent to be appointed justices of the peace of the district of Columbia; that the senate advised and consented to the appointments; that commissions in due form were signed by the said president appointing them justices, &c. and that the seal of the United States was in due form affixed to the said commissions by the secretary of state; that the applicants have requested Mr. Madison to deliver them their said commissions, who has not complied with that request; and that their said commissions are withheld from them; that the applicants have made application to Mr. Madison as secretary of state of the United States at his office, for information whether the commissions were signed and sealed as aforesaid; that explicit and satisfactory information has not been given in answer to that enquiry, either by the secretary of state or any officer in the department of state; that application has been made to the secretary of the Senate for a certificate of the nomination of the applicants, and of the advice and consent of the senate, who has declined giving such a certificate; whereupon a rule was laid to shew cause on the fourth day of this term. * * *

Afterwards, on the 24th of February the following opinion of the court was delivered by the chief justice.

OPINION OF THE COURT.

At the last term on the affidavits then read and filed with the clerk, a rule was granted in this case, requiring the secretary of state to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue, directing him to deliver to William Marbury his commission as a justice of the peace for the county of Washington, in the district of Columbia.

No cause has been shewn, and the present motion is for a mandamus. The peculiar delicacy of this case, the novelty of some of its circumstances, and the real difficulty attending the points which occur in it, require a complete exposition of the principles on which the opinion to be given by the court, is founded. * * *

2dly. The power of this court.

1st. The nature of the writ. * * *

This, then, is a plain case for a mandamus, either to deliver the commission, or a copy of it from the record; and it only remains to be enquired,

Whether it can issue from this court. * * *

The authority, therefore, given to the supreme court, by the act establishing the judicial courts of the United States, to issue writs of mandamus to public officers, appears not to be warranted by the constitution; and it becomes necessary to enquire whether a jurisdiction, so conferred, can be exercised.

The question, whether an act, repugnant to the constitution, can become the law of the land, is a question deeply interesting to the United States; but, happily, not of an intricacy proportioned to its interest. It seems only necessary to recognize certain principles, supposed to have been long and well established, to decide it.

That the people have an original right to establish, for their future government, such principles as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness, is the basis on which the whole

American fabric has been erected. The exercise of this original right is a very great exertion; nor can it, nor ought it to be frequently repeated. The principles, therefore, so established, are deemed fundamental. And as the authority, from which they proceed, is supreme, and can seldom act, they are designed to be permanent.

This original and supreme will organizes the government, and assigns, to different departments, their respective powers. It may either stop here, or establish certain limits not to be transcended by those departments.

The government of the United States is of the latter description. The powers of the legislature are defined, and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken, or forgotten, the constitution is written. To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may, at any time, be passed by those intended to be restrained? The distinction, between a government with limited and unlimited powers, is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed, are of equal obligation. It is a proposition too plain to be contested, that the constitution controls any legislative act repugnant to it; or, that the legislature may alter the constitution by an ordinary act.

Between these alternatives there is no middle ground. The constitution is either a superior, paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it.

If the former part of the alternative be true, then a legislative act contrary to the constitution is not law: if the latter part be true, then written constitutions are absurd attempts, on the part of the people, to limit a power, in its own nature illimitable.

Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation, and consequently the theory of every such government must be, that an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void.

This theory is essentially attached to a written constitution, and is consequently to be considered, by this court, as one of the fundamental principles of our society. It is not therefore to be lost sight of in the further consideration of this subject.

If an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void, does it, notwithstanding its invalidity, bind the courts, and oblige them to give it effect? Or, in other words, though it be not law, does it constitute a rule as operative as if it was a law? This would be to overthrow in fact what was established in theory; and would seem, at first view, an absurdity too gross to be insisted on. It shall, however, receive a more attentive consideration.

It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases, must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each.

So if a law be in opposition to the constitution; if both the law and the constitution apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the constitution; or conformably to the constitution, disregarding the law; the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty.

If then the courts are to regard the constitution; and the constitution is superior to any ordinary act of the legislature; the constitution, and not such ordinary act, must govern the case to which they both apply.

Those then who controvert the principle that the constitution is to be considered, in court, as a paramount law, are reduced to the necessity of maintaining that courts must close their eyes on the constitution, and see only the law.

This doctrine would subvert the very foundation of all written constitutions. It would declare that an act, which, according to the principles and theory of our government, is entirely void; is yet, in practice, completely obligatory. It would declare, that if the legislature shall do what is expressly forbidden, such act, notwithstanding the express prohibition, is in reality effectual. It would be giving to the legislature a practical and real omnipotence, with the same breath which professes to restrict their powers within narrow limits. It is prescribing limits, and declaring that those limits may be passed at pleasure.

That it thus reduces to nothing what we have deemed the greatest improvement on political institutions—a written constitution—would of itself be sufficient, in America, where written constitutions have been viewed with so much reverence, for rejecting the construction. But the peculiar expressions of the constitution of the United States furnish additional arguments in favor of its rejection.

The judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases arising under the constitution.

Could it be the intention of those who gave this power, to say that, in using it, the constitution should not be looked into? That a case arising under the constitution should be decided without examining the instrument under which it arises?

This is too extravagant to be maintained.

In some cases then, the constitution must be looked into by the judges. And if they can open it at all, what part of it are they forbidden to read, or to obey?

There are many other parts of the constitution which serve to illustrate this subject.

It is declared that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state." Suppose a duty on the export of cotton, of tobacco, or of flour; and a suit instituted to recover it. Ought judgment to be rendered in such a case? ought the judges to close their eyes on the constitution, and only see the law?

The constitution declares "that no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

If, however, such a bill should be passed and a person should be prosecuted under it; must the court condemn to death those victims whom the constitution endeavours to preserve?

"No person," says the constitution, "shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."

Here the language of the constitution is addressed especially to the courts. It prescribes, directly for them, a rule of evidence not to be departed from. If the legislature should change that rule, and declare one witness, or a confession out of court, sufficient for conviction, must the constitutional principle yield to the legislative act?

From these, and many other selections which might be made, it is apparent that the framers of the constitution contemplated that instrument, as a rule for the government of courts, as well as of the legislature.

Why otherwise does it direct the judges to take an oath to support it? This oath certainly applies, in an especial manner, to their conduct in their official character. How immoral to impose it on them, if they were to be used as the instruments, and the knowing instruments, for violating what they swear to support!

The oath of office, too, imposed by the legislature, is completely demonstrative of the legislative opinion on this subject. It is in these words, "I do solemnly swear that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich; and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge all the duties incumbent on me as ——— according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the constitution, and laws of the United States."

Why does a judge swear to discharge his duties agreeably to the constitution of the United States, if that constitution forms no rule for his government? if it is closed upon him, and cannot be inspected by him?

If such be the real state of things, this is worse than solemn mockery. To prescribe, or to take this oath, becomes equally a crime.

It is also not entirely unworthy of observation, that in declaring what shall be the supreme law of the land, the constitution itself is first mentioned; and not the laws of the United States generally, but those only which shall be made in pursuance of the constitution, have that rank.

Thus, the particular phraseology of the constitution of the United States confirms and strengthens the principle, supposed to be essential to all written constitutions, that a law repugnant to the constitution is void; and that courts, as well as other departments, are bound by that instrument.

The rule must be discharged.[49]

[49] The reasoning of Marshall, C. J., is similar to that of Hamilton in No. 80 of The Federalist (essays published in 1787 and 1788 expounding, and advocating the adoption, of the Constitution).

Justice Gibson of Pennsylvania in a dissenting opinion in Eakin v. Raub (1825) 12 S. & R. (Pa.) 330, 345-358, said that the constitution of Pennsylvania made no express grant of power to her courts to refuse effect to unconstitutional acts of the state legislature, and opposed all the usual bases for establishing the power by implication. He seems to have regarded the power of the federal courts to pass upon the constitutionality of Acts of Congress as based upon provisions peculiar to the federal Constitution and the reasoning by Marshall in Marbury v. Madison (1803), 1 Cranch (U. S.) 137, 2 L. ed. 60, as inconclusive so far as it purported to rest upon principles applicable to every constitution that imposed limitations on the legislature. He especially denied significance to the oath required of judges and to the circumstance of a constitution being written. He regarded the power of judicial review of legislation as "political" and extraordinary, existing only by express grant, and that the only instance of express grant to the courts of Pennsylvania was that by Article VI of the Federal Constitution to hold invalid state acts in conflict with the federal Constitution, laws and treaties. In 1845, referring to this earlier opinion, he said: "I have changed that opinion, for two reasons. The late convention [that drafted the Pennsylvania constitution of 1838,] by their silence, sanctioned the pretensions of the courts to deal freely with the Acts of the legislature; and from experience of the necessity of the case." Norris v. Clymer, 2 Pa. 277, 281. In his opinion in Eakin v. Raub, supra Justice Gibson does not refer to the pursuance clause of article VI and omits discussion of the question whether that clause grants to state courts power to determine, in case of conflict between a state statute and an Act of Congress, whether the latter is in pursuance of the constitution, or whether such determination would be conclusive or subject to review by some federal court.

Speaking of Article VI Judge Brooke, of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, said: "It leaves to the state judges the right to enquire whether the laws, treaties, etc. have been made in pursuance of the Constitution. Standing on the ground of that article alone, if there were no other, I should feel myself compelled to enquire whether the 25th section of the Act of Congress, under the authority of which the mandate in question was awarded, is in pursuance of the Constitution, or repugnant thereto." Hunter v. Martin (1815) 4 Munf. (Va.) 1, 24-25.

Marbury v. Madison was not the first case in which the Supreme Court passed upon the constitutionality of an Act of Congress although it was the first in which the court declined to give operative effect to an Act of Congress. On a fictitiously framed issue constituting practically a moot case the court in 1796 held an Act of Congress valid. In his opinion in this case Associate Justice Chase said that since he considered the statute consistent with the constitution "it is unnecessary, at this time, for me to determine, whether this court, constitutionally

"Since the opinion in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 177, was delivered, it has not been doubted that it is within judicial competency, by express provisions of the Constitution or by necessary inference and implication, to determine whether a given law of the United States is or is not made in pursuance of the Constitution, and to hold it valid or void accordingly. * * * Necessarily the power to declare a law unconstitutional is always exercised with reluctance; but the duty to do so, in a proper case, cannot be declined, and must be discharged in accordance with the deliberate judgment of the tribunal in which the validity of the enactment is directly drawn in question." Fuller, C. J. delivering the opinion of the court in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. (1895) 157 U. S. 429, 554, 15 Sup. Ct. 673, 39 L. ed. 759.

"The reason for giving such unusual power to a judicial tribunal is obvious. It was necessary to give it from the complex character of the Government of the United States, which is in part National and in part Federal: where two separate governments exercise certain powers of sovereignty over the same territory, each independent of the other within its appropriate sphere of action, and where there was, therefore, an absolute necessity, in order to preserve internal tranquillity, that there should be some tribunal to decide between the Government of the United States and the government of a State whenever any controversy should arise as to their relative and respective powers in the common territory. The Supreme Court was created for that purpose, and to insure its impartiality it was absolutely necessary to make it independent of the legislative power, and the influence direct or indirect of Congress and the Executive. Hence the care with which its jurisdiction, powers, and duties are defined in the Constitution, and its independence of the legislative branch of the government secured.

"In No. 38 of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison, the necessity and object of this provision is clearly stated. * * * By the second section of Article VI., the laws of Congress are made the supreme law of the land only when they are made in pursuance of the legislative power specified in the Constitution; and by the Xth amendment the powers not delegated to the United States nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. * * * And any legislation by Congress beyond the limits of the power delegated, would be trespassing upon the rights of the States or the people, and would not be the supreme law of the land, but null and void; and it would be the duty of the courts to declare it so. For whether an act of Congress is within the limits of its delegated possesses the power to declare an Act of Congress void, on the ground of its being made contrary to, and in violation of, the Constitution; but if the court have such power, I am free to declare, that I will never exercise it, but in a very clear case." (Italics are in the original report.) Hylton v. United States (1796), 3 Dall. (U. S.) 171, 1 L. ed. 556, and see 1 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922) pp. 146-149.

power or not is a judicial question, to be decided by the courts, the Constitution having, in express terms, declared that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution." Taney, C. J., in Gordon v. United States (1864) 117 U. S. 697 (appendix) 700, 705.

"The judicial duty of passing upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress is one of great gravity and delicacy. The statute here in question has successfully borne the scrutiny of the legislative branch of the government, which, by enacting it, has affirmed its validity; and that determination must be given great weight. This court, by an unbroken line of decisions from Chief Justice Marshall to the present day, has steadily adhered to the rule that every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of an act of Congress until overcome beyond rational doubt. But if by clear and indubitable demonstration a statute be opposed to the Constitution we have no choice but to say so. The Constitution, by its own terms, is the supreme law of the land, emanating from the people, the repository of ultimate sovereignty under our form of government. A congressional statute, on the other hand, is the act of an agency of this sovereign authority, and if it conflict with the Constitution must fall; for that which is not supreme must yield to that which is. To hold it invalid (if it be invalid) is a plain exercise of the judicial power—that power vested in courts to enable them to administer justice according to law. From the authority to ascertain and determine the law in a given case, there necessarily results, in case of conflict, the duty to declare and enforce the rule of the supreme law and reject that of an inferior act of legislation which, transcending the Constitution, is of no effect and binding on no one. This is not the exercise of a substantive power to review and nullify acts of Congress, for no such substantive power exists. It is simply a necessary concomitant of the power to hear and dispose of a case or controversy properly before the court, to the determination of which must be brought the test and measure of the law." Sutherland, J., in Adkins v. Children's Hospital (1923) 261 U. S. 525, 544, 43 Sup. Ct. 394, 67 L. ed. 785.

"Although research has shown and practice has established the futility of the charge that it was a usurpation when this Court undertook to declare an Act of Congress unconstitutional, I suppose that we all agree that to do so is the gravest and most delicate duty that this Court is called on to perform. Upon this among other considerations the rule is settled that as between two possible interpretations of a statute, by one of which it would be unconstitutional and by the other valid, our plain duty is to adopt that which will save the Act. Even to avoid a serious doubt the rule is the same. United States v. Delaware & Hudson Co., 213 U. S. 366, 407, 408; United States v. Standard Brewery, 251 U. S. 210, 220; Texas v. Eastern Texas R. R. Co., 258 U. S. 204, 217; Bratton v. Chandler, 260 U. S. 110, 114; Panama R. R. Co. v. Johnson, 264 U. S. 375, 390." Holmes, J. in Blodgett v. Holden (1928) 48 Sup. Ct. 105.

MARTIN, HEIR AT LAW AND DEVISEE OF FAIRFAX v. HUNTER'S LESSEE.

1816. Supreme Court of the United States. 1 Wheaton 304.

[This case originated in an action of ejectment in a state district court in Virginia. The original defendant, an alien British subject, claimed that his title was protected by the treaty with England of 1783; the plaintiff, that by Virginia legislation the land had vested in that State and had been granted to him. The trial court gave judgment for the defendant in 1794. An appeal was revived against Martin an heir at law and devisee of Denny Fairfax and in 1810 the Court of Appeals of Virginia reversed the decision. On writ of error to the United States Supreme Court, that court, taking jurisdiction because of the right set up under the treaty and denied by the Court of Appeals, in 1813 reversed the decision of the latter court (7 Cranch 603, sub. nom. Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee) and remanded the case to that court "with instructions to enter judgment for the appellant Philip Martin." The mandate of the Supreme Court, using the customary language, "commanded" the Court of Appeals to take proceedings "agreeably to said judgment and instructions of said Supreme Court." The Court of Appeals requested argument of counsel whether the mandate should be obeyed and after six days argument and twenty months consideration announced in December, 1815, the judgment stated below, reported in 4 Munf. (Va.) 1. The foot-note below[50] gives some of the reasoning of the Court of Appeals. See 1 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922) 442-453 for interesting sidelights.]

[50] Judge Cabell: " * * * Our system of government is sui generis, unlike any other that now exists, or that has ever existed. * * * The free exercise, by the states, of the powers reserved to them, is as much sanctioned and guarded by the Constitution of the United States, as is the free exercise, by the federal government, of the powers delegated to that government. If either be impaired, the system is deranged. The two governments, therefore, possessing, each, its portion of the divided sovereignty, although embracing the same territory, and operating on the same persons and frequently on the same subjects, are nevertheless separate from, and independent of, each other. From this position, believed to be incontrovertible, it necessarily results that each government must act by its own organs: from no other can it expect, command, or enforce obedience, even as to objects coming within the range of its powers. But whilst, on the one hand, neither government is left dependent upon the other, for the exercise of its proper powers, so on the other hand, neither government nor any of its departments, can act compulsively, on the other or any of its organs in their political or official capacities; with the single exception, perhaps, of the case where a state may be sued. In using the term compulsive action, I do not mean to restrain it to the idea of actual force, but to extend it to any action imposing an obligation to obey. * * * No one presumes to contend, that the state governments can operate compulsively on the general government or any of its departments, even in cases of unquestionable encroachment on state authority * * *. I can perceive nothing in the constitution which gives to the federal courts any stronger claim to prevent or redress, by any procedure acting on the state courts, an equally obvious encroachment on the federal jurisdiction. * * * It must have been foreseen that controversies would sometimes arise as to the boundaries of the two jurisdictions. Yet the constitution has provided no umpire, has erected no tribunal by which they shall be settled. * * * If the appellate

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a writ of error from the Court of Appeals of Virginia, founded upon the refusal of that court to obey the mandate of this court, requiring the judgment rendered in this very cause, at February Term, 1813, to be carried into due execution. The following is the judgment of the Court of Appeals rendered on the mandate: "The court is unanimously of opinion, that the appellate power of the Supreme Court of the United States does not extend to this court, under a sound construction of the Constitution of the United States; that so much of the 25th section of the Act of Congress to establish the judicial courts of the United States, as extends the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to this court, is not in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States; that the writ of error in this cause was improvidently allowed under the authority of that Act; that the proceedings thereon in the Supreme Court power now claimed for the federal courts, is given by the Constitution, it is, unquestionably, not given in express terms, but is only deducible by inference and implication. Let us attend for a moment, to the effects and consequences of such a power.—The counsel for the appellee, claimed for the federal courts, not only the power to determine, finally and conclusively, all cases which might be carried before them in a due course of appeal, but also a right, as resulting necessarily and inevitably from the very nature of the appellate power, to determine finally and conclusively, on the extent of their own jurisdiction. * * * "Can it be believed that a power involving such consequences, which would thus place the state courts at the feet of the federal courts, and make them the unwilling instruments of their usurpation of state rights, (should such usurpation ever be attempted;) can it be believed, that such a power, if it had been intended to be given, would have been granted by implication and inference only? * * * All the purposes of the constitution of the United States will be answered by the erection of federal courts, into which any party, plaintiff or defendant, concerned in a case of federal cognizance, may carry it for adjudication; for, it was never intended to force the parties into those courts against their will. The right of the plaintiff, to have his case tried before the federal courts, is unquestionable, as he may institute his suit in the state or federal courts, at his own option; and it will be sufficient for the defendant sued in a state court, if the act of Congress shall give him the power, to remove the case at any time before judgment into the federal courts. I cannot doubt that Congress may give this power consistently with the Constitution; for, otherwise, the judicial power of the United States might be eluded at the pleasure of any plaintiff. If then the plaintiff shall elect the state jurisdiction, by bringing his suit in the state court, and the defendant shall also elect it by submitting to it, they must, from the nature of the judicial power reserved to the states, be concluded by the judgment, unless there be an appeal to some superior court, which I have endeavored to show is not the case with respect to the federal courts. If, after a judgment in a state court, in any such case, there shall be a complaint of a want of uniformity of decision, of a defective execution of the laws of the union, of a violation of rights under the Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States, or complaints of any other kind whatsoever, the answer to them all, both in relation to foreigners and others, is that the parties have elected their own tribunal; a tribunal, over which the general government has no control, and for whose decisions, therefore, it owes no responsibility." Pp. 7-16.

were coram non judice, in relation to this court, and that obedience to its mandate be declined by the court." * * *

Before proceeding to the principal questions, it may not be unfit to dispose of some preliminary considerations which have grown out of the arguments at the bar.

The Constitution of the United States was ordained and established, not by the states in their sovereign capacities, but emphatically, as the preamble of the Constitution declares, by "the people of the United States." There can be no doubt that it was competent to the people to invest the general government with all the powers which they might deem proper and necessary; to extend or restrain these powers according to their own good pleasure, and to give them a paramount and supreme authority. As little doubt can there be, that the people had a right to prohibit to the states the exercise of any powers which were, in their judgment, incompatible with the objects of the general compact; to make the powers of the state governments, in given cases, subordinate to those of the nation, or to reserve to themselves those sovereign authorities which they might not choose to delegate to either. The Constitution was not, therefore, necessarily carved out of existing state sovereignties, nor a surrender of powers already existing in state institutions, for the powers of the states depend upon their own constitutions; and the people of every state had the right to modify and restrain them, according to their own views of policy or principle. On the other hand, it is perfectly clear that the sovereign powers vested in the state governments, by their respective constitutions, remained unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they were granted to the government of the United States.

These deductions do not rest upon general reasoning, plain and obvious as they seem to be. They have been positively recognized by one of the articles in amendment of the constitution, which declares that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The government, then, of the United States, can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication. On the other hand, this instrument, like every other grant, is to have a reasonable construction, according to the import of its terms; and where a power is expressly given in general terms, it is not to be restrained to particular cases, unless that construction grow out of the context expressly, or by necessary implication. The words are to be taken in their natural and obvious sense, and not in a sense unreasonably restricted or enlarged.

The Constitution unavoidably deals in general language. It did not suit the purposes of the people, in framing this great charter of our liberties, to provide for minute specifications of its powers, or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution. It was foreseen that this would be a perilous and difficult, if not an impracticable, task. The instrument was not intended to provide merely for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure through a long lapse of ages, the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence. It could not be foreseen what new changes and modifications of power might be indispensable to effectuate the general objects of the charter; and restrictions and specifications, which at the present might seem salutary, might, in the end, prove the overthrow of the system itself. Hence its powers are expressed in general terms, leaving to the legislature, from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects, and to mould and model the exercise of its powers, as its own wisdom and the public interests should require.

With these principles in view, principles in respect to which no difference of opinion ought to be indulged, let us now proceed to the interpretation of the Constitution, so far as regards the great points in controversy.

The third article of the Constitution is that which must principally attract our attention. * * *

This leads us to the consideration of the great question as to the nature and extent of the appellate jurisdiction of the United States. We have already seen that appellate jurisdiction is given by the Constitution to the Supreme Court in all cases where it has not original jurisdiction; subject, however, to such exceptions and regulations as Congress may prescribe. It is, therefore, capable of embracing every case enumerated in the Constitution, which is not exclusively to be decided by way of original jurisdiction. But the exercise of appellate jurisdiction is far from being limited by the terms of the Constitution to the Supreme Court. There can be no doubt that Congress may create a succession of inferior tribunals, in each of which it may vest appellate as well as original jurisdiction. The judicial power is delegated by the Constitution in the most general terms, and may, therefore, be exercised by Congress under every variety of form, of appellate or original jurisdiction. And as there is nothing in the Constitution which restrains or limits this power, it must, therefore, in all other cases, subsist in the utmost latitude of which, in its own nature, it is susceptible.

As, then, by the terms of the Constitution, the appellate jurisdiction is not limited as to the Supreme Court, and as to this court it may be exercised in all other cases than those of which it has original cognizance, what is there to restrain its exercise over State tribunals in the enumerated cases? The appellate power is not limited by the terms of the third article to any particular courts.

The words are, "the judicial power (which includes appellate power) shall extend to all cases," &c., and "in all other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction." It is the case, then, and not the court, that gives the jurisdiction. If the judicial power extends to the case, it will be in vain to search in the letter of the Constitution for any qualification as to the tribunal where it depends. It is incumbent, then, upon those who assert such a qualification to show its existence by necessary implication. If the text be clear and distinct, no restriction upon its plain and obvious import ought to be admitted, unless the inference be irresistible.

If the Constitution meant to limit the appellate jurisdiction to cases pending in the courts of the United States, it would necessarily follow that the jurisdiction of these courts would, in all the cases enumerated in the Constitution, be exclusive of state tribunals. How otherwise could the jurisdiction extend to all cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, or to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction? If some of these cases might be entertained by state tribunals, and no appellate jurisdiction as to them should exist, then the appellate power would not extend to all, but to some, cases. If state tribunals might exercise concurrent jurisdiction over all or some of the other classes of cases in the Constitution without control, then the appellate jurisdiction of the United States might, as to such cases, have no real existence, contrary to the manifest intent of the Constitution. Under such circumstances, to give effect to the judicial power, it must be construed to be exclusive; and this not only when the casus foederis should arise directly, but when it should arise, incidentally, in cases pending in state courts. This construction would abridge the jurisdiction of such court far more than has been ever contemplated in any Act of Congress.

On the other hand, if, as has been contended, a discretion be vested in Congress to establish, or not to establish, inferior courts at their own pleasure, and Congress should not establish such courts, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court would have nothing to act upon, unless it could act upon cases pending in the state courts. Under such circumstances, it must be held that the appellate power would extend to state courts; for the Constitution is peremptory that it shall extend to certain enumerated cases, which cases could exist in no other courts. Any other construction, upon this supposition, would involve this strange contradiction, that a discretionary power vested in Congress, and which they might rightfully omit to exercise, would defeat the absolute injunctions of the Constitution in relation to the whole appellate power.

But it is plain that the framers of the Constitution did contemplate that cases within the judicial cognizance of the United States not only might but would arise in the state courts, in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction. With this view the sixth article declares, that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution, or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." It is obvious that this obligation is imperative upon the state judges in their official, and not merely in their private, capacities. From the very nature of their judicial duties they would be called upon to pronounce the law applicable to the case in judgment. They were not to decide merely according to the laws or constitution of the state, but according to the Constitution, laws and treaties of the United States—"the supreme law of the land."

A moment's consideration will show us the necessity and propriety of this provision in cases where the jurisdiction of the state courts is unquestionable. Suppose a contract for the payment of money is made between citizens of the same state, and performance thereof is sought in the courts of that state; no person can doubt that the jurisdiction completely and exclusively attaches, in the first instance, to such courts. Suppose at the trial the defendant sets up in his defence a tender under a state law, making paper money a good tender, or a state law, impairing the obligation of such contract, which law, if binding, would defeat the suit. The Constitution of the United States has declared that no state shall make anything but gold or silver coin a tender in payment of debts, or pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts. If Congress shall not have passed a law providing for the removal of such a suit to the courts of the United States, must not the state court proceed to hear and determine it? Can a mere plea in defence be of itself a bar to further proceedings, so as to prohibit an inquiry into its truth or legal propriety, when no other tribunal exists to whom judicial cognizance of such cases is confided? Suppose an indictment for a crime in a state court, and the defendant should allege in his defence that the crime was created by an ex post facto act of the state, must not the state court, in the exercise of a jurisdiction which has already rightfully attached, have a right to pronounce on the validity and sufficiency of the defence? It would be extremely difficult, upon any legal principles, to give a negative answer to these inquiries. Innumerable instances of the same sort might be stated, in illustration of the position; and unless the state courts could sustain jurisdiction in such cases, this clause of the sixth article would be without meaning or effect, and public mischiefs, of a most enormous magnitude, would inevitably ensue.

It must, therefore, be conceded that the Constitution not only contemplated, but meant to provide for cases within the scope of the judicial power of the United States, which might yet depend before state tribunals. It was foreseen that in the exercise of their ordinary jurisdiction, state courts would incidentally take cognizance of cases arising under the Constitution, the laws, and treaties of the United States. Yet to all these cases the judicial power, by the very terms of the Constitution, is to extend. It cannot extend by original jurisdiction if that was already rightfully and exclusively attached in the state courts, which (as has been already shown) may occur; it must, therefore, extend by appellate jurisdiction, or not at all. It would seem to follow that the appellate power of the United States must, in such cases, extend to state tribunals; and if in such cases, there is no reason why it should not equally attach upon all others within the purview of the Constitution.

It has been argued that such an appellate jurisdiction over state courts is inconsistent with the genius of our governments, and the spirit of the Constitution. That the latter was never designed to act upon state sovereignties, but only upon the people, and that, if the power exists, it will materially impair the sovereignty of the states, and the independence of their courts. We cannot yield to the force of this reasoning; it assumes principles which we cannot admit, and draws conclusions to which we do not yield our assent.

It is a mistake that the Constitution was not designed to operate upon states in their corporate capacities. It is crowded with provisions which restrain or annul the sovereignty of the states in some of the highest branches of their prerogatives. The tenth section of the first article contains a long list of disabilities and prohibitions imposed upon the states. Surely, when such essential portions of state sovereignty are taken away, or prohibited to be exercised, it cannot be correctly asserted that the Constitution does not act upon the states. The language of the Constitution is also imperative upon the states as to the performance of many duties. It is imperative upon the state legislatures to make laws prescribing the time, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, and for electors of president and vice-president. And in these, as well as some other cases, congress have a right to revise, amend, or supersede the laws which may be passed by state legislatures. When, therefore, the states are stripped of some of the highest attributes of sovereignty, and the same are given to the United States; when the legislatures of the states are, in some respects, under the control of congress, and in every case are, under the Constitution, bound by the paramount authority of the United States; it is certainly difficult to support the argument that the appellate power over the decisions of state courts is contrary to the genius of our institutions. The courts of the United States can, without question, revise the proceedings of the executive and legislative authorities of the states, and if they are found to be contrary to the Constitution, may declare them to be of no legal validity. Surely, the exercise of the same right over judicial tribunals is not a higher or more dangerous act of sovereign power.

Nor can such a right be deemed to impair the independence of state judges. It is assuming the very ground in controversy to assert that they possess an absolute independence of the United States. In respect to the powers granted to the United States, they are not independent; they are expressly bound to obedience by the letter of the Constitution; and if they should unintentionally transcend their authority, or misconstrue the Constitution, there is no more reason for giving their judgments an absolute and irresistible force, than for giving it to the acts of the other co-ordinate departments of state sovereignty.

The argument urged from the possibility of the abuse of the revising power, is equally unsatisfactory. It is always a doubtful course, to argue against the use or existence of a power, from the possibility of its abuse. It is still more difficult, by such an argument, to engraft upon a general power a restriction which is not to be found in the terms in which it is given. From the very nature of things, the absolute right of decision, in the last resort, must rest somewhere—wherever it may be vested it is susceptible of abuse. In all questions of jurisdiction the inferior or [the] appellate court must pronounce the final judgment; and common sense, as well as legal reasoning, has conferred it upon the latter. * * *

It is further argued, that no great public mischief can result from a construction which shall limit the appellate power of the United States to cases in their own courts: first, because state judges are bound by an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and must be presumed to be men of learning and integrity; and, secondly, because Congress must have an unquestionable right to remove all cases within the scope of the judicial power from the state courts to the courts of the United States, at any time before final judgment, though not after final judgment. As to the first reason—admitting that the judges of the state courts are, and always will be, of as much learning, integrity, and wisdom, as those of the courts of the United States, (which we very cheerfully admit), it does not aid the argument. It is manifest that the Constitution has proceeded upon a theory of its own, and given or withheld powers according to the judgment of the American people, by whom it was adopted. We can only construe its powers, and cannot inquire into the policy or principles which induced the grant of them. The Constitution has presumed (whether rightly or wrongly we do not inquire) that state attachments, state prejudices, state jealousies, and state interests, might sometimes obstruct, or control, or be supposed to obstruct or control, the regular administration of justice. Hence, in controversies between states; between citizens of different states; between citizens claiming grants under different states; between a state and its citizens, or foreigners, and between citizens and foreigners, it enables the parties, under the authority of Congress, to have the controversies heard, tried, and determined before the national tribunals.[51] No other reason than that which has been stated can be assigned, why some, at least, of those cases should not have been left to the cognizance of the state courts. In respect to the other enumerated cases—the cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, cases affecting ambassadors and other public ministers, and cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction—reasons of a higher and more extensive nature, touching the safety, peace, and sovereignty of the nation, might well justify a grant of exclusive jurisdiction.

This is not all. A motive of another kind, perfectly compatible with the most sincere respect for state tribunals, might induce the grant of appellate power over their decisions. That motive is the importance, and even necessity of uniformity of decisions throughout the whole United States, upon all subjects within the purview of the Constitution. Judges of equal learning and integrity, in different states, might differently interpret a statute, or a treaty of the United States, or even the Constitution itself. If there were no revising authority to control these jarring and discordant judgments, and harmonize them into uniformity, the laws, the treaties, and the Constitution of the United States would be different in different states, and might, perhaps, never have precisely the same construction, obligation, or efficacy, in any two states. The public mischiefs that would attend such a state of things would be truly deplorable; and it cannot be believed that they could have escaped the enlightened convention which formed the Constitution. What, indeed, might then have been only prophecy has now become fact; and the appellate jurisdiction must continue to be the only adequate remedy for such evils.

There is an additional consideration, which is entitled to great weight. The Constitution of the United States was designed for the common and equal benefit of all the people of the United States. The judicial power was granted for the same benign and salutary purposes. It was not to be exercised exclusively for the benefit of parties who might be plaintiffs, and would elect the national forum, but also for the protection of defendants who might be entitled to try their rights, or assert their privileges, before the same forum. Yet, if the construction contended for be correct, it will follow, that as the plaintiff may always elect the state court, the defendant may be deprived of all the security which the Constitution intended in aid of his rights. Such a state of things can, in no respect, be considered as giving equal rights. To obviate this difficulty, we are referred to the power which it is admitted Congress possess to remove suits from state courts to the national courts; and this forms the second ground upon which the argument we are considering has been attempted to be sustained.

[51] The ground of jurisdiction in the types of cases enumerated in this sentence is the character of the parties and is independent of the subject matter of the case, while in the type of case of which the principal case, is an example the ground of jurisdiction is solely the so-called "Federal right" irrespective of the character of the parties. See U. S. Const. Art. III, § 2 and Marshall, C. J. in Cohens v. Virginia (1821) 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 264, 378, 5 L. ed. 257.

This power of removal is not to be found in express terms in any part of the Constitution; if it be given, it is only given by implication, as a power necessary and proper to carry into effect some express power. The power of removal is certainly not, in strictness of language; it presupposes an exercise of original jurisdiction to have attached elsewhere. The existence of this power of removal is familiar in courts acting according to the course of the common law in criminal as well as civil cases, and it is exercised before as well as after judgment. But this is always deemed in both cases an exercise of appellate, and not of original jurisdiction. If, then, the right of removal be included in the appellate jurisdiction, it is only because it is one mode of exercising that power, and as Congress is not limited by the Constitution to any particular mode, or time of exercising it, it may authorize a removal either before or after judgment. The time, the process, and the manner, must be subject to its absolute legislative control. A writ of error is, indeed, but a process which removes the record of one court to the possession of another court, and enables the latter to inspect the proceedings, and give such judgment as its own opinion of the law and justice of the case may warrant. There is nothing in the nature of the process which forbids it from being applied, by the legislature, to interlocutory as well as final judgments. And if the right of removal from state courts exists before judgment, because it is included in the appellate power, it must, for the same reason, exist after judgment. And if the appellate power by the Constitution does not include cases pending in state courts, the right of removal, which is but a mode of exercising that power, cannot be applied to them. Precisely the same objections, therefore, exist as to the right of removal before judgment, as after, and both must stand or fall together. Nor, indeed, would the force of the arguments on either side materially vary, if the right of removal were an exercise of original jurisdiction.[52] It would equally trench upon the jurisdiction and independence of state tribunals.

[52] "We may doubt, with counsel, whether such removal before issue or trial can properly be called an exercise of appellate jurisdiction. It may, we think, more properly be regarded as an indirect mode by which the federal court acquires

The remedy, too, of removal of suits would be utterly inadequate to the purposes of the Constitution, if it could act only on the parties, and not upon the state courts. In respect to criminal prosecutions, the difficulty seems admitted to be insurmountable; and in respect to civil suits, there would, in many cases, be rights without corresponding remedies. If state courts should deny the constitutionality of the authority to remove suits from their cognizance, in what manner could they be compelled to relinquish the jurisdiction? In respect to criminal cases, there would at once be an end of all control, and the state decisions would be paramount to the Constitution; and though in civil suits the courts of the United States might act upon the parties, yet the state courts might act in the same way; and this conflict of jurisdictions would not only jeopardize private rights, but bring into imminent peril the public interests.

On the whole, the court are of opinion, that the appellate power of the United States does extend to cases pending in the state courts; and that the 25th section of the Judiciary Act, which authorizes the exercise of this jurisdiction in the specified cases, by a writ of error, is supported by the letter and spirit of the Constitution. We find no clause in that instrument which limits this power; and we dare not interpose a limitation where the people have not been disposed to create one.

Strong as this conclusion stands upon the general language of the Constitution, it may still derive support from other sources. It is an historical fact, that this exposition of the Constitution, extending its appellate power to state courts, was, previous to its adoption, uniformly and publicly avowed by its friends, and admitted by its enemies, as the basis of their respective reasonings, both in and out of the state conventions. It is an historical fact, that at the time when the Judiciary Act was submitted to the deliberations of the first Congress, composed, as it was, not only of men of great learning and ability, but of men who had acted a principal part in framing, supporting, or opposing that Constitution, the same exposition was explicitly declared and admitted by the friends and by the opponents of that system. It is an historical fact, that the Supreme Court of the United States have, from time to time, sustained this appellate jurisdiction in a great variety of cases, brought from the tribunals of many of the most important states in the Union, and that no state tribunal has ever breathed a judicial original jurisdiction of the causes. But it is not material whether the reasoning of the distinguished jurist [Justice Story] in this particular is correct or otherwise. The validity of such legislation has been uniformly recognized by this court since the passage of the Judiciary Act of 1789." Field, J., for the Court, in Railway Co. v. Whitton's Admr. (1871) 13 Wall. (U. S.) 270, 287, 20 L. ed. 571.

"It is the essential criterion of appellate jurisdiction that it revises and corrects the proceedings in a cause already instituted and does not create that cause." Marshall, C. J., in Marbury v. Madison (1803) 1 Cranch (U. S.) 137, 175, 176, 2 L. ed. 60.

doubt on the subject, or declined to obey the mandate of the Supreme Court, until the present occasion. This weight of contemporaneous exposition by all parties, this acquiescence of enlightened state courts, and these judicial decisions of the Supreme Court through so long a period, do, as we think, place the doctrine upon a foundation of authority which cannot be shaken, without delivering over the subject to perpetual and irremediable doubts. * * *

It is the opinion of the whole court, that the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, rendered on the mandate in this cause, be reversed, and the judgment of the District Court, held at Winchester,[53] be, and the same is hereby affirmed. [The concurring opinion of Johnson, J., is omitted.][54]

[53] Instead of issuing a second mandate to the Virginia Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court to avoid further friction issued its process directly to the state district court in which the suit originated. 1 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History, (1922) p. 450. Similar situations with like action appear in Tyler v. Magwire (1873) 17 Wall. (U. S.) 253, 21 L. ed. 576 and in Williams v. Bruffy (1880) 102 U. S. 248, 26 L. ed. 135.

[54] Likewise a prosecution by a state of an alleged crime against the state is within the judicial power of the United States to review if its correct decision depends upon the interpretation of the Constitution, statutes or treaties of the United States. Included therein are any questions which the state court is called upon to decide with reference to the validity relative to the Constitution of the United States of legislative or other governmental acts state or federal. So decided upon reasoning similar to that of the principal case, in Cohens v. Virginia (1821) 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 264, 5 L. ed. 257, notwithstanding the contention of counsel that the fact that in a criminal prosecution the State is in a sense a party presented a greater difficulty. This and the principal case firmly established the Supreme Court of the United States as having judicial power to act as the final arbiter in all justiciable questions of constitutionality relative to the constitution of the United States. The method of removal for review specifically involved in these cases was that prescribed by Section 25 of the Judiciary Act of 1789, namely by writ of error after a judgment has been obtained in the highest court of the state to which the case can be carried. The present jurisdiction and procedure of the federal courts is a subject for separate study. It depends much on legislation, some of which is recent. Bunn, A Brief Survey of the Jurisdiction and Practice of the Courts of the United States is a good introduction. The student should note carefully that the constitutional range of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is subject to restriction "under such regulations as the Congress shall make." U. S. Const., Art. III, § 2, paragraph 2. See Ex parte McCardle (1869) 7 Wall. (U. S.) 506, 19 L. ed. 264 for a striking illustration. Moreover, the whole range of original and appellate power which might constitutionally be exercised by inferior courts of the United States may not be, and has not been, given them, for Congress in exercising its power "to ordain and establish" them has so far created them with less than their constitutionally permissible jurisdiction. Thus, on the question mooted in the principal case, as to removal before judgment of criminal cases in State courts to Federal courts involving any federal question, after comment on the language of Justice Story, supra, p. 56, it has been said: "It ought, therefore, to be considered as settled that the constitutional powers of Congress to authorize the removal of criminal cases for alleged offences against state laws from state courts to the circuit [now District] courts of the United States, when there arises a federal question in them, is as ample as its power to authorize the removal of a civil case. * * * The circuit [now District] courts of the United States have all the appliances which are needed for the trial of any criminal case. They adopt and apply the laws of the state in civil cases, and there is no more difficulty in administering the state's criminal law. They are not foreign courts. The Constitution has made them courts within the states to administer the laws of

WHITNEY v. PEOPLE OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

1927. Supreme Court of the United States. 274 U. S. 357.

In Error to the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division 1, of the State of California.

Charlotte Anita Whitney was convicted of violating the California Criminal Syndicalism Act, and to review a judgment of the District Court of Appeal (57 Cal. App. 449, 207 P. 698), she brings error. On reargument, order (269 U. S. 530, 46 S. Ct. 22, 70 L. ed. 396) dismissing writ of error vacated and set aside, and judgment affirmed.

It has long been settled that this Court acquires no jurisdiction to review the judgment of a state court of last resort on a writ of error, unless it affirmatively appears on the face of the record that a federal question constituting an appropriate ground for such review was presented in and expressly or necessarily decided by such state court. Crowell v. Randell, 10 Pet. 368, 392; Railroad Co. v. Rock, 4 Wall. 177, 180; California Powder Works v. Davis, 151 U. S. 389, 393; Cincinnati, etc., Railway v. Slade, 216 U. S. 78, 83; Hiawassee Power Co. v. Carolina-Tenn. Co., 252 U. S. 341, 343; New York v. Kleinert, 268 U. S. 646, 650.

Here the record does not show that the defendant raised or that the State courts considered or decided any federal question whatever, excepting as appears in an order made and entered by the Court of Appeal after it had decided the case and the writ of error had issued and been returned to this Court. A certified copy of that order, brought here as an addition to the record, shows that it the states in certain cases; and, so long as they keep within the jurisdiction assigned to them, their general powers are adequate to the trial of any case. The supposed anomaly of prosecuting offenders against the peace and dignity of a state, in tribunals of the general government, grows entirely out of the division of powers between that government and the government of a state; that is, a division of sovereignty over certain matters. When this is understood (and it is time it should be), it will not appear strange that, even in cases of criminal prosecutions for alleged offences against a state, in which arises a defense under United States law, the general government should take cognizance of the case and try it in its own courts, according to its own forms of proceeding." Tennessee v. Davis (1879) 100 U. S. 257, 269, 271, 25 L. ed. 648.

The act of Congress specifically passed upon in the cited case provided for removal "before trial or final hearing" of only a narrow class of state criminal prosecutions (Rev. St. § 643) involving federal right and while other special classes have since been added, U. S. C. title 28, §§ 74, 76, the removal before judgment does not yet extend to the more common types of cases involving the constitutionality of legislation. In general such cases are only removable after judgment in the highest state court to which the case can be taken.

The complex difficulties of a federal court substituting itself as the trial court of alleged crimes against a state are pointed out in the dissenting opinion of Clifford, J. in Tennessee v. Davis, at pp. 297-299. See the tentative opinion as to how these difficulties may be met, in State v. Felts (1904) 133 Fed. 85.

was made and entered pursuant to a stipulation of the parties, approved by the court, and that it contains the following statement:

> "The question whether the California Criminal Syndicalism Act * * * and its application in this case is repugnant to the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, and that all persons shall be accorded the equal protection of the laws, was considered and passed upon by this Court."

In Cincinnati Packet Co. v. Bay, 200 U. S. 179, 182, where it appeared that a federal question had been presented in a petition in error to the State Supreme Court in a case in which the judgment was affirmed without opinion, it was held that the certificate of that court to the effect that it had considered and necessarily decided this question, was sufficient to show its existence. And see Marvin v. Trout, 199 U. S. 212, 217, et seq.; Consolidated Turnpike v. Norfolk, etc., Railway, 228 U. S. 596, 599.

So—while the unusual course here taken to show that federal questions were raised and decided below is not to be commended—we shall give effect to the order of the Court of Appeal as would be done if the statement had been made in the opinion of that court when delivered. See [a list of cases].

And here, since it appears from the statement in the order of the Court of Appeal that the question whether the Syndicalism Act and its application in this case was repugnant to the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, was considered and passed upon by that court—this being a Federal question constituting an appropriate ground for a review of the judgment—we conclude that this Court has acquired jurisdiction under the writ of error. The order dismissing the writ for want of jurisdiction will accordingly be set aside.

We proceed to the determination, upon the merits, of the constitutional question considered and passed upon by the Court of Appeal. Of course our review is to be confined to that question, since it does not appear, either from the order of the Court of Appeal or from the record otherwise, that any other Federal question was presented in and either expressly or necessarily decided by that court. National Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wall. 353, 363; Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall. 532, 557; Dewey v. Des Moines, 173 U. S. 193, 200; Keokuk & Hamilton Bridge Co. v. Illinois, 175 U. S. 626, 633; Capital City Dairy Co. v. Ohio, 183 U. S. 238, 248; Haire v. Rice, 204 U. S. 291, 301; Selover, Bates & Co. v. Walsh, 226 U. S. 112, 126; Missouri Pacific Railway v. Coal Co., 256 U. S. 134, 135. It is not enough that there may be somewhere hidden in the record a question which, if it had been raised, would have been of a federal nature. Dewey v. Des Moines, supra, 199; Keokuk & Hamilton Bridge Co. v. Illinois, supra, 634. And this necessarily excludes from our consideration a question sought to be raised for the first time by the assignments of error here—not presented in or passed upon by the Court of Appeal—whether apart from the constitutionality of the Syndicalism Act, the judgment of the Superior Court, by reason of the rulings of that court on questions of pleading, evidence and the like, operated as a denial to the defendant of due process of law. See Oxley Stave Co. v. Butler County, 166 U. S. 648, 660; Capital City Dairy Co. v. Ohio, supra, 248; Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Cohen, 234 U. S. 123, 134; Bass, etc., Ltd. v. Tax Commission, 266 U. S. 271, 283.

FLETCHER v. PECK.

1810. Supreme Court of the United States. 6 Cranch 87.

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, in an action of covenant brought by Fletcher against Peck. * * *

Marshall, C. J. delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

The pleadings being now amended, this cause comes on again to be heard on sundry demurrers, and on a special verdict.

The suit was instituted on several covenants contained in a deed made by John Peck, the defendant in error, conveying to Robert Fletcher, the plaintiff in error, certain lands which were part of a large purchase made by James Gunn and others, in the year 1795, from the State of Georgia, the contract for which was made in the form of a bill passed by the legislature of that state.

The first count in the declaration set forth a breach in the second covenant contained in the deed. The covenant is, "that the legislature of the State of Georgia, at the time of passing the Act of sale aforesaid, had good right to sell and dispose of the same in manner pointed out by the said Act." The breach assigned is, that the legislature had no power to sell.

The plea in bar sets forth the constitution of the State of Georgia, and avers that the lands sold by the defendant to the plaintiff, were within that state. It then sets forth the granting Act, and avers the power of the legislature to sell and dispose of the premises as pointed out by the act.

To this plea the plaintiff below demurred, and the defendant joined in demurrer.

That the legislature of Georgia, unless restrained by its own constitution, possesses the power of disposing of the unappropriated lands within its own limits, in such manner as its own judgment shall dictate, is a proposition not to be controverted. The only question, then, presented by this demurrer, for the consideration of the court, is this, did the then constitution of the State of Georgia prohibit the legislature to dispose of the lands, which were the subject of this contract, in the manner stipulated by the contract?

The question, whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the constitution, is, at all times, a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative, in a doubtful case. The court, when impelled by duty to render such a judgment, would be unworthy of its station, could it be unmindful of the solemn obligations which that station imposes. But it is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts to be considered as void. The opposition between the constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other.

In this case the court can perceive no such opposition. In the constitution of Georgia, adopted in the year 1789, the court can perceive no restriction on the legislative power, which inhibits the passage of the Act of 1795. They cannot say that, in passing that Act, the legislature has transcended its powers, and violated the constitution.[55]

In overruling the demurrer, therefore, to the first plea, the circuit court committed no error.

The third covenant is, that all the title which the State of Georgia ever had in the premises had been legally conveyed to John Peck, the grantor.

The second count assigns, in substance, as a breach of this covenant, that the original grantees from the State of Georgia promised and assured divers members of the legislature, then sitting in general assembly, that if the said members would assent to, and vote for, the passing of the Act, and if the said bill should pass, such members should have a share of, and be interested in, all the lands purchased from the said state by virtue of such law. And that divers of the said members, to whom the said promises were made, were unduly influenced thereby, and, under such influence, did vote for the passing of the said bill; by reason whereof the said law was a nullity, &c. and so the title of the State of Georgia did not pass to the said Peck, &c.

[55] The student should consider the phenomenon of an inferior federal court or the Supreme Court passing upon the validity of a state statute relative to the state's constitution. (That issue alone will not give a federal court jurisdiction, but it may have jurisdiction of the case because of the character of the parties, or because there is a "federal question" in the case.) Is it assumed in the principal case that even without express grant it is a function of every court in all circumstances to refuse application to a statute unauthorized or in conflict with a constitution under which it is enacted? Compare with this part of the principal case those which come to the Supreme Court through writs of error or certiorari to judgments of state courts of last resort where for instance the validity of a statute has been put in issue on a claim that it violates both the state and the national constitution. If the state court of last resort has held that the statute does not violate the state constitution the Supreme Court of the United States will not consider that question.

Does it help to say that in several situations a federal court is substituted in the place of a state court to decide an issue in which the law of a state is the whole or a part of the law of the case? Suppose the law of New York is the proper law in a case pending in an English court and a New York statute is proved applicable but challenged by the contention that it conflicts either with the constitution of New York or that of the United States, though no American court has yet passed on that question, will the English court consider it?

The plea to this count, after protesting that the promises it alleges were not made, avers, that until after the purchase made from the original grantees by James Greenleaf, under whom the said Peck claims, neither the said James Greenleaf, nor the said Peck, nor any of the mesne vendors between the said Greenleaf and Peck, had any notice or knowledge that any such promises or assurances were made by the said original grantees, or either of them, to any of the members of the legislature of the State of Georgia.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred generally, and the defendant joined in the demurrer.

That corruption should find its way into the governments of our infant republics, and contaminate the very source of legislation, or that impure motives should contribute to the passage of a law, or the formation of a legislative contract, are circumstances most deeply to be deplored. How far a court of justice would, in any case, be competent, on proceedings instituted by the state itself, to vacate a contract thus formed, and to annul rights acquired under that contract, by third persons having no notice of the improper means by which it was obtained, is a question which the court would approach with much circumspection. It may well be doubted how far the validity of a law depends upon the motives of its framers, and how far the particular inducements, operating on members of the supreme sovereign power of a state, to the formation of a contract by that power, are examinable in a court of justice. If the principle be conceded, that an act of the supreme sovereign power might be declared null by a court, in consequence of the means which procured it, still would there be much difficulty in saying to what extent those means must be applied to produce this effect. Must it be direct corruption, or would interest or undue influence of any kind be sufficient? Must the vitiating cause operate on a majority, or on what number of the members? Would the act be null, whatever might be the wish of the nation, or would its obligation or nullity depend upon the public sentiment?

If the majority of the legislature be corrupted, it may well be doubted whether it be within the province of the judiciary to control their conduct, and, if less than a majority act from impure motives, the principle by which judicial interference would be regulated is not clearly discerned.

Whatever difficulties this subject might present when viewed under aspects of which it may be susceptible, this court can perceive none in the particular pleadings now under consideration.

This is not a bill brought by the State of Georgia to annul the contract, nor does it appear to the court, by this count, that the state of Georgia is dissatisfied with the sale that has been made. The case, as made out in the pleadings, is simply this. One individual who holds lands in the State of Georgia, under a deed covenanting that the title of Georgia was in the grantor, brings an action of covenant upon this deed, and assigns, as a breach, that some of the members of the legislature were induced to vote in favor of the law which constituted the contract, by being promised an interest in it, and that therefore the act is a mere nullity.

This solemn question cannot be brought thus collaterally and incidentally before the court. It would be indecent in the extreme, upon a private contract between two individuals, to enter into an inquiry respecting the corruption of the sovereign power of a state. If the title be plainly deduced from a legislative act, which the legislature might constitutionally pass, if the act be clothed with all the requisite forms of a law, a court, sitting as a court of law, cannot sustain a suit brought by one individual against another founded on the allegation that the act is a nullity, in consequence of the impure motives which influenced certain members of the legislature which passed the law.[56]

The Circuit Court, therefore, did right in overruling this demurrer.

The fourth covenant in the deed is, that the title to the premises has been in no way constitutionally or legally impaired by virtue of any subsequent act of any subsequent legislature of the state of Georgia.

The third count recites the undue means practised on certain members of the legislature, as stated in the second count, and then alleges that, in consequence of these practices and of other causes, a subsequent legislature passed an act annulling and rescinding the law under which the conveyance to the original grantees was made, declaring that conveyance void, and asserting the title of the state to the lands it contained. The count proceeds to recite at large this rescinding act, and concludes with averring that, by reason of this act, the title of the said Peck in the premises was constitutionally and legally impaired, and rendered null and void. * * * [The court held that this rescinding Act could not operate (at least not against Peck who was a purchaser for value without notice of the fraud practiced in procuring the original grant) without violating the prohibition of the United States Constitution that, "no state shall * * * pass any * * * law impairing the obligation of contracts", Article I Section 10. That it is the function of a federal court to refuse effect to a state statute in these circumstances[57] is not reasoned about unless it be in the following passages:] She [Georgia] is a part of a large empire; she is a member of the American union; and that union has a Constitution the supremacy of which all acknowledge, and which imposes limits to the legislatures of the several states, which none claim a right to pass. * * *

[56] "If the Court had acceded to the contention that a state statute could be invalidated by a federal tribunal [or any other court], on allegations of fraud or bribery in its passage, a wide door would have been opened for the attack upon state legislation in countless instances in subsequent years." 1 Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History (1922), p. 397, and see the same pp. 392-399 for the great contemporary significance of this case.

Whatever respect might have been felt for the state sovereignties, it is not to be disguised that the framers of the Constitution viewed, with some apprehension, the violent acts which might grow out of the feelings of the moment; and that the people of the United States, in adopting that instrument, have manifested a determination to shield themselves and their property from the effects of those sudden and strong passions to which men are exposed. The restrictions on the legislative power of the states are obviously founded in this sentiment; and the Constitution of the United States contains what may be deemed a bill of rights for the people of each state.

No state shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts.

A bill of attainder may affect the life of an individual, or may confiscate his property, or may do both.

In this form the power of the legislature over the lives and fortunes of individuals is expressly restrained.

[The reasons for holding that the rescinding act conflicted with Article I, Section 10 will be considered in a later chapter.]

PEOPLE v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

1921. Supreme Court of Colorado. 70 Colo. 90.

In this cause an information was filed in the trial court against the defendants, charging them with a violation of chapter 5, Session Laws of 1911, known as "The Anti-Coercion Act," in that as a condition to the continued employment of one Holson they required of him a contract that he sever his connection with the Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America, and upon his refusal to comply discharged him. To this information defendants demurred on the ground that "the Anti-Coercion Act" was unconstitutional under the Bill of Rights of the State of Colorado and the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. To the consideration of this issue the people objected on the ground that such consideration was prohibited by amended sec. 1, art. VI, of the state Constitution.

[57] This is the first case in which the Supreme Court did so. For earlier instances of its being done by inferior federal courts, see ante, pp. 33-35.

The objection was overruled, "the Anti-Coercion Act" held in conflict with the federal Constitution, and final judgment entered discharging defendants and releasing their bondsmen. To review that judgment the people bring this cause here. * * *

Burke, J., after stating the facts as above.

Three questions are here presented: The right of the trial court to hear and determine the federal constitutional question; the correctness of its judgment; and the date when our decision becomes effective. * * *

That this [Anti-Coercion] act is a plain violation of the federal Constitution has been clearly determined by the Supreme Court of the United States. Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1. In that case a decision of the supreme court of Kansas was reversed, and a statute of that state, in all material particulars identical with the one here under consideration, was declared a violation of the "due process" clause of the United States Constitution. Having determined that this cause was correctly decided below, it may be said that the constitutionality of the "Anti-Coercion Act" has now, at least, been passed upon by a court having jurisdiction, and it is therefore unnecessary to consider the objection of the people to the hearing on the demurrer. If so the same situation would be presented had we held the act constitutional. Since the passage of the amendment to sec. 1, art. VI, we have assumed the correctness of that rule. However, there has arisen such a disparity of opinion in our trial courts concerning their power to determine constitutional questions, and such a resulting confusion among members of the bar concerning the practice, that it now becomes our imperative duty, under sec. 2, art. VI, of our state Constitution, which vests in the supreme court "a general superintending control over all inferior courts," to construe sec. 1, art. VI, with reference to the power of such courts where federal constitutional questions are involved.

The jurisdiction of the district court in the premises, prior to January 22, 1913, is undisputed, and is too well settled in this country to admit of argument or require the citation of authority. On that date (if ever) said section 1 became effective. It specifies the courts in which the judicial power of the state shall be vested, and then provides:

"None of said courts except the Supreme Court shall have any power to declare or adjudicate any law of this state or any city charter or amendment thereto adopted by the people in cities acting under Article XX hereof as in violation of the constitution of this state or of the United States." * * * ["Provided that before such decision shall be binding it shall be subject to approval or disapproval by the people. * * * All such laws or parts thereof submitted as herein provided when approved by a majority of the votes cast thereon at such election shall be and become the law of this state notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court."

"All such charters, or amendments thereto, so submitted as herein provided, when approved by a majority of the votes cast thereon in said city or city and county, shall be and become the law of this state and of said city or city and county notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court."]

Paragraph 2, art. VI, of the Constitution of the United States provides:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." * * *

It is said that, notwithstanding the provision of the federal Constitution, above cited, the trial judge was precluded by amended sec. 1 of article VI of the state Constitution from passing upon the question raised by the demurrer. The answer is that the trial judge was bound by the mandate of the federal Constitution to apply that instrument upon all proper occasions and to hold it to be the supreme law of the land "anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." It is said that the judge's oath to support the Constitution of Colorado bound him to give effect to that clause thereof prohibiting him from declaring a legislative act contrary to the federal Constitution. The answer is that any section of the state constitution which is contrary to the federal Constitution is, for that reason and to that extent, null and void. It is no part of the state constitution, and no legerdemain of logic can cover it with the sanctity of a judge's oath.

The reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. Ed. 60, 1 U. S. Decisions, 368, is as applicable to a state constitutional provision which violates the federal Constitution as it is to a federal statute which violates that instrument; and his reasoning from the standpoint of the judicial oath as unanswerable here as there. It follows that the trial court in the instant case had the right, and it was its bounden duty, to determine the federal constitutional question raised by the demurrer. * * *

There is no sovereignty in a state to set at naught the Constitution of the Union, and no power in its people to command their courts to do so. That issue was finally settled at Appomattox. When a federal constitutional question is raised in any of the trial courts of Colorado the right is given, and the duty is imposed upon those courts, by that instrument itself, to adjudicate and determine it. That right so given can neither be taken away nor that duty abrogated by the state of Colorado, by constitutional provision or otherwise, and any attempt to do so is null and void. Such pretended constitutional inhibition is no part of the Constitution of the state of Colorado, and the judge's oath binding him to the support and enforcement of that instrument has no relation to such void provisions. The question may be brought by writ of error to this court for review, and from our judgment the cause may be taken for final determination to the Supreme Court of the United States itself. It cannot be reviewed by popular vote of the citizens of Colorado, or one of its municipalities, and any pretended constitutional provision of this state, assuming to provide such method of review is null and void. * * *

It is to be observed that the validity of said amended sec. 1, art. VI, so far as it prohibits trial courts from holding statutes and city charters to be in violation of the state Constitution, and assumes to provide a method of recalling decisions of the supreme court so holding, is not herein determined.[58] * * * The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

WILSON v. CITY OF FARGO.

1921. Supreme Court of North Dakota. 48 N. Dak. 447.

[Article 25 of the amendments to the constitution of North Dakota amended section 89 thereof (see Laws 1919, p. 503) so that amended it reads as follows:

[58] In People v. Max, 70 Colo. 100, 198 Pac. 150, decided the same day, the court considered these questions and held that these amendments to the state constitution were void also in their attempt to take away the previous power of state trial courts to pass upon the validity of state statutes relative to the state constitution, (1) because these new provisions of the constitution dealt with federal and state constitutionality of state statutes inseparably and their invalidity as to the former caused them to be invalid as a whole. [The student should compare other cases of "separability" and "inseparability"]; (2) that to deprive a trial court in a criminal prosecution of power to consider a defense that a statute which the defendant was accused of violating was inoperative

"The Supreme Court shall consist of five judges, a majority of whom shall be necessary to form a quorum or pronounce a decision * * * provided, however, that in no case shall any legislative enactment or law of the State of North Dakota be declared unconstitutional unless at least four of the judges shall so decide."

This is an appeal from the dismissal of a suit to enjoin holding an election on the ground that the state statute which in terms provided for the election had not been enacted in conformity with (1) section 58 of the state constitution: No bill shall be so altered on its passage through either house as to change its original purpose, and (2) section 61: No bill shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title.]

BIRDZELL, J. (Speaking for the majority of the court). Immediately after the submission of this case the members of the court, recognizing the practical necessity for an early decision, carefully considered the questions involved, and within a few days after the arguments a tentative opinion was prepared by the writer of this opinion. The controlling principles therein stated were promptly agreed to by a majority of the judges. Later Mr. Chief Justice Grace and Mr. Justice Robinson filed opinions upholding the constitutionality of the act in question. Under section 89 of the constitution as amended, and under the rule of decision in such cases announced by this court in Daly v. Beery, 45 N. Dak. 287, 178 N. W. 104, the votes of the two members control the decision. * * * [In the cited case the same judge said:

"There is no way to give effect to this constitutional provision unless the members of this court respect it as a part of the fundamental law by directing a judgment to be entered in individual cases which may not conform to their views as to what the judgment should be."][59]

ROBINSON, J., (concurring with GRACE, C. J.) * * *

That amendment [25] is a rebuke to the courts for having gone too far in declaring statutes to be void because of defects in the title or procedure. * * * Manifestly it is in no way seemly or proper for a justice of the peace, a trial judge or even a majority of because violative of the state constitution would cause the trial to be lacking in that "due process of law" required by Amendment XIV of the federal Constitution, Query; (3) that the provision for popular recall of the state Supreme Court's decisions in like cases would also violate Amendment XIV, Query.

[59] Cf. De Witt v. State ex rel. Crabbe (1923) 108 Ohio St. 513, 533, 535, 141 N. E. 551, where five of seven judges thought plaintiff should not get judgment for a heavy penalty because in their opinion the statute which was the sole authority for allowing it violated the equal protection and due process clauses of the state and federal Constitutions, but that he was entitled to it was declared to be the law of the case because the other two judges held the statute valid (Article IV, § 2 of the Ohio Constitution: No law shall be held unconstitutional and void by the supreme court without the concurrence of at least all but one of the judges, except in the affirmance of a judgment of the court of appeals declaring a law unconstitutional and void).

the Supreme Court to override and declare void a statute passed by the unanimous vote of the legislature, and pursuant to a great popular demand, because forsooth of a mere procedural defect in the passage of the bill. * * *[60]

Section 2.—When and How the Function Will Be Exercised.

STATE v. FIRST STATE BANK OF JUD.

1925. Supreme Court of North Dakota. 52 N. Dak. 231.

Christianson, J. * * * The sole question presented and argued on the appeal is, "Is chapter 137, Laws 1923, unconstitutional?" * * * In other words, the question for the court to determine is not merely whether the statute is in conflict with the Constitution; but whether it is within the limits of reason for the Legislature to give to the Constitution the construction it has given to it in enacting the statute. 1 Willoughby, Const. Law p. 21.

In State ex rel. Linde v. Taylor, 33 N. Dak. 76, 85, 86, this court said:

"Every reasonable presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of a statute enacted by the legislature. * * * This presumption is conclusive, unless it is clearly shown that the enactment is prohibited by the Constitution of the state or of the United States. * * * The only test of the validity of an act regularly passed by a state legislature is whether it violates any of the express or implied restrictions of the state or federal constitutions.[1] * * * And he who alleges a statute to be unconstitutional must be able to point to the particular constitutional provision violated. * * *"

[60] "Sections 58 and 61 of the constitution run along similar lines. Both were designed to prevent certain pernicious practices which experience had taught would spring up where such provisions did not exist. They were placed in the Constitution to insure better legislation.

"In considering a constitutional provision similar to section 61, the Supreme Court of Michigan, speaking through the great jurist, Cooley, said: 'The history and purpose of this constitutional provision are too well understood to require any elucidation at our hands. The practice of bringing together into one bill subjects diverse in their nature, and having no necessary connection, with a view to combine in their favor the advocates of all, and thus secure the passage of several measures, no one of which could succeed upon its own merits, was one both corruptive of the legislator and dangerous to the state. It was scarcely more so, however, than another practice, also intended to be remedied by this provision, by which, through dexterous management, clauses were inserted in bills of which the titles gave no intimation, and their passage secured through legislative bodies whose members were not generally aware of their intention and effect. There was no design by this clause to embarrass legislation by making laws unnecessarily restrictive in their scope and operation, and thus multiplying their number; but the framers of the constitution meant to put an end to legislation of the vicious character referred to, which was little less than a fraud upon the public, and to require that in every case the proposed measure should stand upon its own merits, and that the legislature should be fairly satisfied of its design when required to pass upon it.' People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481." Christianson, C. J., in Daly v. Beery (1920) 45 N. Dak. 287, 178 N. W. 104, 114.

In considering whether the legislature transcended its constitutional powers in the enactment of a statute it is, also, well to bear in mind the fundamental difference between the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the state of North Dakota, as regards the legislative powers which may be exercised under them.

Cooley (Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 242) said:

"We look in the Constitution of the United States for grants of legislative power, but in the constitution of the state to ascertain if any limitations have been imposed upon the complete power with which the legislative department of the state was vested in its creation. * * *

Under the Constitution of this state "all governmental power is vested in the legislature, except such as is granted to the other departments of the government, or expressly withheld from the legislature by constitutional restrictions." State ex rel. Standish v. Boucher, 3 N. Dak. 389, 396; O'Laughlin v. Carlson, 30 N. Dak. 213; State ex rel. Linde v. Taylor, supra. * * *

But, says the appellant, the legislature, by the act in question here, purported to confer upon the Supreme Court original jurisdiction of all actions for the liquidation of insolvent banking corporations; and such actions are not within the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as that jurisdiction is granted and defined by the constitution. A sufficient answer to the contention thus advanced is that the provisions of said chapter 137, which authorize and request the Supreme Court to assume original jurisdiction of actions for the liquidation of insolvent banking corporations, have not been put into force. The Supreme Court has not assumed jurisdiction of such actions. The jurisdiction of such actions has been assumed by the district court of Burleigh County in conformity with section 18 of said chapter 137. The instant case is pending in that court, and the order before us was entered by that court, after full hearing had therein; and such order is brought before this court for review under the provisions of said chapter 137, authorizing the review of orders of the district court in such cases. In these circumstances appellant is not concerned with the validity of the provisions of chapter 137, authorizing the Supreme Court to assume original jurisdiction (Avent v. United States, 266 U. S. 127), and cannot be heard to question their validity. "A litigant can be heard to question the validity of a statute only when, and in so far as, it is applied to his disadvantage." State ex rel. Hughes v. Milhollan, 50 N. Dak. 184; Rindge Co. v. Los Angeles County, 262 U. S. 700; Avent v. United States, supra. * * *

[1] In Betholf v. O'Reilly (1878), 74 N. Y. 509, 514, 516, 30 Am. Rep. 323, Andrews, J. (for the court), said: "The question whether the act under consideration is a valid exercise of legislative power is to be determined solely by reference to constitutional restraints and prohibitions. The legislative power has no other limitation. If an act can stand when brought to the test of the Constitution the question of its validity is at an end, and neither the executive or judicial department of the government can refuse to recognize or enforce it. The theory that laws may be declared void when deemed to be opposed to natural justice and equity, although they do not violate any constitutional provision, has some support in the dicta of learned judges, but has not been approved, so far as we know, by any authoritative adjudication, and is repudiated by numerous authorities. Indeed, under the broad and liberal interpretation now given to constitutional guaranties, there can be no violation of fundamental rights by legislation which will not fall within the express or implied prohibition and restraints of the Constitution, and it is unnecessary to seek for principles outside of the Constitution, under which such legislation may be condemned. * * *

"Admitting, as we do, the soundness of this view, and fully approving it, we come back to the proposition that no law can be pronounced invalid, for the reason simply that it violates our notions of justice, is oppressive and unfair in its operation, or because, in the opinion of some or all of the citizens of the State, it is not justified by public necessity, or designed to promote the public welfare. We repeat, if it violates no constitutional provision, it is valid and must be obeyed. The remedy for unjust or unwise legislation, not obnoxious to constitutional objections, is to be found in a change by the people of their representatives, according to the methods provided by the Constitution."

MUSKRAT v. UNITED STATES.

1911. Supreme Court of the United States. 219 U. S. 346.

MR. JUSTICE DAY delivered the opinion of the court.

These cases arise under an act of Congress undertaking to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims, and upon this court on appeal, to determine the validity of certain acts of Congress hereinafter referred to. * * *

These proceedings were begun under the supposed authority of an act of Congress passed March 1, 1907 (a part of the Indian appropriation bill), c. 2285, 34 Stat. 1015, 1028. As that legislation is important in this connection so much of the act as authorized the beginning of these suits is here inserted in full:

"That William Brown and Levi B. Gritts, on their own behalf and on behalf of all other Cherokee citizens, having like interests in the property allotted under the act of July first, nineteen hundred and two, entitled 'An act to provide for the allotment of lands of the Cherokee Nation, for the disposition of townsites therein, and for other purposes,' and David Muskrat and J. Henry Dick, on their own behalf, and on behalf of all Cherokee citizens enrolled as such for allotment as of September first, nineteen hundred and two, be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to institute their suits in the Court of Claims to determine the validity of any acts of Congress passed since the said act of July first, nineteen hundred and two, in so far as said acts, or any of them, attempt to increase or extend the restrictions upon alienation, encumbrance, or the right to lease the allotments of lands of Cherokee citizens, or to increase the number of persons entitled to share in the final distribution of lands and funds of the Cherokees beyond those enrolled for allotment as of September first, nineteen hundred and two, and provided for in the said act of July first, nineteen hundred and two.

"And jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal, by either party, to the Supreme Court of the United States, to hear, determine, and adjudicate each of said suits.

"The suits brought hereunder shall be brought on or before September first, nineteen hundred and seven, against the United States as a party defendant, and, for the speedy disposition of the questions involved, preference shall be given to the same by said courts, and by the Attorney General, who is hereby charged with the defense of said suits.

"Upon the rendition of final judgment by the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court of the United States denying the validity of any portion of the said acts authorized to be brought into question, in either or both of said cases, the Court of Claims shall determine the amount to be paid the attorneys employed by the above-named parties in the prosecution thereof for services and expenses, and shall render judgment therefor, which shall be paid out of the funds in the United States Treasury belonging to the beneficiaries under the said act of July first, nineteen hundred and two."

This act is the authority for the maintenance of these two suits.

The first question in these cases, as in others, involves the jurisdiction of this court to entertain the proceeding, and that depends upon whether the jurisdiction conferred is within the power of Congress, having in view the limitations of the judicial power as established by the Constitution of the United States.

Section 1 of Article III of the Constitution provides:

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

Section 2 of the same Article provides:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority;—to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls;—to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;—to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States;—between a State and citizens of another State;—between citizens of different States;—between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens or subjects."

* * * It therefore becomes necessary to inquire what is meant by the judicial power thus conferred by the Constitution upon this court, and with the aid of appropriate legislation upon the inferior courts of the United States. * * *

As we have already seen by the express terms of the Constitution, the exercise of the judicial power is limited to "cases" and "controversies." Beyond this it does not extend, and unless it is asserted in a case or controversy within the meaning of the Constitution, the power to exercise it is nowhere conferred. * * *

The power being thus limited to require an application of the judicial power to cases and controversies, is the act which undertook to authorize the present suits to determine the constitutional validity of certain legislation within the constitutional authority of the court? This inquiry in the case before us includes the broader question, When may this court, in the exercise of the judicial power, pass upon the constitutional validity of an act of Congress? That question has been settled from the early history of the court, the leading case on the subject being Marbury v. Madison, supra.

In that case Chief Justice Marshall, who spoke for the court, was careful to point out that the right to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional could only be exercised when a proper case between opposing parties was submitted for judicial determination; that there was no general veto power in the court upon the legislation of Congress; and that the authority to declare an act unconstitutional sprung from the requirement that the court, in administering the law and pronouncing judgment between the parties to a case, and choosing between the requirements of the fundamental law established by the people and embodied in the Constitution and an act of the agents of the people, acting under authority of the Constitution, should enforce the Constitution as the supreme law of the land. * * *

See also in this connection Chicago & Grand Trunk Railway Company v. Wellman, 143 U. S. 339. On page 345 of the opinion in that case the result of the previous decisions of this court was summarized in these apposite words by Mr. Justice Brewer, who spoke for the court:

"Whenever, in pursuance of an honest and actual antagonistic assertion of rights by one individual against another, there is presented a question involving the validity of any act of any legislature, State or Federal, and the decision necessarily rests on the competency of the legislature to so enact, the court must, in the exercise of its solemn duties, determine whether the act be constitutional or not; but such an exercise of power is the ultimate and supreme function of courts. It is legitimate only in the last resort, and as a necessity in the determination of real, earnest and vital controversy between individuals. It never was the thought that, by means of a friendly suit, a party beaten in the legislature could transfer to the courts an inquiry as to the constitutionality of the legislative act."

Applying the principles thus long settled by the decisions of this court to the act of Congress undertaking to confer jurisdiction in this case, we find that William Brown and Levi B. Gritts, on their own behalf and on behalf of all other Cherokee citizens having like interest in the property allotted under the act of July 1, 1902, and David Muskrat and J. Henry Dick, for themselves and representatives of all Cherokee citizens enrolled as such for allotment as of September 1, 1902, are authorized and empowered to institute suits in the Court of Claims to determine the validity of acts of Congress passed since the act of July 1, 1902, in so far as the same attempt to increase or extend the restrictions upon alienation, encumbrance, or the right to lease the allotments of lands of Cherokee citizens, or to increase the number of persons entitled to share in the final distribution of lands and funds of the Cherokees beyond those enrolled for allotment as of September 1, 1902, and provided for in the said act of July 1, 1902.

The jurisdiction was given for that purpose first to the Court of Claims and then upon appeal to this court. That is, the object and purpose of the suit is wholly comprised in the determination of the constitutional validity of certain acts of Congress; and furthermore, in the last paragraph of the section, should a judgment be rendered in the Court of Claims or this court, denying the constitutional validity of such acts, then the amount of compensation to be paid to attorneys employed for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the law is to be paid out of funds in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the beneficiaries, the act having previously provided that the United States should be made a party and the Attorney General be charged with the defense of the suits.

It is therefore evident that there is neither more nor less in this procedure than an attempt to provide for a judicial determination, final in this court, of the constitutional validity of an act of Congress. Is such a determination within the judicial power conferred by the Constitution, as the same has been interpreted and defined in the authoritative decisions to which we have referred? We think it is not. That judicial power, as we have seen, is the right to determine actual controversies arising between adverse litigants, duly instituted in courts of proper jurisdiction. The right to declare a law unconstitutional arises because an act of Congress relied upon by one or the other of such parties in determining their rights is in conflict with the fundamental law. The exercise of this, the most important and delicate duty of this court, is not given to it as a body with revisory power over the action of Congress, but because the rights of the litigants in justiciable controversies require the court to choose between the fundamental law and a law purporting to be enacted within constitutional authority, but in fact beyond the power delegated to the legislative branch of the Government. This attempt to obtain a judicial declaration of the validity of the act of Congress is not presented in a "case" or "controversy," to which, under the Constitution of the United States, the judicial power alone extends. It is true the United States is made a defendant to this action, but it has no interest adverse to the claimants. The object is not to assert a property right as against the Government, or to demand compensation for alleged wrongs because of action upon its part. The whole purpose of the law is to determine the constitutional validity of this class of legislation, in a suit not arising between parties concerning a property right necessarily involved in the decision in question, but in a proceeding against the Government in its sovereign capacity, and concerning which the only judgment required is to settle the doubtful character of the legislation in question. Such judgment will not conclude private parties, when actual litigation brings to the court the question of the constitutionality of such legislation. In a legal sense the judgment could not be executed, and amounts in fact to no more than an expression of opinion upon the validity of the acts in question. Confining the jurisdiction of this court within the limitations conferred by the Constitution, which the court has hitherto been careful to observe, and whose boundaries it has refused to transcend, we think the Congress, in the act of March 1, 1907, exceeded the limitations of legislative authority, so far as it required of this court action not judicial in its nature within the meaning of the Constitution.

Nor can it make any difference that the petitioners had brought suits in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to enjoin the Secretary of the Interior from carrying into effect the legislation subsequent to the act of July 1, 1902, which suits were pending when the jurisdictional act here involved was passed. The latter act must depend upon its own terms and be judged by the authority which it undertakes to confer. If such actions as are here attempted, to determine the validity of legislation, are sustained, the result will be that this court, instead of keeping within the limits of judicial power and deciding cases or controversies arising between opposing parties, as the Constitution intended it should, will be required to give opinions in the nature of advice concerning legislative action, a function never conferred upon it by the Constitution, and against the exercise of which this court has steadily set its face from the beginning.[2]

The questions involved in this proceeding as to the validity of the legislation may arise in suits between individuals, and when they do and are properly brought before this court for consideration they, of course, must be determined in the exercise of its judicial functions. For the reasons we have stated, we are constrained to hold that these actions present no justiciable controversy within the authority of the court, acting within the limitations of the Constitution under which it was created. As Congress, in passing this act as a part of the plan involved, evidently intended to provide a review of the judgment of the Court of Claims in this court, as the constitutionality of important legislation is concerned, we think the act cannot be held to intend to confer jurisdiction on that court separately considered.[3] Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 184

[2] ADVISORY OPINIONS. The constitutions of a few states require either the judges of their supreme courts or "the Supreme Court" (Colorado) to give advisory opinions on questions of law, in Massachusetts at the request of "each branch of the legislature, as well as the governor and council" (construed not to mean the governor alone, 214 Mass. 602), in New Hampshire similar provision, in Maine at the request of the "governor, council, senate, or house of representatives," in Rhode Island, Colorado and formerly Missouri at the request of the governor or either house, and in Florida and South Dakota at the request of the governor. Commonly these questions are as to the validity of legislation or proposed legislation. Such opinions are not regarded as binding either upon the legislature or executive advised nor (Colorado doubtful) upon the judges who give the advice should the same question come before them in a litigated case. This institution has as a fore-runner the practice in England from early times whereby the king and the House of Lords in their legislative capacity required the opinions of the judges. In the absence of an express requirement of their state constitution American judges usually but not invariably have declined to give such opinions following a precedent set by Chief Justice Jay and the associate justices of the United States Supreme Court in 1793 when President Washington requested their opinion. The function has been regarded as non-judicial and where a constitution makes no provision it has been held that a statute is invalid which attempts to impose it upon the judges. See the treatise on the whole subject by Albert R. Ellingwood, (1918) Departmental Cooperation in State Government. See also Thayer's Legal Essays (1908) pp. 42-59, and 4 Mass. Law Quart. 342-352, 6 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law (2d ed.) 1065-1078. For adverse comment on requiring advisory opinions, see 2 Maine Law Rev. 1-5, 6 ib. 28-39, 11 ib. 15-18.

[3] Of the Court of Claims it has been said that it is not one of the courts recognized in the Constitution and that therefore the inferred restriction that the courts there recognized may exercise only judicial functions does not apply to it. Gordon v. United States (1864) 117 U. S. (appendix) 697, 698, 699. More justifiably it has been held that the courts local to the District of Columbia are not included in that part of the federal judicial system in which is vested the "judicial power of the United States" dealt with in Const. Art. III, but have been created under the power given Congress "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" over the District of Columbia (Const. Art. I, No. 8, cl. 17). In the exercise of this power Congress may create courts for the District and can confer upon them both judicial and non-judicial functions, e. g. advisory, administrative or legislative. Keller v. Potomac Electric Power Co. (1923) 261 U. S. 428, 67 L. ed. 731.

U. S. 540, 565, 46 L. ed. 679, 22 Sup. Ct. 431; Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U. S. 463, 52 L. ed. 297, 28 Sup. Ct. 141.

The judgments will be reversed and the cases remanded to the Court of Claims, with directions to dismiss the petitions for want of jurisdiction.

FAIRCHILD v. HUGHES, AS SECRETARY OF STATE OF THE UNITED STATES ET AL.

1922. Supreme Court of the United States. 258 U. S. 126.

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the opinion of the court.

On July 7, 1920, Charles S. Fairchild of New York brought this suit in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against the Secretary of State and the Attorney General. The prayers of the bill are that "the so-called Suffrage Amendment [the Nineteenth to the Federal Constitution] be declared unconstitutional and void"; that the Secretary of State be restrained from issuing any proclamation declaring that it has been ratified; and that the Attorney General be restrained from enforcing it. There is also a prayer for general relief and for an interlocutory injunction. The plaintiff, and others on whose behalf he sues, are citizens of the United States, taxpayers and members of the American Constitutional League, a voluntary association which describes itself as engaged in diffusing "knowledge as to the fundamental principles of the American Constitution, and especially that which gives to each State the right to determine for itself the question as to who should exercise the elective franchise therein."

The claim to relief was rested upon the following allegations: The legislatures of thirty-four of the States have passed resolutions purporting to ratify the Suffrage Amendment; and from one other State the Secretary of State of the United States has received a certificate to that effect purporting to come from the proper officer. The proposed Amendment cannot, for reasons stated, be made a part of the Constitution through ratification by the legislatures; and there are also specific reasons why the resolutions already adopted in several of the States are inoperative. But the Secretary has declared that he is without power to examine into the validity of alleged acts of ratification, and that, upon receiving from one additional State the customary certificate, he will issue a proclamation declaring that the Suffrage Amendment has been adopted. Furthermore, "a force bill" has been introduced in the Senate which provides fine and imprisonment for any person who refuses to allow women to vote; and if the bill is enacted, the Attorney General will be required to enforce its provisions. The threatened proclamation of the adoption of the Amendment would not be conclusive of its validity, but it would lead election officers to permit women to vote in States whose constitutions limit suffrage to men. This would prevent ascertainment of the wishes of the legally qualified voters, and elections, state and federal, would be void. Free citizens would be deprived of their right to have such elections duly held; the effectiveness of their votes would be diminished; and election expenses would be nearly doubled. Thus irremediable mischief would result. [The Supreme Court of the District decreed a dismissal, the Court of Appeals of the District affirmed the decree and the plaintiff appealed to this court.]

Plaintiff's alleged interest in the question submitted is not such as to afford a basis for this proceeding. It is frankly a proceeding to have the Nineteenth Amendment declared void. In form it is a bill in equity; but it is not a case within the meaning of § 2 of Article III of the Constitution, which confers judicial power on the federal courts, for no claim of plaintiff is "brought before the court[s] for determination by such regular proceedings as are established by law or custom for the protection or enforcement of rights, or the prevention, redress, or punishment of wrongs." See In re Pacific Railway Commission, 32 Fed. 241, 255, quoted in Muskrat v. United States, 219 U. S. 346, 356. The alleged wrongful act of the Secretary of State, said to be threatening, is the issuing of a proclamation which plaintiff asserts will be vain but will mislead election officers. The alleged wrongful act of the Attorney General, said to be threatening, is the enforcement, as against election officers, of the penalties to be imposed by a contemplated act of Congress which plaintiff asserts would be unconstitutional. But plaintiff is not an election officer; and the State of New York, of which he is a citizen, had previously amended its own constitution so as to grant the suffrage to women and had ratified this Amendment. Plaintiff has only the right, possessed by every citizen, to require that the Government be administered according to law and that the public moneys be not wasted. Obviously this general right does not entitle a private citizen to institute in the federal courts a suit to secure by indirection a determination whether a statute if passed, or a constitutional amendment about to be adopted, will be valid. Compare Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475; Tyler v. Judges of Court of Registration, 179 U. S. 405.

Decree affirmed.

EX PARTE YOUNG.

1908. Supreme Court of the United States. 209 U. S. 123.

[The case turned upon the question whether the United States Circuit (now District) Court had jurisdiction of a bill to enjoin the State Attorney General and the Railroad and Warehouse Commission, of the state of Minnesota, from enforcing a state statute which provided for the regulation of railroad rates in a manner alleged to be unconstitutional. The bill was filed the day before the legislation was to take effect. The decision of the Circuit Court that it had jurisdiction was affirmed in the following opinion:]

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court: * * * This inquiry necessitates an examination of the most material and important objection made to the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court, the objection being that the suit is, in effect, one against the State of Minnesota, and that the injunction issued against the Attorney General illegally prohibits state action, either criminal or civil, to enforce obedience to the statutes of the state. * * * The Eleventh Amendment prohibits the commencement or prosecution of any suit against one of the United States by citizens of another state or citizens or subjects of any foreign State. * * * It applies to a suit brought against a state by one of its own citizens as well as to a suit brought by a citizen of another state. Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U. S. 1. * * * Osborn v. United States Bank (1824), 9 Wheat. 738, 846, 857, * * * held that the Amendment applied only to those suits in which the state was a party on the record. In the subsequent case of Governor of Georgia v. Madrazo (1828), 1 Pet. 110, 122, 123, that holding was somewhat enlarged, and Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court, while citing Osborn v. United States Bank, supra, said that where the claim was made, as in the case then before the court, against the Governor of Georgia as governor, and the demand was made upon him, not personally, but officially (for moneys in the treasury of the state and for slaves in possession of the state government), the state might be considered as the party on the record (page 123), and therefore the suit could not be maintained. * * *

The cases upon the subject were reviewed, and it was held, In re Ayers, 123 U. S. 443, that a bill in equity brought against officers of a state, who, as individuals, have no personal interest in the subject-matter of the suit, and defend only as representing the state, where the relief prayed for, if done, would constitute a performance by the state of the alleged contract of the state, was a suit against the state (page 504), following in this respect Hagood v. Southern, supra. [117 U. S. 52, 67.]

A suit of such a nature was simply an attempt to make the state itself, through its officers, perform its alleged contract, by directing those officers to do acts which constituted such performance. The state alone had any interest in the question, and a decree in favor of plaintiff would affect the treasury of the state.

On the other hand, United States v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196, determined that an individual in possession of real estate under the Government of the United States, which claimed to be its owner, was, nevertheless, properly sued by the plaintiff, as owner, to recover possession, and such suit was not one against the United States, although the individual in possession justified such possession under its authority.[4] See also Tindal v. Wesley, 167 U. S. 204, to the same effect. * * *

The various authorities we have referred to furnish ample justification for the assertion that individuals, who, as officers of the State, are clothed with some duty in regard to the enforcement of the laws of the State, and who threaten and are about to commence proceedings, either of a civil or criminal nature, to enforce against parties affected an unconstitutional act, violating the federal Constitution, may be enjoined by a Federal court of equity from such action. * * *

In making an officer of the state a party defendant in a suit to enjoin the enforcement of an act alleged to be unconstitutional it is plain that such officer must have some connection with the enforcement of the act, or else it is merely making him a party as a representative of the state, and thereby attempting to make the state a party.

It has not, however, been held that it was necessary that such duty should be declared in the same act which is to be enforced. In some cases, it is true, the duty of enforcement has been so imposed (154 U. S. 362, 366, § 19 of the act), but that may possibly make the duty more clear; if it otherwise exist it is equally efficacious. The fact that the state officer by virtue of his office has some connection with the enforcement of the act is the important and material fact, and whether it arises out of the general law, or is specially created by the act itself, is not material so long as it exists. * * *

It is also argued that the only proceeding which the Attorney General could take to enforce the statute, so far as his office is concerned, was one by mandamus, which would be commenced by the state in its sovereign and governmental character, and that the right to bring such action is a necessary attribute of a sovereign government. It is contended that the complainants do not complain and they care nothing about any action which Mr. Young might take or bring as an ordinary individual, but that he was complained of as an officer, to whose discretion is confided the use of the name of the State of Minnesota so far as litigation is concerned, and that when or how he shall use it is a matter resting in his discretion and cannot be controlled by any court.

[4] Where state officers acting under state authority have erected a dyke on state land and caused injury to a private owner's land in a manner violating the federal Constitution, a federal court has jurisdiction at the latter's suit to enjoin the officers against further acts of maintenance or reconstruction of dyke, but it seems that to authorize a decree to remove the dyke from the state land the state would have to be made a party and could not be without its consent. Hopkins v. Clemson Agricultural College (1911) 221 U. S. 636, 55 L. ed. 890, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 243.

The answer to all this is the same as made in every case where an official claims to be acting under the authority of the state. The act to be enforced is alleged to be unconstitutional, and if it be so, the use of the name of the state to enforce an unconstitutional act to the injury of complainants is a proceeding without the authority of and one which does not affect the state in its sovereign or governmental capacity. It is simply an illegal act upon the part of a state official in attempting by the use of the name of the state to enforce a legislative enactment which is void because unconstitutional. If the act which the state Attorney General seeks to enforce be a violation of the federal Constitution, the officer in proceeding under such enactment comes into conflict with the superior authority of that Constitution, and he is in that case stripped of his official or representative character and is subjected in his person to the consequences of his individual conduct. The state has no power to impart to him any immunity from responsibility to the supreme authority of the United States. See In re Ayres, supra, page 507. It would be an injury to complainant to harass it with a multiplicity of suits or litigation generally in an endeavor to enforce penalties under an unconstitutional enactment, and to prevent it ought to be within the jurisdiction of a court of equity. If the question of unconstitutionality with reference, at least, to the federal Constitution be first raised in a federal court that court, as we think is shown by the authorities cited hereafter, has the right to decide it to the exclusion of all other courts. * * *

It is further objected that there is a plain and adequate remedy at law open to the complainants and that a court of equity, therefore, has no jurisdiction in such case. It has been suggested that the proper way to test the constitutionality of the act is to disobey it, at least once, after which the company might obey the act pending subsequent proceedings to test its validity. * * * Another obstacle to making the test on the part of the company might be to find an agent or employee who would disobey the law, with a possible fine and imprisonment staring him in the face if the act should be held valid. * * * If, however, one should be found and the prosecutor should elect to proceed against him, the defense that the act was invalid, because the rates established by it were too low, would require a long and difficult examination of quite complicated facts upon which the validity of the act depended. Such investigation it would be almost impossible to make before a jury, as such body could not intelligently pass upon the matter. * * *

To await proceedings against the company in a state court grounded upon a disobedience of the act, and then, if necessary, obtain a review in this court by writ of error to the highest state court, would place the company in peril of large loss and its agents in great risk of fines and imprisonment if it should be finally determined that the act was valid. This risk the company ought not to be required to take. Over eleven thousand millions of dollars, it is estimated, are invested in railroad property, owned by many thousands of people who are scattered over the whole country from ocean to ocean, and they are entitled to equal protection from the laws and from the courts, with the owners of all other kinds of property, no more, no less. The courts having jurisdiction, federal or state, should at all times be open to them as well as to others, for the purpose of protecting their property and their legal rights.

[HARLAN, J., delivered a dissenting opinion.][5]

SCHMITT v. F. W. COOK BREWING CO.

1918. Supreme Court of Indiana. 187 Ind. 623.

TOWNSEND, J.—Appellee brewing company obtained a permanent injunction against appellant superintendent of the police of the city of Evansville, preventing the enforcement of the Prohibition Law, Acts 1917, p. 15. Appellant's demurrer to the complaint was overruled. He refused to plead further and judgment was rendered.

No question is raised as to the jurisdiction of a court of equity and, owing to the alleged property rights and to avoid a multiplicity of actions, the cause will be considered.

The sole question presented is the constitutionality of the act. * * * [The court then considered that question.]

[5] A bill was filed in the United States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas by a telegraph company asking that the prosecuting attorneys of the seventeen judicial circuits of the state of Arkansas be enjoined from instituting proceedings to enforce against the company the penal provisions of an Arkansas statute alleged to be in violation of the national Constitution. The court decreed dismissal of the bill, asserting that this was a suit against the state and therefore not within the court's jurisdiction. On the authority of the principal case the Supreme Court reversed the decree. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Andrews et al. (1910) 216 U. S. 165, 54 L. ed. 430.

UNITED THEATRE TICKET OFFICES, INC. v. BANTON.

1927. Supreme Court of the United States. 273 U. S. 418.

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND delivered the opinion of the Court.

Appellant is engaged in the business of reselling tickets of admission to theaters and other places of entertainment in the city of New York. It employs a large number of salesmen, messenger boys and others. Its expenses are very large, and its sales average approximately 300,000 tickets per annum. These tickets are obtained either from the box office of the theater or from other brokers and distributors. It is duly licensed under section 168, c. 590, Laws N. Y. 1922, and has given a bond under section 169 of that chapter in the penal sum of $1,000, with sureties, conditioned, among other things, that it will not be guilty of any fraud or extortion. See Weller v. New York, 268 U. S. 319, 322.

Section 167 of chapter 590 declares that the price of or charge for admission to theaters, etc., is a matter affected with a public interest and subject to state supervision, in order to safeguard the public against fraud, extortion, exorbitant rates, and similar abuses. Section 172 forbids the resale of any ticket or other evidence of the right of entry to any theater, etc., "at a price in excess of fifty cents in advance of the price printed on the face of such ticket or other evidence of the right of entry," such printing being required by that section. * * *

This suit was brought to enjoin respondents from proceeding either at law or in equity to enforce the last-named section, and from revoking plaintiff's license, enforcing by suit or otherwise the penalty of the bond or prosecuting criminally appellant or any of its officers or agents for reselling or attempting to resell any ticket or other evidence of the right of entry to any theater, etc., at a price in excess of 50 cents in advance of the printed price. The bill alleges threats on the part of appellees to enforce the statute against appellant, to forfeit its license, enforce the penalty of its bond and institute criminal prosecutions against appellant, its officers and agents. It is further alleged that the terms of the statute are so drastic and the penalties for its violation so great (imprisonment for one year or a fine of $250 or both) that appellant may not resell any ticket or evidence of the right of entry at a price beyond that fixed by the statute even for the purpose of testing the validity of the law, and that appellant will be compelled to submit to the statute whether valid or invalid unless its suit be entertained, and thereby will be deprived of its property and liberty without due process of law and denied the equal protection of the law, in contravention of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. Following the rule frequently announced by this court, that "equitable jurisdiction exists to restrain criminal prosecutions under unconstitutional enactments, when the prevention of such prosecutions is essential to the safeguarding of rights of property," we sustain the jurisdiction of the District Court. Packard v. Banton, 264 U. S. 140, 143, and cases there cited. [The court proceeded to consider the alleged unconstitutionality of the statute and held it invalid on the ground that it violated the Fourteenth Amendment.][6]

TRUAX AND THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE STATE OF ARIZONA v. RAICH.

1915. Supreme Court of the United States. 239 U. S. 33.

[Bill for an injunction in the United States district Court for the District of Arizona. Decree granted and defendants appeal.] * * *

MR. JUSTICE HUGHES delivered the opinion of the court.

Under the initiative provision of the constitution of Arizona (Art. IV, § 1), there was adopted the following measure which was proclaimed by the Governor as a law of the state on December 14, 1914: [The enactment required every employer of more than five workers at any one time in Arizona to employ not less than 80% who were qualified electors or native-born citizens of the United States. Violation was declared a misdemeanor subject to a fine of not less than $100 and imprisonment for not less than 30 days.]

Mike Raich (the appellee), a native of Austria, and an inhabitant of the state of Arizona but not a qualified elector, was employed as a cook by the appellant William Truax, Sr., in his restaurant in the City of Bisbee, Cochise County. Truax had nine employes, of whom seven were neither "native-born citizens" of the United States nor qualified electors. After the election at which the act was passed Raich was informed by his employer that when the law was proclaimed, and solely by reason of its requirements and because of the fear of the penalties that would be incurred in case of its violation, he would be discharged. Thereupon, on December 15, 1914, Raich filed this bill in the District Court of the United States for the District of Arizona, asserting among other things that the act denied to him the equal protection of the laws and hence was contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Wiley E. Jones, the attorney general of the state, and W. G. Gilmore, the county attorney of Cochise County, were made defendants in addition to the employer Truax, upon the allegation that these officers would prosecute the employer unless he complied with its terms and that in order to avoid such a prosecution the employer was about to discharge the complainant. Averring that there was no adequate remedy at law, the bill sought a decree declaring the act to be unconstitutional and restraining action thereunder.

[6] Six wholesalers and retailers in Florida on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated joined in a suit to test the validity of a Florida statute which required all merchants who offered trading stamps with goods to pay license fees and made violation of the statute a criminal offense. They alleged that the statute was unconstitutional, that its enforcement was threatened and if materialized would injure their business. They asked an injunction to restrain "the tax collectors of each county in the state, the different state's attorneys, county solicitors and prosecuting attorneys of the circuits and counties of the state of Florida." The United States District Court took jurisdiction, held the statute invalid and granted the injunction. Van Deman & Lewis Co. v. Rast (1913) 214 Fed. 827. On appeal the Supreme Court concurred in the view that the district court had jurisdiction but reversed on the ground that the statute was valid. Rast v. Van Deman & Lewis Co. (1916) 240 U. S. 342, 60 L. ed. 679, L. R. A. 1917A, 421, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 455.

On the ground of threatened injury to business, a sugar refining company obtained a decision that a statute complained of was unconstitutional and an injunction restraining the inspector of sugar refining, the governor and the attorney-general of Louisiana. This decree of the United States District Court was affirmed by the Supreme Court. McFarland v. American Sugar Ref. Co. (1916) 241 U. S. 79, 60 L. ed. 899.

Soon after the bill was filed, an application was made for an injunction pendente lite. After notice of this application, Truax was arrested for a violation of the act,[7] upon a complaint prepared by one of the assistants in the office of the County Attorney of Cochise County, and as it appeared that by reason of the determination of the officers to enforce the act there was danger of the complainant's immediate discharge from employment, the district judge granted a temporary restraining order.

The allegations of the bill were not controverted. The defendants joined in a motion to dismiss upon the grounds (1) that the suit was against the state of Arizona without its consent; (2) that it was sought to enjoin the enforcement of a criminal statute; (3) that the bill did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in equity; and (4) that there was an improper joinder of parties and the plaintiff was not entitled to sue for the relief asked. The application for an interlocutory injunction and the motion to dismiss were then heard before three judges, as required by section 266 of the Judicial Code. The motion to dismiss was denied and an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants, the attorney general and the county attorney, and their successors and assistants, from enforcing the act against the defendant Truax, was granted. 219 Fed. Rep. 273. This direct appeal has been taken.

[7] But the federal courts will not entertain a bill to restrain criminal proceedings in a state court pending there before the injunction proceedings are initiated. Cline, Dist. Atty. v. Frink Dairy Co. (1927) 274 U. S. 445, 71 L. ed. 1146.

As the bill is framed upon the theory that the act is unconstitutional, and that the defendants who are public officers concerned with the enforcement of the laws of the State are about to proceed wrongfully to the complainant's injury through interference with his employment, it is established that the suit cannot be regarded as one against the State. Whatever doubt existed in this class of cases was removed by the decision in Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 155, 161, which has repeatedly been followed. Ludwig v. West. Un. Tel. Co., 216 U. S. 146; West. Un. Tel. Co. v. Andrews, 216 U. S. 165; Herndon v. C., R. I. & P. Ry., 218 U. S. 135, 155; Hopkins v. Clemson College, 221 U. S. 636, 643-645; Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S. 605, 607, 620; Home Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Los Angeles, 227 U. S. 278, 293.

It is also settled that while a court of equity, generally speaking, has 'no jurisdiction over the prosecution, the punishment or the pardon of crimes or misdemeanors' (In re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 210) a distinction obtains, and equitable jurisdiction exists to restrain criminal prosecutions under unconstitutional enactments, when the prevention of such prosecutions is essential to the safeguarding of rights of property. Davis & Farnum Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 189 U. S. 207, 218; Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 241; Ex parte Young, supra; Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, supra, p. 621. The right to earn a livelihood and to continue in employment unmolested by efforts to enforce void enactments should similarly be entitled to protection in the absence of adequate remedy at law. It is said that the bill does not show an employment for a term, and that under an employment at will the complainant could be discharged at any time for any reason or for no reason, the motive of the employer being immaterial. The conclusion, however, that is sought to be drawn is too broad. The fact that the employment is at the will of the parties, respectively, does not make it one at the will of others. The employé has manifest interest in the freedom of the employer to exercise his judgment without illegal interference or compulsion and, by the weight of authority, the unjustified interference of third persons is actionable although the employment is at will. Moran v. Dunphy, 177 Massachusetts, 485, 487; Berry v. Donovan, 188 Massachusetts, 353; Brennan v. United Hatters, 73 N. J. Law, 729, 743; Perkins v. Pendleton, 90 Maine, 166; Lucke v. Clothing Cutters, 77 Maryland, 396; London Guar. & Acc. Co. v. Horn, 101 Ill. App. 355, S. C., 206 Illinois, 493; Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Florida, 206; Blumenthal v. Shaw, 23 C. C. A. 290, S. C., 77 Fed. Rep. 954. It is further urged that the complainant cannot sue save to redress his own grievance (McCabe v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry., 235 U. S. 151, 162); that is, that the servant cannot complain for the master, and that it is the master who is subject to prosecution, and not the complainant. But the act undertakes to operate directly upon the employment of aliens and if enforced would compel the employer to discharge a sufficient number of his employés to bring the alien quota within the prescribed limit. It sufficiently appears that the discharge of the complainant will be solely for the purpose of meeting of the requirements of the act and avoiding threatened prosecution under its provisions. It is, therefore, idle to call the injury indirect or remote.[8] It is also entirely clear that unless the enforcement of the act is restrained the complainant will have no adequate remedy, and hence we think that the case falls within the class in which, if the unconstitutionality of the act is shown, equitable relief may be had.[9]

[9] In Society of Sisters v. Governor of Oregon et al. (1924), 296 Fed. 928, a bill for an injunction to restrain the governor and other officials of the state of Oregon from threatening or attempting to enforce a statute of that state was filed in the United States District Court for Oregon long before the statute was to go into effect. The statute was adopted Nov. 22, 1922 and by its terms was to become effective Sept. 1, 1926. On March 31, 1924 the court (after holding the statute unconstitutional) granted an injunction. On appeal this decree was affirmed by the Supreme Court. Pierce, Governor of Oregon et al. v. Society of Sisters (1925) 268 U. S. 510, 69 L. ed. 1070, 39 A. L. R. 468. The gist of the statute was that it required parents and guardians of all children between the ages of 8 and 16 to send them to public schools. The plaintiffs were owners of private schools. Two points urged by defendants and discussed in the opinions below and on appeal were (1) that the bills were prematurely brought and (2) that the plaintiffs were not of a class of persons against whom the state officials would proceed in their future enforcement of the act.

In Terrace v. Thompson (1923) 263 U. S. 197, 68 L. ed. 255, a landowning citizen and an alien sought to enjoin the enforcement of a state statute which if constitutional would render invalid a lease of land by the owner to the alien which the two desired to make. The court considered the alleged unconstitutionality and sustained the statute. How does such a decision differ from a "declaratory judgment"?

In Davis & Farnum Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles (1903) 189 U. S. 207, 218-221, 47 L. ed. 778, a threatened interest was of a character considered not substantial enough to support such a bill. Query, under the later decisions? On a bill brought by a plaintiff who had a different interest the same court passed upon the validity of the legislation objected to in the above case. Dobbins v. Los Angeles (1904) 195 U. S. 223, 241, 49 L. ed. 169.

SHAREHOLDER'S BILL. Where the requisites peculiar to a representative suit by corporate shareholders are present a bill to enjoin public officers from enforcing an unconstitutional statute may be in that form, for examples Smyth v. Ames (1898) 169 U. S. 466, 515-519, 42 L. ed. 819; Hill v. Wallace, Sec. of Agr. (1922) 259 U. S. 44, 66 L. ed. 822. See also Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (1895) 157 U. S. 429, 39 L. ed. 759, where such a representative suit was filed to question a tax act of Congress and the dismissal on demurrer in the United States Circuit Court was reversed by the Supreme Court which held the act unconstitutional and remanded the suit with directions to issue a decree restraining the directors and officers of the corporation from "voluntarily" paying the tax, although an act of Congress validly prohibited courts to entertain suits to restrain the collection of federal taxes. See the dissenting opinions, 157 U. S. Esp. pp. 609-612, 653. Cf. the decision with the extract from the opinion printed ante, p. 44, and with Corbus v. Alaska Treadwell Gold Mining Co. (1903) 187 U. S. 455, 47 L. ed. 256 (federal tax statute) and Dodge v. Woolsey (1855) 18 How. (U. S.) 331, 15 L. ed. 401 where a shareholder's bill was used to question the constitutionality of a state tax statute and to restrain its enforcement, and a decree restraining the state tax collector was affirmed.

The question then is whether the act assailed is repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment. * * * [The court so held.]

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS dissenting.

I am unable to agree with the opinion of the majority of the court. It seems to me plain that this is a suit against a State to which the Eleventh Amendment declares "the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend." Fitts v. McGhee, 172 U. S. 516. If Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, and the cases following it support the doctrine that Federal courts may enjoin the enforcement of criminal statutes enacted by state legislatures whenever the enjoyment of some constitutional right happens to be threatened with temporary interruption, they should be overruled in that regard. The simple, direct language of the Amendment ought to be given effect, not refined away.

That the challenged act is invalid I think admits of no serious doubt.

CAVANAUGH ET AL. v. LOONEY, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE STATE OF TEXAS ET AL.

1919. Supreme Court of the United States. 248 U. S. 453.

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS delivered the opinion of the court.

The University of Texas is a state institution under immediate control of officers known as Regents, appointed by the Governor, with its principal educational departments in Travis and Galveston counties. An act of the legislature, approved August 30, 1911 (S. B. No. 20, c. 6, General Laws, Texas), undertook to authorize the Regents to purchase or condemn through proceedings in the district courts such lands within those counties as they might deem expedient for extension of campus or other university purposes. Appellants have long owned and used as a residence homestead twenty-six acres in Travis County desirable as an addition to the university grounds. Having failed in their efforts to purchase, the Regents were about to meet and ask the Attorney General to institute proceedings to condemn this entire tract. Thereupon appellants instituted this proceeding against them and the Attorney General in the United States District Court seeking to restrain their threatened action "on the ground among others that said law conflicts with the Constitution of the United States, * * *."

A special court [of three judges] assembled as provided by § 266 Judicial Code, denied application for preliminary injunction without opinion and allowed this direct appeal.

It is now settled doctrine "that individuals, who, as officers of the state, are clothed with some duty in regard to the enforcement of laws of the state, and who threaten and are about to commence proceedings, either of a civil or criminal nature, to enforce against parties affected an unconstitutional act, violating the federal Constitution, may be enjoined by a federal court of equity from such action." Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 155, 156; [other citations are omitted]. But no such injunction "ought to be granted unless in a case reasonably free from doubt," and when necessary to prevent great and irreparable injury. Ex parte Young, supra, 166. The jurisdiction should be exercised only where intervention is essential in order effectually to protect property rights against injuries otherwise irremediable.

When considered in connection with established rules of law relating to the power of eminent domain, complainants' allegation of threatened "irreparable loss and damage" appears fanciful. The detailed circumstances negative such view and rather tend to support the contrary one. Nothing indicates that any objections to the validity of the statute could not be presented in an orderly way before the state court where defendants intended to institute condemnation proceedings; and if by any chance the state courts should finally deny a federal right the appropriate and adequate remedy by review here is obvious. Exercising a wise discretion we think the court below properly denied an injunction. Upon the record it was not called upon to inquire narrowly into the disputable points urged against the statute. No more are we.

The judgment of the court below is

Affirmed.

STATE OF MISSOURI v. HOLLAND.

1920. Supreme Court of the United States. 252 U. S. 416.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a bill in equity brought by the State of Missouri to prevent a game warden of the United States from attempting to enforce the Migratory Bird Treaty Act of July 3, 1918, c. 128, 40 Stat. 755, and the regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture in pursuance of the same. The ground of the bill is that the statute is an unconstitutional interference with the rights reserved to the states by the Tenth Amendment, and that the acts of the defendant done and threatened under that authority invade the sovereign right of the state and contravene its will manifested in statutes. The state also alleges a pecuniary interest, as owner of the wild birds within its borders and otherwise, admitted by the Government to be sufficient, but it is enough that the bill is a reasonable and proper means to assert the alleged quasi sovereign rights of a state.[10] Kansas v. Colorado, 185 U. S. 125, 142. Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230, 237. Marshall Dental Manufacturing Co. v. Iowa, 226 U. S. 460, 462. A motion to dismiss was sustained by the District Court on the ground that the act of Congress is constitutional. 258 Fed. Rep. 479. Acc. United States v. Thompson, 258 Fed. Rep. 257; United States v. Rockefeller, 260 Fed. Rep. 346. The State appeals.

[The Court proceeded to consider the constitutionality of the statute and sustained it.]

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA v. STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

STATE OF OHIO v. STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

1923. Supreme Court of the United States. 262 U. S. 553.

Mr. Justice Van Devanter delivered the opinion of the Court.

These are suits, one by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the other by the State of Ohio, to enjoin the State of West Virginia from enforcing an act passed by her legislature (c. 71, Acts 1919) which the complainants believe will largely curtail or cut off the supply of natural gas heretofore and now carried by pipe lines from West Virginia into their territory and there sold and used for fuel and lighting purposes. Although distinct, the suits are so much alike that they have been presented at the bar substantially as a single case. They will be dealt with accordingly in this opinion.

The West Virginia Act is set forth at length in the margin. The complainants challenge its validity on the ground that it directly interferes with interstate commerce and therefore contravenes the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States; and they rest their right to relief on the grounds that to enforce the act will subject them to irreparable injury in respect of many of their public institutions and governmental agencies, which long have been and now are using this gas, and will subject them to further and incalculable injury in that (a) it will imperil the health and comfort of thousands of their people who use the gas in their homes and are largely dependent thereon, and (b) will halt or curtail many industries which seasonally use great quantities of the gas and wherein thousands of persons are employed and millions of taxable wealth are invested. * * *

The act whose enforcement is sought to be enjoined was passed by the legislature of West Virginia February 10, 1919, and went into effect May 11th following. These suits were brought eight days thereafter by direction of the legislatures of the complainant States, and by leave of this Court. Interlocutory injunctions were prayed and granted at the outset and are still in force.

Three questions bearing on the propriety of entertaining the suits were raised soon after the suits were begun and consideration of them was postponed to the final hearing.

The first question is whether the suits involve a justiciable controversy between States in the sense of the Judiciary Article of the Constitution. We are of opinion that they do and that every element of such a controversy is present.

Each suit presents a direct issue between two States as to whether one may withdraw a natural product, a common subject of commercial dealings, from an established current of commerce moving into the territory of the other. The complainant State asserts and the defendant State denies that such a withdrawal is an interference with interstate commerce forbidden by the Constitution. This is essentially a judicial question. It concededly is so in suits between private parties, and of course its character is not different in a suit between States.

What is sought is not an abstract ruling on that question, but an injunction against such a withdrawal presently threatened and likely to be productive of great injury. The purpose to withdraw is shown in the enactment of the defendant State before set forth and is about to be carried into effect by her officers acting in her name and at her command. The State is the principal and the action of her officers rightly may be imputed to her, even though a suit for an injunction might lie against them.

The attitude of the complainant States is not that of mere volunteers attempting to vindicate the freedom of interstate commerce or to redress purely private grievances. Each sues to protect a twofold interest—one as the proprietor of various public institutions and schools whose supply of gas will be largely curtailed or cut off by the threatened interference with the interstate current, and the other as the representative of the consuming public whose supply will be similarly affected. Both interests are substantial and both are threatened with serious injury.

Each State uses large amounts of the gas in her several institutions and schools,—the greater part in the discharge of duties which are relatively imperative. A break or cessation in the supply will embarrass her greatly in the discharge of those duties and expose thousands of dependents and school children to serious discomfort, if not more. To substitute another form of fuel will involve very large public expenditures.

The private consumers in each State not only include most of the inhabitants of many urban communities but constitute a substantial portion of the State's population. Their health, comfort and welfare are seriously jeopardized by the threatened withdrawal of the gas from the interstate stream. This is a matter of grave public concern in which the State, as the representative of the public, has an interest apart from that of the individuals affected. It is not merely a remote or ethical interest but one which is immediate and recognized by law. * * *

The second question is whether the suits were brought prematurely. They were brought a few days after the West Virginia act went into force. No order under it had been made by the Public Service Commission; nor had it been tested in actual practice. But this does not prove that the suits were premature. Of course they were not so, if it otherwise appeared that the act certainly would operate as the complainant States apprehended it would. One does not have to await the consummation of threatened injury to obtain preventive relief. If the injury is certainly impending that is enough.

Turning to the act, we find that by its first section it lays on every pipe line company a positive duty,—to the extent of its supply of gas produced in the State, whether produced by it or others,—to satisfy the needs, whether for domestic, industrial or other use, of all intending consumers, whether old or new, who are willing to pay for the gas and want it for use within the section of the State in which it is produced, in that through which it is transported or in that wherein it is supplied to others. This is a substantive provision whose terms are both direct and certain, and to which immediate obedience is commanded. No order of the commission is required to give it precision or make it obligatory, and it leaves nothing to the discretion of those who are to enforce it. On the contrary, it prescribes a definite rule of conduct and in itself puts the rule in force. It imposes an unconditional and mandatory duty, as counsel for the State admit, and obviously is intended to enforce a preferred recognition and satisfaction of the needs of consumers within the State, present and prospective, regardless of the effect on the interstate stream or on consumers outside the State. * * *

It must be held therefore that the suits were not brought prematurely.

The third question is whether the requisite parties have been brought into the suits. It is objected that the pipe line companies have not been brought in. But there is nothing which makes their presence essential. The complainant States make no complaint and seek no relief against them. They are supplying gas in those States and evidently will continue to do so, if not restrained or prevented by the defendant State. It is only with her that the complainant States are in controversy. It also is objected that the consumers in the defendant State who will be benefited if the act is enforced have no representation in the suits. But this is a misconception. They are represented by that State, and there is nothing in the situation requiring that they be specially represented or brought in. With equal basis it could be objected in a suit to prevent the enforcement of a statute reducing railroad freight rates, or in one to prevent the enforcement of a municipal ordinance reducing telephone or electric light rates, that shippers or users who would be benefited by the reduction must be specially represented or brought in. Such an objection would of course be untenable; and so of the objection here. [The reasoning upon which the statute was held to violate the Commerce Clause will be considered in a later chapter.]

Mr. Justice Brandeis, dissenting. * * *

First. This Court is without jurisdiction of the subject-matter. The bills present neither a "case," nor a "controversy," within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cr. 137; Muskrat v. United States, 219 U. S. 346, 356, 359; Texas v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 258 U. S. 158. They are not proceedings "instituted according to the regular course of judicial procedure" to protect some right of property or personal right. They are, like McChord v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 183 U. S. 483, 495, an attempt to enjoin, not executive action, but legislation. They are instituted frankly to secure from this Court a general declaration that the West Virginia Act of February 17, 1919, is unconstitutional. Compare Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475, 486. The well settled rule that the Court is without power to entertain such a proceeding applies equally, whether the party invoking its aid is a State or a private person. And the rule cannot be overcome by giving to pleadings the form of a bill in equity for an injunction. Compare Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U. S. 126; Atherton Mills v. Johnston, 259 U. S. 13, 15; Texas v. Interstate Commerce Commission, supra.

Moreover, it is not shown that there is, in a legal sense, danger of invasion of the alleged rights. It is shown that the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio are, in their public institutions, themselves consumers of West Virginia gas—a "makeweight" as suggested in Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230, 237. And it is shown that these and many other consumers within the plaintiff States would suffer serious injury if the West Virginia supply were cut off. But it is not shown that discontinuance of the supply is threatened or that there is, in a legal sense, danger that the supply will be stopped. The mere enactment of the statute, obviously, does not constitute a threat to interrupt the flow of gas into the plaintiff States. The importation into Ohio and Pennsylvania is conducted, not by the State of West Virginia, but wholly by twelve privately owned public service corporations. If the importation ceases it will be, primarily at least, because of acts or omissions of these twelve corporations. Yet there is not even an allegation that these corporations threaten, or intend, to discontinue the importation; or that they will be compelled to do so unless the State of West Virginia is enjoined from enforcing the statute. * * *

For, under West Virginia legislation, no executive officer and no court has power or jurisdiction to declare, or to enforce performance of, such alleged duty of a public service corporation until primary resort has been had to the Public Service Commission and the application to it has been acted upon, either by granting or by denying relief. * * *

It is possible that the Commission would never be called upon to act. It is possible that if called upon, the Commission would refuse to make an order. It is possible that if the Commission made an order, the order would be of such a character as not to affect seriously the interests which plaintiffs seek to protect. And it is possible that if any order were made, the state court would suspend its operation and would eventually annul it. The act makes such careful provision for judicial review of the orders of the Commission and for postponing the incidence of penalties or other liabilities until after such review can be had, that there could never be occasion for invoking in respect to this statute the doctrine of Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123. For the Commission is without power to enforce an order or to impose a penalty. To overcome disobedience, or disregard, of an order, resort must, under the West Virginia statutes, be had to the courts; and to this end an original proceeding must be instituted. Whether the suit to enforce obedience is brought by the Commission or by others, the corporation is given opportunity to defend on the ground that the order is, for any reason, invalid. * * *

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES. * * *

I agree substantially with my brothers MCREYNOLDS and BRANDEIS, but think that there is jurisdiction in such sense as to justify a statement of my opinion upon the merits of the case. I think that the bill should be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS, dissenting.

It seems to me quite clear that the record presents no justiciable controversy; certainly none within the original jurisdiction of this Court. * * *

LIBERTY WAREHOUSE CO. ET AL. v. GRANNIS, COMMONWEALTH ATTY.

1927. Supreme Court of the United States. 273 U. S. 70.

MR. JUSTICE SANFORD delivered the opinion of the Court.

This proceeding was commenced by a petition filed by the plaintiffs in error on the law side of the Federal District Court for Eastern Kentucky, seeking to obtain a judgment declaring their rights under an Act of the Kentucky Legislature.

The Declaratory Judgment Law of Kentucky, Acts of 1922, ch. 83, provides that in any action in a court of record of that Commonwealth having general jurisdiction wherein it is made to appear that an actual controversy exists, the plaintiff may, by means of a petition on the law or equity side of the court, as the nature of the case may require, ask for and obtain "a declaration of rights, either alone or with other relief; and the court may make a binding declaration of rights, whether or not consequential relief is or could be asked"; and that further relief, based on such declaratory judgment, may be granted by the court whenever necessary or proper, either in the same proceeding or in an independent action, upon notice to any adverse party whose rights have been adjudicated by the declaratory judgment.

The petition alleged that the plaintiffs, a Kentucky corporation and a citizen of North Carolina, were engaged in operating a looseleaf tobacco warehouse in Kentucky, in which they sold leaf tobacco at public auction for their customers and patrons; that their rights were materially and seriously affected by Chapter 10 of the Kentucky Acts of 1924, regulating the sales of leaf tobacco at public auction; that this Act was invalid and repugnant to the Bill of Rights and Constitution of Kentucky, the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, and the Sherman Anti-Trust Law; that an actual controversy existed with respect thereto, in that the plaintiffs had been threatened with various civil and criminal punishments and penalties for the violation of the Act, which were about to be enforced thereunder; that in conducting their business, it was necessary for them to know whether the Act was valid or invalid, and whether they were liable for the crimes therein denounced, and subject to the fines and penalties it prescribed, and they could not continue their business without a financial loss, amounting to confiscation of their rights, business and property, unless the court made a declaration of their rights and duties under the Act; that they made this application to the court in accordance with the Federal Conformity Statute and the Declaratory Judgment Law of Kentucky "for the purpose of securing a declaration of their rights and duties" under the Act of 1924, and having the "court determine whether in the conduct of their business it will be necessary for them to comply" with the provisions of the Act, or whether it is "invalid in whole or in part, and if so, in what part"; and that the Commonwealth Attorney was made a party defendant as the representative of the Commonwealth charged with the duty of enforcing the Act, and who, as such, "prepared the indictments referred to herein." No other reference, however, was made to any such indictments in the petition.

The plaintiffs prayed the court "by its judgment to declare what their rights and duties under said Act of 1924 are, and that a judgment be rendered declaring said Act of 1924 invalid, and for all proper relief."

The defendant demurred to the petition, on the ground, among others, that the court had no jurisdiction of the cause of action set forth, having no power or authority as a Federal Court to entertain a proceeding for a declaration of the rights of parties or to act under the provisions of the Declaratory Judgment Law of Kentucky. This demurrer was sustained. Twelve days later a final judgment was entered, reciting that the plaintiffs having failed to amend their petition, and the court being of opinion that it had no jurisdiction of the action, the same was dismissed. This direct writ of error was allowed upon the question of jurisdiction, under section 238 of the Judicial Code, before the amendment made by the Jurisdictional Act of 1925 became effective.

The sole purpose of the petition, as shown by its express allegations, is to obtain a declaration from the District Court of the rights and duties of the plaintiffs under the Act of 1924, and a determination of the extent to which they must comply with its provisions in the conduct of their business. This is its entire scope. While the Commonwealth Attorney is made a defendant as a representative of the Commonwealth, there is no semblance of any adverse litigation with him individually; there being neither any allegation that the plaintiffs have done or contemplate doing any of the things forbidden by the Act before being advised by the court as to their rights, nor any allegation that the Commonwealth Attorney has threatened to take or contemplates taking any action against them for any violation of the Act, either past or prospective. And no relief of any kind is prayed against him, by restraining action on his part or otherwise.

The question whether the District Court has jurisdiction to entertain such a petition for a declaration of rights admits of but one answer under the prior decisions of this Court.

We need not review these at length. It suffices to say that in the light of the decisions in Muskrat v. United States, 219 U. S. 346, 357; Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U. S. 126, 129; Texas v. Interstate Commerce Comm., 258 U. S. 158, 162; Keller v. Potomac Elec. Co., 261 U. S. 428, 444; Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U. S. 447, 488; New Jersey v. Sargent, 269 U. S. 328, 330, and Postum Cereal Co. v. California Fig-Nut Co., 272 U. S. 643, this day decided—in which the principles stated in earlier cases are considered and applied—it is not open to question that the judicial power vested by Article III of the Constitution in this Court and the inferior courts of United States established by Congress thereunder, extends only to "cases" and "controversies" in which the claims of litigants are brought before them for determination by such regular proceedings as are established for the protection and enforcement of rights, or the prevention, redress, or punishment of wrongs; and that their jurisdiction is limited to cases and controversies presented in such form, with adverse litigants, that the judicial power is capable of acting upon them, and pronouncing and carrying into effect a judgment between the parties, and does not extend to the determination of abstract questions or issues framed for the purpose of invoking the advice of the court without real parties or a real case.

[Here portions of the opinion in Muskrat v. United States, ante, p. 71 are quoted.]

And in New Jersey v. Sargent, supra, it was held that this Court could not entertain a bill for an injunction against federal officers charged with the administration of a federal statute, which did not show that any justiciable right of the State was being, or about to be, affected prejudicially by the application of the statute, but, in effect, sought merely to obtain an abstract judicial declaration that, in certain features, the statute exceeded the authority of Congress and encroached upon that of the State.

It follows necessarily from these decisions that the District Court, as a court of the United States established under Article III of the Constitution, had no jurisdiction to entertain the petition for the declaratory judgment.

Manifestly the Federal Conformity Statute, R. S. § 914 (U. S. Code, tit. 28, § 724) conferred upon the court no jurisdiction to proceed in accordance with the Declaratory Judgment Law of Kentucky. This statute relates only to "practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of procedure"; and neither purports to nor can extend the jurisdiction of the district courts beyond the constitutional limitations. See Southern Pacific Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202, 209; Mexican Central Ry. v. Pinkney, 149 U. S. 194, 206.

The plaintiffs in error also rely in argument here upon § 274a of the Judicial Code (U. S. Code, tit. 28, § 397), which provides that on finding that a suit at law should have been brought in equity, or vice versa, the court shall order any amendments to the pleadings which may be necessary to conform to the proper practice, and that any party may amend his pleadings so as to obviate the objection that his suit was not brought on the right side of the court. This statute relates merely to a case in which the objection is to the side of the court on which the suit is brought, and not to the entire lack of jurisdiction in the court. It is plain that it has no application here, where the court was without jurisdiction to entertain the petition for a declaratory judgment either upon the equity or the law side.

The judgment dismissing the petition for want of jurisdiction is accordingly

FIDELITY NATIONAL BANK AND TRUST CO. v. SWOPE ET AL.

1927. Supreme Court of the United States. 274 U. S. 123.

[The case involved the question whether a special procedure established by the charter of Kansas City, Missouri, for determining in a state court the validity of special tax levies for street improvements constituted a "case" or "controversy" within the judicial power of the United States either to review, or to be removable if the parties were citizens of different states. In part the charter provided:

> "The public work described above shall be provided for by ordinance, and the city may provide that after the passage of the ordinance and after an approximate estimate of the cost of the work shall have been made by the board of public works, the city shall file a proceeding in the circuit court of Jackson county, Missouri, in the name of the city, against the respective owners of land chargeable under the provisions of this section with the cost of such work. In such proceeding the city shall allege the passage and approval of the ordinance providing for the work, and the approximate estimate of the cost of said work; and shall define and set forth the limits of the benefit district, prescribed by the ordinance, within which it is proposed to assess property for the payment of said work. The prayer of the petition shall be that the court find and determine the validity of said ordinance, and the question of whether or not the respective tracts of land within said benefit district shall be charged with the lien of said work in the manner provided by said ordinance."]

MR. JUSTICE STONE delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

That this proceeding authorized by section 28 of the Kansas City Charter was judicial in character appears from an inspection of the statute and the record in the circuit court. The proposed improvement having been authorized, the benefit district established, the estimated cost ascertained, all by action of the city council or the board of public works essentially legislative in character, the jurisdiction of the state court was invoked in an adversary proceeding to determine the validity of the liens imposed or to be imposed under the ordinance. That court is a court of general jurisdiction, having plenary power to determine all questions arising under the state law or the laws and Constitution of the United States. Section 2436, Mo. Rev. Stat. 1919; Schmelzer v. Kansas City, 295 Mo. 322. These questions are required to be determined in a trial in accordance with the laws and Constitution of the state. The sole duty and power of the court is to pass upon questions of law and to inquire judicially into the facts so far as necessary to ascertain the applicable rules of law. See Keller v. Potomac Elec. Co., 261 U. S. 428, 440. Under this procedure, the judgment to be awarded finally determines, subject to appeal, the validity of the ordinance authorizing the improvement, the limits of the benefit district, the method of apportioning benefits, and the validity of the proposed liens. That the issues thus raised and judicially determined would constitute a case or controversy if raised and determined in a suit brought by the taxpayer to enjoin further proceedings under the ordinance could not fairly be questioned. Compare Risty v. Chicago, R. I. & Pac. Ry. Co., 270 U. S. 378. They cannot be deemed any the less so because, through a modified procedure, the parties are reversed and the same issues are raised and finally determined at the behest of the city. We do not think significant the fact that under section 28 the city might pay, though it did not, a part of the cost of the improvement and that the council, in authorizing the special tax, is required to deduct from the estimated cost the amount which may be paid by the city. These provisions could not restrict the authority or capacity of the court to pass upon the validity of the benefit district and the special tax actually authorized by the ordinance.

[11] See Declaratory Actions as "Cases" or "Controversies," by Edwin M. Borchard (1927) 36 Yale Law Jour. 845. Compare the following:—Several states by statute have allowed appeals to be taken in criminal cases by the state after acquittal not for the purpose of reversing the judgment, but for the purpose of obtaining a declaration of law to be followed in subsequent cases. In United States v. Evans (1907) 30 App. D. C. 58, affd. on certiorari in (1909) 213 U. S. 297, 53 L. ed. 803, it was held that to make a declaration of law on such an appeal was not a judicial function. Contra: State v. Allen (1920) 107 Kans. 407, 419, 191 Pac. 476 and other cases collected in 19 Mich. Law Rev. 79-80.

While ordinarily a case or judicial controversy results in a judgment requiring award of process of execution to carry it into effect, such relief is not an indispensable adjunct to the exercise of the judicial function. Naturalization proceedings, Tutun v. United States, 270 U. S. 568; suits to determine a matrimonial or other status; suits for instructions to a trustee or for the construction of a will, Traphagen v. Levy, 45 N. J. Eq. 448; bills of interpleader, so far as the stakeholder is concerned, Wakeman v. Kingsland, 46 N. J. Eq. 113; bills to quiet title where the plaintiff rests his claim on adverse possession, Sharon v. Tucker, 144 U. S. 533, are familiar examples of judicial proceedings which result in an adjudication of the rights of litigants, although execution is not necessary to carry the judgment into effect, in the sense that no damages are required to be paid or acts to be performed by the parties. Cf. Kennedy v. Babcock, 19 Misc. (N. Y.) 87; Cohen v. N. Y. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 50 N. Y. 610, 625. Nor is it essential that only established and generally recognized forms of remedy should be invoked.

"Whenever the law provides a remedy enforceable in the courts according to the regular course of legal procedure, and that remedy is pursued, there arises a case within the meaning of the Constitution, whether the subject of the litigation be property or status." Tutun v. United States, supra. 577.

Thus naturalization proceedings, Tutun v. United States, supra, or a special statutory proceeding to determine judicially whether the claim made by a domestic corporation against a foreign country upon which an award had been made by a United States commissioner pursuant to treaty, had been furthered by fraud, the statute authorizing distribution of the fund in accordance with the judgment, La Abra Silver Mining Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 423, are cases or controversies within the meaning of the Constitution.

Tregea v. Modesto Irrigation District, 164 U. S. 179, is cited as authority for the proposition that the proceeding had in the Missouri court is not judicial in character. But this court in that case rested its decision on its interpretation of the California statute in question. It held in effect that the proceeding authorized was not adversary, being a proceeding by the trustee of an irrigation district against the district itself, and that it was essentially ex parte, its purpose being to secure evidence on the basis of which the court could render an advisory opinion as to the validity of a pending bond issue. These were considerations which could only lead to the conclusion reached that the proceeding was not a case or controversy of which this court could take cognizance in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction.

The present statute admits of no such construction. The proceeding is in terms directed to be "against the respective owners of land chargeable under the provisions of this section with the cost of such work," and the specific issue to be determined by the judgment of the court is whether or not the respective tracts in the benefit district shall be charged with the lien as provided by the ordinance. The court is directed to render judgment "either validating such ordinance, and proposed lien against the lots, * * * within said benefit district or against such lots, * * * as the court may find legally chargeable, * * * or the court may render judgment that such ordinance or proposed lien are, in whole or in part, invalid and illegal." The plain effect of these provisions is to authorize the court to examine and determine the validity and effect of the legislative action in establishing the benefit district. The result of the proceeding is to establish judicially, as against the property owners in the district, the validity of such action and of the liens established or to be established conformably to the statute on the specific property described.

The issues presented and the subject-matter are such that the judicial power is capable of acting upon them. There is no want of adverse parties necessary to the creation of a controversy as in Muskrat v. United States, 219 U. S. 346. The judgment is not merely advisory as in Liberty Warehouse Co. v. Grannis, 273 U. S. 70; New Jersey v. Sargent, 269 U. S. 328; Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U. S. 126; Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U. S. 447; Texas v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 258 U. S. 158, 162. It operates to determine judicially the legal limits of the benefit district and to define rights of the parties in lands specifically described in the pleadings. So far as it affects owners of land in the benefit district who are citizens of other states, the controversy is a "suit" which may be removed to the federal courts. Jud. Code, § 28; Road District v. St. Louis Southwestern Ry., 257 U. S. 547.

PACIFIC STATES TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY v. OREGON.

1912. Supreme Court of the United States. 223 U. S. 118.

[In 1902 the State of Oregon amended its constitution and made provision, in addition to legislation by the ordinary legislatures, for legislation by popular initiative and direct vote of the people. By this method a statute taxing corporations was adopted. In a suit brought by the state to collect the tax the defendant, the telephone company, pleaded that the tax statute was invalid by reason of Article IV, Section 4 of the federal Constitution. The State Supreme Court affirmed a decision which sustained a demurrer to this defense and on writ of error the case was brought to this court. The chief contention of the plaintiff in error is:

"The guaranty of Article IV, Section 4, of the federal Constitution is to the people of the states, and to each citizen, as well as to the states as political entities. Section 4 of Article IV therefore prohibits the majority in any state from adopting an unrepublican constitution. The initiative is in contravention of a republican form of government. Government by the people directly is the attribute of a pure democracy and is subversive of the principles upon which the republic is founded. Direct legislation is, therefore, repugnant to that form of government with which alone Congress could admit a state to the Union and which the state is bound to maintain."]

We premise by saying that while the controversy which this record presents is of much importance, it is not novel. It is important, since it calls upon us to decide whether it is the duty of the courts or the province of Congress to determine when a state has ceased to be republican in form and to enforce the guarantee of the Constitution on that subject. It is not novel, as that question has long since been determined by this court conformably to the practice of the Government from the beginning to be political in character, and therefore not cognizable by the judicial power, but solely committed by the Constitution to the judgment of Congress. * * *

The contention [of the plaintiff in error], if held to be sound, would necessarily affect the validity, not only of the particular statute which is before us, but of every other statute passed in Oregon since the adoption of the initiative and referendum. And indeed the propositions go further than this, since in their essence they assert that there is no governmental function, legislative or judicial, in Oregon, because it cannot be assumed, if the proposition be well founded, that there is at one and the same time one and the same government which is republican in form and not of that character.

Before immediately considering the text of § 4 of Art. IV, in order to uncover and give emphasis to the anomalous and destructive effects upon both the state and the national governments which the adoption of the proposition implies, as illustrated by what we have just said, let us briefly fix the inconceivable expansion of the judicial power and the ruinous destruction of legislative authority in matters purely political which would necessarily be occasioned by giving sanction to the doctrine which underlies and would be necessarily involved in sustaining the propositions contended for. First. That however perfect and absolute may be the establishment and dominion in fact of a state government, however complete may be its participation in and enjoyment of all its powers and rights as a member of the national government, and however all the departments of that government may recognize such state government, nevertheless every citizen of such state or person subject to taxation therein, or owing any duty to the established government, may be heard, for the purpose of defeating the payment of such taxes or avoiding the discharge of such duty, to assail in a court of justice the rightful existence of the state. Second. As a result, it becomes the duty of the courts of the United States, where such a claim is made, to examine as a justiciable issue the contention as to the illegal existence of a state and if such contention be thought well founded to disregard the existence in fact of the state, of its recognition by all of the departments of the federal government, and practically award a decree absolving from all obligation to contribute to the support of or obey the laws of such established state government. And as a consequence of the existence of such judicial authority a power in the judiciary must be implied, unless it be that anarchy is to ensue, to build by judicial action upon the ruins of the previously established government a new one, a right which by its very terms also implies the power to control the legislative department of the government of the United States in the recognition of such new government and the admission of representatives therefrom, as well as to strip the executive department of that government of its otherwise lawful and discretionary authority. * * *

We shall not stop to consider the text to point out how absolutely barren it is of support for the contentions sought to be based upon it, since the repugnancy of those contentions to the letter and spirit of that text is so conclusively established by prior decisions of this court as to cause the matter to be absolutely foreclosed * * * [by] the leading and absolutely controlling case—Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1.

The case came from a Circuit Court of the United States. It was an action of damages for trespass. The case grew out of what is commonly known as the Dorr Rebellion in Rhode Island and the conflict which was brought about by the effort of the adherents of that alleged government sometimes described as "the government established by a voluntary convention" to overthrow the established charter government. The defendants justified on the ground that the acts done by them charged as a trespass were done under the authority of the charter government during the prevalence of martial law and for the purpose of aiding in the suppression of an armed revolt by the supporters of the insurrectionary government. The plaintiffs, on the contrary, asserted the validity of the voluntary government and denied the legality of the charter government. In the course of the trial the plaintiffs to support the contention of the illegality of the charter government and the legality of the voluntary government "although that government never was able to exercise any authority in the state nor to command obedience to its laws or to its officers," offered certain evidence tending to show that nevertheless it was "the lawful and established government," upon the ground that its powers to govern have been ratified by a large majority of the male people of the state of the age of 21 years and upwards and also by a large majority of those who were entitled to vote for general officers cast in favor of a constitution which was submitted as the result of a voluntarily assembled convention of what was alleged to be the people of the State of Rhode Island. The Circuit Court rejected this evidence and instructed the jury that as the charter government was the established state government at the time the trespass occurred, the defendants were justified in acting under the authority of that government. This court, coming to review this ruling, * * * pointed out that owing to the inherent political character of such a question its decision was not by the Constitution vested in the judicial department of the government, but was on the contrary exclusively committed to the legislative department by whose action on such subject the judiciary were absolutely controlled. The court said (p. 42):

"Moreover, the Constitution of the United States, as far as it has provided for an emergency of this kind, and authorized the general government to interfere in the domestic concerns of a state, has treated the subject as political in its nature, and placed the power in the hands of that department.

"The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guarantee to every state in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on the application of the legislature or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

"Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a state. For, as the United States guarantee to each state a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the state before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the senators and representatives of a state are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal. It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue; and as no senators or representatives were elected under the authority of the government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, Congress was not called upon to decide the controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there, and not in the courts."

Pointing out that Congress, by the act of February 28, 1795 (1 Stat. 424, c. 36), had recognized the obligation resting upon it to protect from domestic violence by conferring authority upon the president of the United States, on the application of the legislature of a state or of the governor, to call out the militia of any other state or states to suppress such insurrection, it was suggested that if the question of what was the rightful government within the intendment of § 4 of Art. IV was a judicial one, the duty to afford protection from invasion and to suppress domestic violence would be also judicial, since those duties were inseparably related to the determination of whether there was a rightful government. If this view were correct, it was intimated, it would follow that the delegation of authority made to the president by the act of 1795 would be void as a usurpation of judicial authority, and hence it would be the duty of the courts, if they differed with the judgment of the president as to the manner of discharging this great responsibility, to interfere and set at naught his action; and the pertinent statement was made (p. 43): "If the judicial power extends so far, the guarantee contained in the Constitution of the United States is a guarantee of anarchy, and not of order."

The fundamental doctrines thus so lucidly and cogently announced by the court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Taney in the case which we have thus reviewed, have never been doubted or questioned since, and have afforded the light guiding the orderly development of our constitutional system from the day of the deliverance of that decision up to the present time. * * *

It is indeed a singular misconception of the nature and character of our constitutional system of government to suggest that the settled distinction which the doctrine just stated points out between judicial authority over justiciable controversies and legislative power as to purely political questions tends to destroy the duty of the judiciary in proper cases to enforce the Constitution. The suggestion but results from failing to distinguish between things which are widely different, that is, the legislative duty to determine the political questions involved in deciding whether a state government republican in form exists, and the judicial power and ever-present duty whenever it becomes necessary in a controversy properly submitted to enforce and uphold the applicable provisions of the Constitution as to each and every exercise of governmental power.

How better can the broad lines which distinguish these two subjects be pointed out than by considering the character of the defense in this very case? The defendant company does not contend here that it could not have been required to pay a license tax. It does not assert that it was denied an opportunity to be heard as to the amount for which it was taxed, or that there was anything inhering in the tax or involved intrinsically in the law which violated any of its constitutional rights. If such questions had been raised they would have been justiciable, and therefore would have required the calling into operation of judicial power. Instead, however, of doing any of these things, the attack on the statute here made is of a wholly different character. Its essentially political nature is at once made manifest by understanding that the assault which the contention here advanced makes is not on the tax as a tax, but on the State as a State. It is addressed to the framework and political character of the government by which the statute levying the tax was passed. It is the government, the political entity, which (reducing the case to its essence) is called to the bar of this court, not for the purpose of testing judicially some exercise of power assailed, on the ground that its exertion has injuriously affected the rights of an individual because of repugnancy to some constitutional limitation, but to demand of the state that it establish its right to exist as a state, republican in form.

As the issues presented, in their very essence, are, and have long since by this court been, definitely determined to be political and governmental, and embraced within the scope of the powers conferred upon Congress, and not therefore within the reach of judicial power, it follows that the case presented is not within our jurisdiction, and the writ of error must therefore be, and it is, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS v. MELLON, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY ET AL.

FROTHINGHAM v. MELLON, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY ET AL.

1923. Supreme Court of the United States. 262 U. S. 447.

Mr. Justice Sutherland delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases were argued and will be considered and disposed of together. The first is an original suit in this Court. The other was brought in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. That court dismissed the bill and its decree was affirmed by the District Court of Appeals. Thereupon the case was brought here by appeal. Both cases challenge the constitutionality of the Act of November 23, 1921, c. 135, 42 Stat. 224, commonly called the Maternity Act. Briefly, it provides for an initial appropriation and thereafter annual appropriations for a period of five years, to be apportioned among such of the several states as shall accept and comply with its provisions, for the purpose of co-operating with them to reduce maternal and infant mortality and protect the health of mothers and infants. It creates a bureau to administer the act in co-operation with state agencies, which are required to make such reports concerning their operations and expenditures as may be prescribed by the federal bureau. Whenever that bureau shall determine that funds have not been properly expended in respect of any State, payments may be withheld.

It is asserted that these appropriations are for purposes not national, but local to the states, and together with numerous similar appropriations constitute an effective means of inducing the states to yield a portion of their sovereign rights. It is further alleged that the burden of the appropriations provided by this act and similar legislation falls unequally upon the several states, and rests largely upon the industrial states, such as Massachusetts; that the act is a usurpation of power not granted to Congress by the Constitution—an attempted exercise of the power of local self-government reserved to the states by the Tenth Amendment; and that the defendants are proceeding to carry the act into operation. In the Massachusetts case it is alleged that the plaintiff's rights and powers as a sovereign state and the rights of its citizens have been invaded and usurped by these expenditures and acts; and that, although the state has not accepted the act, its constitutional rights are infringed by the passage thereof and the imposition upon the state of an illegal and unconstitutional option either to yield to the federal government a part of its reserved rights or lose the share which it would otherwise be entitled to receive of the moneys appropriated. In the Frothingham case plaintiff alleges that the effect of the statute will be to take her property, under the guise of taxation, without due process of law.

We have reached the conclusion that the cases must be disposed of for want of jurisdiction without considering the merits of the constitutional questions.

In the first case, the State of Massachusetts presents no justiciable controversy either in its own behalf or as the representative of its citizens. The appellant in the second suit has no such interest in the subject-matter, nor is any such injury inflicted or threatened, as will enable her to sue.

First. The State of Massachusetts in its own behalf, in effect, complains that the act in question invades the local concerns of the state, and is a usurpation of power, viz.: the power of local self-government reserved to the states.

Probably, it would be sufficient to point out that the powers of the state are not invaded, since the statute imposes no obligation but simply extends an option which the state is free to accept or reject. But we do not rest here. Under Article III, § 2, of the Constitution, the judicial power of this Court extends "to controversies * * * between a State and citizens of another State" and the Court has original jurisdiction "in all cases * * * in which a State shall be party." The effect of this is not to confer jurisdiction upon the Court merely because a state is a party, but only where it is a party to a proceeding of judicial cognizance. Proceedings not of a justiciable character are outside the contemplation of the constitutional grant. In Wisconsin v. Pelican Insurance Co., 127 U. S. 265, 289, Mr. Justice Gray, speaking for the Court, said:

"As to 'controversies between a State and citizens of another State.' The object of vesting in the courts of the United States jurisdiction of suits by one state against the citizens of another was to enable such controversies to be determined by a national tribunal, and thereby to avoid the partiality, or suspicion of partiality, which might exist if the plaintiff state were compelled to resort to the courts of the state of which the defendants were citizens. Federalist No. 80; Chief Justice Jay, in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419, 475; Story on the Constitution, §§ 1638, 1682. The grant is of 'judicial power,' and was not intended to confer upon the courts of the United States jurisdiction of a suit or prosecution by the one state, of such a nature that it could not, on the settled principles of public and international law, be entertained by the judiciary of the other state at all."

That was an action brought by the State of Wisconsin to enforce a judgment of one of its own courts for a penalty against a resident of another state, and, in pursuance of the doctrine announced by the language just quoted, this Court declined to assume jurisdiction upon the ground that the courts of no country will execute the penal laws of another.

In an earlier case it was held that a proceeding by mandamus by one state to compel the governor of another to surrender a fugitive from justice was not within the powers of the judicial department, since the duty of the governor in the premises was in the nature of a moral rather than a legal obligation. Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. 66, 109. In New Hampshire v. Louisiana; New York v. Louisiana, 108 U. S. 76, this Court declined to take jurisdiction of actions to enforce payment of the bonds of another state for the benefit of the assignors, citizens of the plaintiff states. In Georgia v. Stanton, 6 Wall. 50, 75, and kindred cases, to which we shall presently refer, jurisdiction was denied in respect of questions of a political or governmental character. On the other hand, jurisdiction was maintained in Texas v. White, 7 Wall. 700; Florida v. Anderson, 91 U. S. 667; and Alabama v. Burr, 115 U. S. 413, because proprietary rights were involved; in Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230, 237, because the right of dominion of the state over the air and soil within its domain was affected; in Missouri v. Holland, 252 U. S. 416, because, as asserted, there was an invasion, by acts done and threatened, of the quasi-sovereign right of the state to regulate the taking of wild game within its borders; and in other cases because boundaries were in dispute. It is not necessary to cite additional cases. The foregoing, for present purposes, sufficiently indicate the jurisdictional line of demarcation.

What, then, is the nature of the right of the state here asserted and how is it affected by this statute? Reduced to its simplest terms, it is alleged that the statute constitutes an attempt to legislate outside the powers granted to Congress by the Constitution and within the field of local powers exclusively reserved to the states. Nothing is added to the force or effect of this assertion by the further incidental allegations that the ulterior purpose of Congress thereby was to induce the states to yield a portion of their sovereign rights; that the burden of the appropriations falls unequally upon the several states; and that there is imposed upon the states an illegal and unconstitutional option either to yield to the federal government a part of their reserved rights or lose their share of the moneys appropriated. But what burden is imposed upon the states, unequally or otherwise? Certainly there is none, unless it be the burden of taxation, and that falls upon their inhabitants, who are within the taxing power of Congress as well as that of the states where they reside. Nor does the statute require the states to do or to yield anything. If Congress enacted it with the ulterior purpose of tempting them to yield, that purpose may be effectively frustrated by the simple expedient of not yielding.

In the last analysis, the complaint of the plaintiff state is brought to the naked contention that Congress has usurped the reserved powers of the several states by the mere enactment of the statute, though nothing has been done and nothing is to be done without their consent; and it is plain that that question, as it is thus presented, is political and not judicial in character, and therefore is not a matter which admits of the exercise of the judicial power.

In Georgia v. Stanton, supra, this Court held that a bill to enjoin the Secretary of War, and other officers, from carrying into execution certain acts of Congress, which it was asserted would annul and abolish the existing state government and establish another and different one in its place, called for a judgment upon a political question and presented no case within the jurisdiction of the Court. Mr. Justice Nelson, speaking for the Court, said (6 Wall. 77):

"That these matters, both as stated in the body of the bill, and, in the prayers for relief, call for the judgment of the court upon political questions, and, upon rights, not of persons or property, but of a political character, will hardly be denied. For the rights for the protection of which our authority is invoked, are the rights of sovereignty, of political jurisdiction, of government, of corporate existence as a state, with all its constitutional powers and privileges. No case of private rights or private property infringed, or in danger of actual or threatened infringement, is presented by the bill, in a judicial form, for the judgment of the court."

In Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. 1, an injunction was sought to prevent certain acts of legislation from being carried into execution within the territory of the Cherokee Nation of Indians, the original jurisdiction of this Court being invoked on the ground that plaintiff was a foreign nation. It was asserted that the acts in question, if executed, would have the effect of subverting the tribal government and subjecting the Indians to the jurisdiction of the State of Georgia. It was held that the Cherokee Nation could not be regarded as a foreign nation, within the meaning of the Judiciary Act, but Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the opinion for the majority, said, further (p. 20):

"That part of the bill which respects the land occupied by the Indians, and prays the aid of the court to protect their possession, may be more doubtful. The mere question of right might, perhaps, be decided by this court, in a proper case, with proper parties. But the court is asked to do more than decide on the title. The bill requires us to control the legislature of Georgia, and to restrain the exertion of its physical force. The propriety of such an interposition by the court may be well questioned; it savors too much of the exercise of political power, to be within the proper province of the judicial department." And Mr. Justice Thompson, with whom Mr. Justice Story concurred, in the course of an opinion, said (p. 75):

"It is only where the rights of persons or property are involved, and when such rights can be presented under some judicial form of proceedings, that courts of justice can interpose relief. This court can have no right to pronounce an abstract opinion upon the constitutionality of a state law. Such law must be brought into actual or threatened operation, upon rights properly falling under judicial cognizance, or a remedy is not to be had here." See also Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1; Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall. 475, 500; Pacific Telephone Co. v. Oregon, 223 U. S. 118; Louisiana v. Texas, 176 U. S. 1, 23; Fairchild v. Hughes, 258 U. S. 126.

It follows that in so far as the case depends upon the assertion of a right on the part of the state to sue in its own behalf we are without jurisdiction. In that aspect of the case we are called upon to adjudicate, not rights of person or property, not rights of dominion over physical domain, not quasi-sovereign rights actually invaded or threatened, but abstract questions of political power, of sovereignty, of government. No rights of the state falling within the scope of the judicial power have been brought within the actual or threatened operation of the statute and this Court is as much without authority to pass abstract opinions upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress as it was held to be, in Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, supra, of state statutes. If an alleged attempt by congressional action to annul and abolish an existing state government "with all its constitutional powers and privileges," presents no justiciable issue, as was ruled in Georgia v. Stanton, supra, no reason can be suggested why it should be otherwise where the attempt goes no farther, as it is here alleged, than to propose to share with the state the field of state power.

We come next to consider whether the suit may be maintained by the state as the representative of its citizens. To this the answer is not doubtful. We need not go so far as to say that a state may never intervene by suit to protect its citizens against any form of enforcement of unconstitutional acts of Congress; but we are clear that the right to do so does not arise here. Ordinarily, at least, the only way in which a state may afford protection to its citizens in such cases is through the enforcement of its own criminal statutes, where that is appropriate, or by opening its courts to the injured persons for the maintenance of civil suits or actions. But the citizens of Massachusetts are also citizens of the United States. It cannot be conceded that a state, as parens patriae, may institute judicial proceedings to protect citizens of the United States from the operation of the statutes thereof. While the state, under some circumstances, may sue in that capacity for the protection of its citizens (Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U. S. 208, 241), it is no part of its duty or power to enforce their rights in respect of their relations with the federal government. In that field it is the United States, and not the state, which represents then as parens patriae, when such representation becomes appropriate; and to the former, and not to the latter, they must look for such protective measures as flow from that status.

Second. The attack upon the statute in the Frothingham case is, generally, the same, but this plaintiff alleges in addition that she is a taxpayer of the United States; and her contention, though not clear, seems to be that the effect of the appropriations complained of will be to increase the burden of future taxation and thereby take her property without due process of law. The right of a taxpayer to enjoin the execution of a federal appropriation act, on the ground that it is invalid and will result in taxation for illegal purposes, has never been passed upon by this Court. In cases where it was presented, the question has either been allowed to pass sub silentio or the determination of it expressly withheld. Millard v. Roberts, 202 U. S. 429, 438; Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U. S. 24, 31; Bradfield v. Roberts, 175 U. S. 291, 295. The case last cited came here from the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, and that court sustained the right of the plaintiff to sue by treating the case as one directed against the District of Columbia, and therefor subject to the rule frequently stated by this Court, that resident taxpayers may sue to enjoin an illegal use of the moneys of a municipal corporation. Roberts v. Bradfield, 12 App. D. C. 453, 459-460. The interest of a taxpayer of a municipality in the application of its moneys is direct and immediate and the remedy by injunction to prevent their misuse is not inappropriate. It is upheld by a large number of state cases and is the rule of this Court. Crampton v. Zabriskie, 101 U. S. 601, 609. Nevertheless, there are decisions to the contrary. See, for example, Miller v. Grandy, 13 Mich. 540, 550. The reasons which support the extension of the equitable remedy to a single taxpayer in such cases are based upon the peculiar relation of the corporate taxpayer to the corporation, which is not without some resemblance to that subsisting between stockholder and private corporation. IV Dillon Municipal Corporations, 5th ed., § 1580, et seq. But the relation of a taxpayer of the United States to the federal government is very different. His interest in the moneys of the Treasury—partly realized from taxation and partly from other sources—is shared with millions of others; is comparatively minute and indeterminable; and the effect upon future taxation, of any payment out of the funds, so remote, fluctuating and uncertain, that no basis is afforded for an appeal to the preventive powers of a court of equity.

The administration of any statute, likely to produce additional taxation to be imposed upon a vast number of taxpayers, the extent of whose several liability is indefinite and constantly changing, is essentially a matter of public and not of individual concern. If one taxpayer may champion and litigate such a cause, then every other taxpayer may do the same, not only in respect of the statute here under review but also in respect of every other appropriation act and statute whose administration requires the outlay of public money, and whose validity may be questioned. The bare suggestion of such a result, with its attendant inconveniences, goes far to sustain the conclusion which we have reached, that a suit of this character cannot be maintained. It is of much significance that no precedent sustaining the right to maintain suits like this has been called to our attention, although, since the formation of the government, as an examination of the acts of Congress will disclose, a large number of statutes appropriating or involving the expenditure of moneys for non-federal purposes have been enacted and carried into effect.

The functions of government under our system are apportioned. To the legislative department has been committed the duty of making laws; to the executive the duty of executing them; and to the judiciary the duty of interpreting and applying them in cases properly brought before the courts. The general rule is that neither department may invade the province of the other and neither may control, direct or restrain the action of the other. We are not now speaking of the merely ministerial duties of officials. Gaines v. Thompson, 7 Wall. 347. We have no power per se to review and annul acts of Congress on the ground that they are unconstitutional. That question may be considered only when the justification for some direct injury suffered or threatened, presenting a justiciable issue, is made to rest upon such an act. Then the power exercised is that of ascertaining and declaring the law applicable to the controversy. It amounts to little more than the negative power to disregard an unconstitutional enactment, which otherwise would stand in the way of the enforcement of a legal right. The party who invokes the power must be able to show not only that the statute is invalid but that he has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury as the result of its enforcement, and not merely that he suffers in some indefinite way in common with people generally. If a case for preventive relief be presented the court enjoins, in effect, not the execution of the statute, but the acts of the official, the statute notwithstanding. Here the parties plaintiff have no such case. Looking through forms of words to the substance of their complaint, it is merely that officials of the executive department of the government are executing and will execute an act of Congress asserted to be unconstitutional; and this we are asked to prevent. To do so would be not to decide a judicial controversy, but to assume a position of authority over the governmental acts of another and co-equal department, an authority which plainly we do not possess.

No. 24, Original, dismissed.
No. 962 [Frothingham case] affirmed.

BURKE v. SNIVELY.

1904. Supreme Court of Illinois. 208 Ill. 328.

Mr. Justice Boggs delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill in chancery filed in the circuit court of Sangamon county by the appellant, against the appellees Snively, Newton and Sackett, in their official capacity as Commissioners of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, and the appellee James S. McCullough, as Auditor of Public Accounts of the state, and the appellee Fred A. Busse, as Treasurer of the state, to restrain the said Auditor of Public Accounts from drawing his warrant in favor of the said canal commissioners for certain sums of money appropriated by an act of the General Assembly approved May 15, 1903, (Laws of 1903, p. 45,) for the maintenance and protection of the Illinois and Michigan canal and for the necessary and extraordinary expenses thereof, and enjoining the said state Treasurer from paying any moneys out of the public funds of the state on any such warrant, should one be or have been drawn. * * *

The bill alleges that the complainant is a citizen of the State of Illinois and the owner of real and personal property which is subject to taxation in said state and is taxed therein, and further alleges that such appropriations of the public moneys are prohibited by the provisions of the constitution of 1870 with reference to canals, and that the acts of the legislature authorizing such appropriations of the public moneys are therefore void, and the prayer of the bill is, that such alleged misappropriation of the moneys of the state be restrained and enjoined. Appellees contend the bill is a suit against the State of Illinois, and should be dismissed for the reason that section 26 of article 4 of the constitution of 1870 declares the state shall not be made a party to any action at law or suit in chancery.

The bill is not a suit against the state. It does not implead or ask any relief against the state. The relief asked is, that officials of the state charged by law with the performance of official duties be restrained from a misuse of moneys entrusted to them or from applying such moneys to purposes not warranted by law. * * *

In equity the money in the state treasury is the money of the people of the state, and suits by a tax-payer to restrain the misappropriation by public officers of such money to an unauthorized purpose are not suits against the state. We have frequently maintained the jurisdiction of courts of equity to entertain bills in behalf of tax-payers to restrain misappropriation of funds by public authorities. * * *

An unconstitutional statute is not law, and an appropriation of public funds in pursuance of an unconstitutional statute is a misuse of funds, which may be restrained by injunction. * * *

We may therefore consider the contention of the appellant that the General Assembly was wanting in power to authorize the public moneys to be taken out of the treasury of the state and applied to maintenance and operation of the Illinois and Michigan canal. [The court held that the appropriation statute conflicted with the canal provision of the state constitution, that the circuit court erred in dissolving the temporary injunction, that it should have granted a perpetual injunction, and remanded the case to it with directions to do so.][12]

[12] Where under a statute which in alleged violation of the state constitution gave O'Connell as county treasurer and tax collector in addition to his salary a percentage of inheritance taxes collected by him, the court said: "It is further contended that the complainant [as 'owner of property' and 'taxpayer'] could not resort to a court of equity to prevent the illegal appropriation of a part of the inheritance taxes because he had contributed nothing to that fund, but any difference in right based on that ground is without substance. * * * If the defendant, William L. O'Connell, has retained and appropriated to himself moneys which belong in the public fund the amount would have to be replaced by taxation, the burden of which would fall upon the taxpayers." Jones v. O'Connell (1915) 266 Ill. 443, 450-451, 107 N. E. 731.

A bill to enjoin the highest officers of the state from expending public money in pursuance of a statute may be brought "to test the validity and constitutionality" of the statute, by "any taxpayer" "to enable him to protect public rights" even though he has no special interest and would suffer no special injury,

ASPLUND v. HANNETT ET AL.

1926. Supreme Court of New Mexico. 31 N. Mex. 641.

WATSON, J. * * * On what does appellant base his claim of right to invoke the equitable remedy of injunction? The wrong alleged is the enactment of Laws 1925, c. 66, in violation of the constitution, and the proposal of the governor to carry out its provisions. The result is an illegal misapplication of public moneys. A citizen and taxpayer can have but two interests; his interest in the upholding and enforcement of the Constitution, and his interest to prevent illegal imposition of taxes. There is no warrant for any distinction between the taxpaying and the nontaxpaying citizen as respects his interest in upholding the constitution generally. As a taxpayer he has an interest in the disposition of the state's property and funds according as his taxes may be affected thereby. So we seem to have two questions: The first, whether a citizen may appeal to the courts to prevent a violation of the constitution; the second, whether a taxpayer may apply to them to prevent misuse of public funds.

The first question does not, in our judgment, require extended discussion. In our scheme of government, the function of the courts is to declare and apply the law in the decision of justiciable controversies. We are not placed over the other departments of government, generally, to review or interfere with their acts, as the special guardian of the constitution. Ours is the judicial power. In the exercise of that power—the hearing and determination of causes of action—we necessarily enforce the supremacy of the constitution and disregard all enactments and proceedings violative of it. That is the beginning and the end of the much discussed and misunderstood power of the courts to declare the unconstitutionality of statutes. From many expositions of this doctrine we select two which come readily to hand, and insert them here. [Quotations from Lieber's Civil Liberty and Self-Government (1888), p. 162 and Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th ed.) 76-78 [8th ed. 104-107] are omitted.]

The constitutionality of a statute is not in itself a cause of action, nor a head of equity jurisdiction. Cruickshank v. Bidwell, 176 U. S. 73; Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U. S. 197; Muskrat v. United States, 219 U. S. 346.

So we conclude that, as a citizen, appellant is without standing to question the constitutionality of the act in question, and we proceed to the consideration of the other question, Has a taxpayer held in White Eagle Oil & Ref. Co. v. Gunderson (1925) 48 S. Dak. 608, 205 N. W. 614, 43 A. L. R. 397. (Semble also that "any elector" may bring such a bill.)

such an interest as entitles him to an injunction to restrain devastavit of public funds?

Of course, it is well understood that equity awards its injunctive writ only to prevent irreparable injury for which there is no adequate and complete remedy at law. The injury must consist, to speak broadly, in the invasion of some right of the complaining party. We have here to determine whether appellant's right meets the requirements. We have already decided that he has no right, cognizable by courts, to complain solely of a violation of the constitution. Such right as he there possesses is political, enforceable only as other political rights are maintainable. The right we now seek is a legal right. As it is asserted only in connection with his status as a taxpayer, it is a right affecting his property, through the fact that he contributes to the expense of government by enforced contributions in the form of taxes. As already pointed out, it is not satisfactorily shown that appellant will be in any way injuriously affected in his property by the proposed expenditures. Perhaps his failure to show such injury should be deemed decisive. We prefer, however, to assume, for the purposes of this case, that the necessary result of the proposed use of the "permanent reservoirs for irrigating purposes, income fund," will result in increasing state taxes. * * *

In a note entitled, "Right of citizen or taxpayer to enjoin waste or unlawful expenditure of state funds," L. R. A. 1915D, 178, it is said that such right "seems generally sustained in California, Florida, Hawaii, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Oregon, Pennsylvania, and Tennessee, and perhaps in Colorado and Kansas." It is further said: "The action is not allowed in New York, Louisiana, South Dakota, and Washington," and that "the same has been held in a federal court and in Porto Rico." After abstracting decisions from these jurisdictions, other decisions are classified as being "inconclusive or doubtful." The author expresses no view as to which is the better doctrine. Accepting the correctness of the classification, more jurisdictions are to be counted as supporting appellant's contention. [A review of many cases is omitted.]

Where the courts have discussed, on principle, the taxpayer's right to enjoin waste or misapplication of state funds, we find generally that they have been influenced by the lack of any other remedy or by the supposed duty of the court always to check a threatened violation of the constitution.

The lack of other remedy is not sufficient. True, lack of an adequate remedy at law is essential to the jurisdiction of equity in injunction, but it does not in itself give rise to it. The party seeking the relief must have a right in respect to which he is threatened with irreparable injury. So the existence of the right is as essential as the lack of other remedy. There are many rights for which the citizen must look to the other branches of his government, and which it is not within the power of the courts to secure to him. To vindicate such rights his remedies are political.

Enough has already been said of the mistaken view that the judiciary alone is responsible for the upholding of the constitution. Within our own field we have that responsibility. But if we invade those of the legislative or of the executive, we ourselves become violators of the fundamental law.

It has seemed to some courts an important consideration that the attorney general (the public's law officer) could not be expected, because of his position or affiliation, to intervene in the public behalf, or that he had actually appeared in opposition. This, it seems to us, is not a matter for consideration. What may be the attorney general's right or duty in the premises cannot be decisive. Even if the constitution and statutes have failed to provide for any remedy, it is not for the courts to create one. As said in Long v. Johnson, supra: [70 Misc. Rep. 308, 127 N. Y. S. 756.]

> "It is true that the doctrine that redress of alleged public wrongs must be sought only through the state or its law officers and not by an individual, receives, as suggested by the attorney for the plaintiff here—a somewhat severe jolt, when as in this case actual or proposed wrongdoing is alleged against a state commission and the attorney general appears in the defense of the officials attacked; nevertheless courts must proceed according to the existing statutes and decisions and new remedies, if desirable, must be furnished by the legislature."

The cases which we have examined involve many other points than that we have under consideration—the ministerial or discretionary character of the official duty, whether it is a suit against the state, whether the same principles apply in injunction and mandamus. In most of them the constitutionality of statutes is involved along with the question of the taxpayer's injury, because of the illegal expenditure. Different constitutional and statutory provisions are under consideration bearing upon all of these questions. Anything like an analysis it would be impracticable for us to attempt. We are satisfied, however, that the injunction here prayed for is the ordinary equitable writ and remedy. Whatever may be its nature when originally granted in the Supreme Court, issued from the district court, it is not a prerogative nor a quasi prerogative writ. It is a private remedy for the protection of individual rights, except as the state may have occasion to appear as plaintiff. An individual, to invoke the remedy, must have legal or equitable rights to be protected. A right which he shares, as a taxpayer, in common with all other taxpayers, is not such an individual right as qualifies him, under general principles, to relief by injunction. Exception has been made where the threatened injury to taxpayers consists in devastavit of municipal funds. This exception is perhaps better supported by practical considerations than on principle. A minority of courts consider it enlargement of equity jurisdiction by judicial decision. Even so, it does not run counter to any fundamental principle of government. But to extend the doctrine so as to entertain a private suit to restrain the acts of a co-ordinate branch of the government, the injurious effects of which acts are public only, we cannot regard otherwise than as usurpation of power not conferred. * * *

Not having found any legal or logical principle to support a taxpayer's suit to enjoin the expenditure of state funds, we are constrained to hold that he has no such right in this state. We hold to this view notwithstanding the contrary conclusion of eminent judges and able courts, and an apparently increasing tendency to admit the right. * * *

STATE EX REL. BUFORD v. CARLEY ET AL.

1925. Supreme Court of Florida. 89 Fla. 361.

Whitfield, J.—In quo warranto proceedings brought by the Attorney General of the state to test the validity of Chapter 9686, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1923, under which the functions of a municipal corporation called Belleair Heights are being exercised, [the statute was challenged on the ground that, being one of numerous bills that were rushed through during the last hour of the legislative session some of the procedure required by the state constitution for the enactment of statutes was not observed.]

The purpose of the provision of the constitution that "every bill shall be read by its sections * * * on its final passage" is to inform the legislators and the public of the contents of each bill and to prevent hasty legislation.

Our constitution does not require that the journals shall show affirmatively that a bill was read "by sections" on its final passage, and if they do not so show, the presumption, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, would be that it was read by sections as required. * * * Acts of the legislature duly enrolled and signed by the officers of the two houses and filed in the office of the secretary of state with the approval of the governor thereon, are prima facie valid and authoritative laws, but the journals of the two houses that enacted them may be resorted to to ascertain whether the mandatory requirements of the constitution have been complied with by the legislature in their enactment, and if such journals show explicitly, clearly and affirmatively that any essential constitutional requirement has not been complied with, or if they fail to show any essential step in the progress of enactment that the constitution expressly requires them to show, such for example, as the entry of the aye and noes upon the final passage of any bill in either house, then such journals would prevail as evidence, and the enrolled bill, as evidence of law, would have to fall. The journals kept by the two houses of the legislature of their proceedings are public records of which the courts of the state will take judicial notice. State ex rel. Turner v. Hocker, 36 Fla. 358, text 359, 18 South. Rep. 767.

Parol evidence is not admissible against the affirmative showing of the journals of the legislature. Wade v. Atlantic Lumber Co., 51 Fla. 638, 41 South. Rep. 72. * * *

The courts have no substantive power to review and nullify legislative proceedings or enactments; but, in adjudicating litigated rights under a statute, the courts may determine whether the legislative journals show that the statute was not duly enacted. * * *

Even if the legislative journal of the senate conclusively shows that the senate was in session only one hour and seventeen minutes, and even if the court may by a judicial consideration of natural laws find that it was a physical impossibility for each of the bills passed during the session of one hour and seventeen minutes to have been consecutively "read by its sections" "on its final passage," yet only one of the bills is here involved, and that one could easily have been separately "read by its sections" "on its final passage," and parol evidence not being admissible to contradict the legislative journal entries, it must be assumed that as to the bill here involved, the journal entry that it was "read by its sections" "on its final passage," is true. The court will not assume that legislative journal entries as to the bill in litigation are untrue; and the truth of such entries as to other bills is not presented for adjudication. This should be the holding here, even though upon a challenge of the validity of each of the other bills passed at the same sitting of the senate, a similar result would follow, and consequently all of the enacted bills would be held valid, when it was in fact an impossibility to read and pass all of them in the manner that is mandatorily required by the constitution, within the time during which the journal states that the senate was in session. A similar discussion applies to the proceedings of the house. * * *[13]

The writ is dismissed.

[13] "So far as provisions of the state constitution are affected, their construction by the Supreme Court of the state is conclusive on the national courts. This disposes of the assignment of error about local and special bills, notice of which had not been published, [as required by the state constitution] as it is the settled law of the state that the legislature is the sole judge whether this provision has been complied with, and if it chose to disregard it, and passed a bill without

McCHORD v. LOUISVILLE AND NASHVILLE R. R. CO.

1902. Supreme Court of the United States. 183 U. S. 483.

These are appeals from the final decrees of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky, perpetually enjoining Charles C. McChord and others, railroad commissioners of the State of Kentucky, from doing any of the things required by, or from taking any action whatever against complainants under a certain act of the general assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, approved March 10, 1900, c. 2, * * *

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court.

By the decrees the Railroad Commission of the Commonwealth of Kentucky was permanently restrained from proceeding under the act of March 10, 1900, which was alleged and held to be unconstitutional.

Conceding that the mere fact that a duly enacted law is unconstitutional does not entitle a party to relief by injunction against proceedings in compliance therewith, it is contended that ground of equity jurisdiction existed here in the want of adequate remedy by the ordinary processes of law for the threatened consequences of the exercise of the power to fix rates in multiplicity of suits and irreparable injury. * * *

The fixing of rates is essentially legislative in its character, and the general rule is that legislative action cannot be interfered with by injunction. * * *

In New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. New Orleans, 164 U. S. 471, 472, the general rule was stated and applied, and Mr. Justice Harlan, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "We repeat that when the city council shall pass an ordinance that infringes the rights of the plaintiff, and is unconstitutional and void as impairing the obligation of its contract with the state, it will be time enough for equity to interfere, and, by injunction to prevent the execution of such ordinance. If the ordinances already passed are in derogation of the plaintiff's contract rights, their enforcement can be prevented by appropriate proceedings instituted directly against the parties who seek to have the benefit of them. This may involve the plaintiff in a multiplicity of actions. But that circumstance cannot justify any such decree as it asks."

The rule was also applied by Mr. Justice Field in Alpers v. San Francisco, 32 Fed. Rep. 503, where complainant sought an injuncnotice having been published, no issue upon the subject can be raised in the courts. Davis v. Gaines, 48 Ark. 370, 385, 3 S. W. 184; Waterman v. Hawkins, 75 Ark. 120, 86 S. W. 844; Caton v. Western Clay Drainage Dist., 87 Ark. 8, 112 S. W. 145." Bush v. Branson (1918) 248 Fed. 377, 379.

tion to restrain the passage of an ordinance which he alleged would impair the obligation of a contract he had with the city. Mr. Justice Field said: "This no one will question as applied to the power of the legislature of the state. The suggestion of any such jurisdiction of the court over that body would not be entertained for a moment. The same exemption from judicial interference applies to all legislative bodies, so far as their legislative discretion extends. * * * The courts cannot in the one case forbid the passage of a law nor in the other the passage of a resolution, order or ordinance. If by either body, the legislature or the board of supervisors, an unconstitutional act be passed, its enforcement may be arrested. The parties seeking to execute the invalid act can be reached by the courts, while the legislative body of the state or of the municipality, in the exercise of its legislative discretion, is beyond their jurisdiction. The fact that in either case the legislative action threatened may be in disregard of constitutional restraints, and impair the obligation of a contract, as alleged in this case, does not affect the question. It is legislative discretion which is exercised, and that discretion, whether rightfully or wrongfully exercised, is not subject to interference by the judiciary." * * *

The result of these considerations is that the duty of enforcing its rates rests on the commission and that none of the consequences alleged to be threatened can be set up as the basis of equity interposition before the rates are fixed at all. Whether after they are determined their enforcement can be restrained is a question not arising for decision on this record,[14] and we are not called on to dispose of other contentions of grave importance, which were pressed in argument, as if now requiring adjudication.

Decrees reversed and cases remanded to the Circuit Court with a direction to sustain the demurrers and dismiss the bills.[15]

[14] The cases are numerous in which the enforcement of rates fixed by state commissions has been enjoined by a federal court when the rates have been found by the court to be so low as to be "confiscatory" and therefore in violation of the due process of law clause of the Fourteenth Amendment,—that is, the executive or administrative, not the legislative, action of the commissions has been enjoined. "The principle is not confined to the maintenance of suits for restraining the enforcement of statutes which as enacted by the state legislature are in themselves unconstitutional. Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 154 U. S. 362, 390, 38 L. ed. 1021, was a case not of an unconstitutional statute, but of confiscatory, and therefore unconstitutional, action taken by a state commission under a constitutional statute. * * * In Raymond v. Chicago Union Trac. Co., 207 U. S. 20, 38, 52 L. ed. 78, 12 Ann. Cas. 757, the court upheld the right of action in a federal court to restrain the collection of taxes that had been assessed at a different rate and by a different method from that employed with respect to other taxpayers of the same class, in defiance of the provisions of a constitutional statute that required equalization, and also in denial of the equal protection of the laws within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment." Greene v. Louisville & Interurban R. Co. (1917) 244 U. S. 499, 507, 61 L. ed. 1280, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 88.

SPIES v. BYERS, COUNTY CLERK ET AL.

1919. Supreme Court of Illinois. 287 Ill. 627.

MR. JUSTICE CARTWRIGHT delivered the opinion of the court.

The appellant, Louis G. Spies, filed his bill in the circuit court of Sangamon county on July 31, 1918, alleging that he was a citizen and taxpayer of Kankakee county, engaged in the business of conducting a private bank in the village of Chebanse, and praying for an injunction restraining Charles W. Byers, county clerk of Sangamon county, and each county clerk of the remaining 101 counties, from causing to be printed on the ballots at the ensuing election the proposition to vote for or against an act approved by the Governor on June 22, 1917 [Laws 1917, p. 206], amending the title and certain sections of an act concerning corporations with banking powers [Laws 1887, p. 89], and from incurring any expense with reference amenable to the courts. They have no power to interfere in any manner with the proceedings of either of its component branches, or with the action of their respective clerks in making up the journals of their proceedings, so long as they are acting in obedience to the will of those bodies. This proposition is self-evident, otherwise the judiciary would be superior to the legislative branch of the government. We are speaking only of the power of the courts relating to their interference with legislative proceedings, and not of their long recognized, and frequently exercised right and power to declare, in a proper case, a legislative act unconstitutional, after it has been passed." Fox v. Harris (1916) 79 W. Va. 419, 423, 91 S. E. 209.

Compare the following cases:

State ex rel. Benton v. Elder (1891) 31 Nebr. 169, 47 N. W. 710, 10 L. R. A. 796. The state constitution required the speaker of the house of representatives, before the house should upon organization proceed to other business, to open and publish in the presence of a majority of both houses in joint session the returns of elections of state officers. At such a joint session the speaker acquiesced in a resolution of the joint body that he should not do so at that time. Upon petition of one who claimed that the returns would show that he had been elected the court issued a mandamus to the speaker, saying that the resolution of the joint session was void. The court announced that "wherever a specific duty is required by law of a particular officer, unattended with the exercise of any degree of official judgment or element of discretion, and on the performance of which individual rights depend, mandamus is the appropriate remedy."

Ex parte Echols (1866) 39 Ala. 698, 88 Am. Dec. 749. The court refused to order the speaker of a house of representatives to do an act "in the regular course of legislation, upon which he is called to decide" (send to the senate a bill alleged to have passed the house, the speaker having ruled that a necessary two-thirds vote had not been given, and on appeal from the speaker's ruling the house had sustained it). The court said that it could not review the decision of the house.

Turnbull v. Giddings (1893) 95 Mich. 314, 54 N. W. 887, 19 L. R. A. 853. A court will not attempt to compel officers of a legislative chamber to enter upon its journal a protest made by a member, although the state constitution expressly makes it the right of a member to have such protest entered, where it is the duty of such officers to enter only such matter as the chamber directs and the chamber has refused to direct the entry,—the chamber, not the officers, having control of the journals.

to said proposition, which had been certified to the county clerks by Louis L. Emmerson, secretary of state, as required by the act, and in accordance with a general statute providing for the publication of propositions required by law to be submitted to the electors. A temporary injunction was ordered and issued as prayed for. The appellees, Charles W. Byers, county clerk, and Louis L. Emmerson, secretary of state, entered their appearances and moved the chancellor to dissolve the injunction for want of equity on the face of the bill. The motion was sustained, and the appellant having elected to abide by his bill, the injunction was dissolved and the bill dismissed, at his cost, and he appealed from the decree. * * *

These facts were alleged in the bill and admitted by the motion: The bill for the act was introduced in the senate and passed and was thereupon presented to the house of representatives for its action. * * * [The house amended sections 8 and 11 and passed the bill as thus amended.] The bill went back to the senate for its action with respect to the amendments, and the senate refused to concur, and the house refused to recede. As a result a joint committee of conference was appointed, which made a report recommending the adoption of the amendments proposed by the house, and the measure was passed by both houses as amended. The bill was sent to the governor, with sections 8 and 11 reading as they originally stood when the bill first passed the senate and in that form it was approved by him. The bill as signed by the governor and as finally filed and enrolled in the office of the secretary of state, and as it appears in the printed statutes is not the same as the act finally passed by both houses of the General Assembly. * * *

Under the general delegation of legislative power the proceeding for the enactment of laws prescribed is that bills may originate in either house but may be altered, rejected or amended by the other, and no bill shall become a law without the concurrence of a majority of the members elected to each house. When so adopted every bill, before it becomes a law, must be presented to the governor, and if he approves he shall sign it, and thereupon it shall become a law. In the case of any law authorizing or creating corporations or associations with banking powers further action is required, and the necessary legislative steps are the concurrence of a majority of the members of the senate and house of representatives, the approval by the governor and an affirmative vote by a majority of the votes cast at an election for or against the law.

Courts are endowed by the constitution with judicial power, only, and are prohibited from interfering with other branches of the government in the exercise of their powers. They cannot obstruct the exercise of legislative functions, and have no more right to interfere in the process of legislation where the final act is the exercise of legislative power at an election than there would be at any other stage of the process. No one would contend that a court could enjoin either branch of the general assembly from passing a bill, or the governor from acting upon it, on the ground that the completed legislative act would be invalid, and the same rule necessarily applies to any interference with the electors in the final act of legislation. Courts have no general power to consider proposed and uncompleted legislation to determine whether an act will be valid or invalid if enacted into law. After legislation has been completed, the courts, in determining the rights of litigants respecting personal, civil or property rights, may, and it is their duty to, refuse to enforce a statute which is invalid, but their jurisdiction is limited to the determination of such rights. They can neither direct the enactment of a law[16] nor prevent its enactment on any ground whatever, and that being so, a court of equity would have no power to entertain a bill of a tax-payer on account of the expense of the legislation. The trifling cost of putting the proposition on the ballots would be in the same category with any other expense of the legislative branch of the government. These principles have been declared in various cases with respect to the submission of amendments to constitutions, elections under the initiative and referendum, elections under ordinances alleged to be invalid, and other like proceedings, with the reasoning of which we agree. Scott v. James, 114 Va. 297; Duggar v. City of Emporia, 84 Kan. 429; State v. Thorson, 9 So. Dak. 149; People v. Mills, 30 Colo. 262; City of Dallas v. Dallas Consolidated Street Railway Co., 105 Tex. 337; Threadgill v. Cross, 26 Okla. 402. There are some decisions adopting a different view, but they are contrary to the weight of authority and we do not regard the reasoning as sound. * * *

It is also to be noted that the bill was filed at a time when it was uncertain whether the act in question would be approved by the people, and if it should never become a law the appellant would suffer no injury to his business as a private banker. If the act should be adopted and its validity be brought before a court of equity in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the question would then arise whether the act as a whole would be void or its validity would be affected only as to changes made by the amendments.

The decree is affirmed.[17]

[16] "Nor have the courts any power to compel the legislature to act in any case, however imperatively the duty may be imposed upon that body." Carter, J. in People v. Thompson (1895) 155 Ill. 451, 475, 40 N. E. 307.

[17] Accord: On like facts except that the measure sought to be kept off the ballot was one initiated by popular petition. The court said that to enjoin submission would limit the people acting legislatively to the proposal and adoption of valid laws only, whereas courts disclaimed power to so restrict legislatures. State v. Osborn (1914) 16 Ariz. 247, 143 Pac. 117.

With the issue whether legislative proceedings which may result in invalid legislation may be arrested at the outset, compare the problem whether a higher court should issue a writ of habeas corpus to one who is about to be tried in a lower court for violation of a statute which he asserts is unconstitutional, for the

NOTE.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW: POWER OF THE COURTS TO ENJOIN LEGISLATIVE PROCEEDINGS: INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM—A question frequently before the courts in the past came up again in the case of Harnett v. County of Sacramento.[18] The case was on a bill for an injunction against the holding of a county initiative election. It was alleged that to hold the election would cost the taxpayers $6,500, and that the measure would be void if passed, as being contrary to state law and beyond the power of the county as a legislative body.

The court granted the injunction. It devoted only a short paragraph of the opinion to the objection that, in view of the separation of powers doctrine, a court could not constitutionally use the injunction to arrest legislative proceedings. What was said in this paragraph does no more than indicate that the judges thought this particular election should be enjoined, and were not going to let a separation of powers doctrine stand in the way.[19]

This almost unreasoned decision on an important point like the power of the courts to interfere with pending legislation, suggests two related, yet distinct lines of inquiry:

1. What is the present state of the law on the subject?
2. What is there to be said for and against a result like that of the principal case?

I. It has been repeated so often as to be almost trite, that a court cannot intervene to hold up the proceedings of a co-ordinate sole purpose of determining the validity of the statute and thus avoiding at the outset the possibility of an erroneous conviction. A case and note on this point are printed infra, pp. 192-200, with others on a different point which is sometimes regarded as cognate.

[19] The court cited Felt v. Waughop (1924) 193 Cal. 498, 225 Pac. 862, and Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 526a. Felt v. Waughop was a petition for a writ of mandate to strike out the name of an ineligible candidate for the office of city attorney. The writ was granted. A court which felt itself empowered to grant this writ would not see very great obstacles in the way of enjoining an election on an initiative measure. The argument is one of analogy: a court which was disinclined to grant an injunction would have had no difficulty in distinguishing the two cases.

California Code Civ. Proc. § 526a simply says that an injunction may be obtained to prevent illegal expenditure of public money by a public officer. In short, the court considered as illegal the expenditure necessary to hold an election on an act which would be void if passed. Contrast this with the attitude of the District Court of Appeal in Randolph v. Stanislaus County (1919) 44 Cal. App. 322, 186 Pac. 625. Here, in a similar situation, the injunction was refused on the basis of Cal. Civ. Code, § 3423 (4) and 3423 (6), viz., "3423 * * * An injunction cannot be granted:

"Fourth—To prevent the execution of a public statute, by officers of the law for the public benefit.

"Sixth—To prevent the exercise of a public office, in a lawful manner, by the person in possession." (Italics added.)

The two courts evidently had widely differing views as to the desirability of allowing a vote on a statute which would later have to be declared invalid. The pros and cons of this question will be taken up in the latter part of this note.

branch of the government. Both executive and legislature are supposed to be free from judicial control. If such is actually the case, Harnett v. Sacramento is contrary to the general rule. As a matter of fact, careful examination makes this doubtful.

As is well known, the doctrine of judicial review of legislation was originally one of ignoring a statute where conflicting statutory and constitutional provisions were both applicable to the case at bar.[20] It has since been extended to suits to enjoin the enforcement, as distinguished from the enactment, of statutes alleged to be unconstitutional.[21] The attempts to induce a further extension after the manner of the principal case, namely to arrest proposed legislation in the course of enactment, have taken the following forms:

A. Bills against local legislative bodies;
  1. County boards of supervisors;[22]
  2. City councils;[23]
B. Bills against ministerial officers whose duty it is to call (hold) elections;
  1. To restrain local elections;
    a. On popular initiative measures;[24]
    b. On measures referred by the local legislative body;
      (1) After the body itself has voted favorably;[25]

   - a. On constitutional amendments passed by the legislature and referred to the people;[27]
   - b. On statutes initiated by the people;[28]
   - c. On statutes passed by the legislature and referred to the people.[29]

It is to be noted that there are no cases of bills against a state legislature. The courts repudiate the notion that they have any such veto or supervisory power,[30] and the impossibility of obtaining such an injunction seems to have been fairly taken for granted by litigants.

However, aside from this, the rank of the bodies and the diversity of the processes as a rule seem to justify no distinctions.[31] On the assumption that they do not, the cases may be classified as follows:

1. Those in which no property rights are involved. Here the injunction is refused on the ground of separation of powers and on the lack of equity jurisdiction to protect political rights.[32]
2. Those in which the property rights of the complainant are made an important point.

[31] The exceptions to the general rule are:

(a) In California, the legislature, acting as a constitutional convention, has been held not to have the full rank of a legislative body, and so to be subject to an injunction, where, sitting as a legislature it would not be. Livermore v. Waite (1894) 102 Cal. 113, 36 Pac. 424, 25 L. R. A. 312.

(b) In Georgia referendum elections in accordance with the provisions of a bill which has already passed the legislature have been held not to be legislative proceedings, and so subject to injunction where legislative proceedings would not be. Gaskins v. Dorsey (1920) 150 Ga. 638, 104 S. E. 433; De Kalb County v. Atlanta (1909) 132 Ga. 727, 65 S. E. 72.

[32] State v. Osborn (1914) 16 Ariz. 247, 143 Pac. 117; Glide v. Superior

Under the second class there are two lines of decisions:

a. Applying the reasoning of the first class and arriving at the same result.[33]

b. Admitting that, as a rule, the right to legislate without effect is inviolate, but insisting that equity may interfere to protect the complainant from irreparable property damage or loss.[34] The instant case is a good example of this view.

As between the last two, it can properly be said that the latter[35]

W. 110; Wilton v. Pierce County (1910) 61 Wash. 386, 112 Pac. 386 (injunction against canvassing the results of an election where this in itself would cause expense).

In some of these cases the injunction is granted against an election authorized by a void act. This has been held not to be a distinction from facts like those of the instant case. Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co. v. Village of Kinney, 262 Fed. 980, 986. But cf. supra, n. 31, part (b).

[35] It is possible that some of the cases in which no mention is made of the property rights of the complainant, either in the opinion or in the reported pleadings, may nevertheless involve them. Where this element is present in the pleadings it is sometimes glossed over by the court, so it may be present oftener than appears in the reports. If so, the weight of authority may be the other way, and subsequent remarks on this point would have to be modified accordingly.

The courts in a few jurisdictions are troubled with the idea that the taxpayer's interest in an election is so slight that it can not be considered sufficient property interest to allow equity to take jurisdiction. See Dubuisson v. Board of Supervisors (1909) 123 La. 443, 49 So. 415; Ellingham v. Dye (1912) 178 Ind. 336, 99 N. E. 1, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 200; State ex rel. Cranmer v. Thorson (1896) 9 S. Dak. 149, 68 N. W. 202, 33 L. R. A. 582.

But the weight of authority is probably the other way. Livermore v. Waite (1894) 102 Cal. 113, 36 Pac. 424, 25 L. R. A. 312; Macon v. Hughes (1900) 110 Ga. 795, 36 S. E. 247; Wells v. Bain (1873) 75 Pa. 39, 15 Am. Rep. 563; preponderates. The principal case would then represent the weight of authority.[36]

II. If the foregoing conclusions are correct, the situation with regard to injunctions against legislative proceedings may be summed up as follows. Where waste of public funds or other property loss is threatened, courts will not enjoin the elected state legislature, though some of them will enjoin local legislatures as well as the people acting directly.

The distinction between enjoining the state legislature and enjoining the local legislature, may be put on a sound theoretical basis. It is that a local legislative body is not co-ordinate with a state court, and therefore does not enjoy the state legislature's immunity from judicial interference.[37]

But how explain the distinction between enjoining the state legislature and enjoining the electorate? Logically, if the judiciary has no control over the action of the people's representatives, it can have no control over the action of the people themselves. The explanation may possibly be found in the facts that the problem arose at a comparatively late period,[38] when the public had already Wheeler v. Philadelphia (1873) 77 Pa. 338, 22 Leg. Int. 75; Roper v. Lumpkins (1914) 111 Tex. 107, 230 S. W. 144, (Tex. Civ. App.), 163 S. W. 110.

[36] Earlier California cases would have led one to predict a contrary result in the principal case. Glide v. Superior Ct. (1905) 147 Cal. 21, 81 Pac. 225, decided that no injunction would issue to restrain a legislative act where the complainant suffered no material injury from the mere holding of the election. The general tone of the case indicates that the result might well have been the same even if the complainant's property rights had been involved. This is perhaps emphasized by the careful statement of one of the concurring judges that the case decided nothing more than that an injunction would not be granted where no property rights were involved. Concurring opinion of Beatty, C. J., Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 21, 30, 81 Pac. 225. The holding of the District Court of Appeal in Randolph v. Stanislaus County has already been referred to (supra, n. 19).

The outstanding California case favoring the injunction was, of course, Livermore v. Waite (1894) 102 Cal. 113, 36 Pac. 424, 25 L. R. A. 312.

It is interesting to note that the principal case brings about an anomalous situation. Cal. Civ. Code, § 3423 (7) prohibits injunctions against the legislative acts of municipal corporations. But against the people of a county an injunction may be issued. Where such distinctions are made at all, the injunction is usually allowed against municipal corporations, and not against larger political units. See, infra, n. 37.

[37] It is true that courts granting the injunction against municipalities rarely do so with express reference to this distinction. The decision is made without indication of what it would be, were a different defendant before the court. But see Roberts v. Louisville (1891) 92 Ky. 95, 17 S. W. 216, 13 Ky. L. 406, 13 L. R. A. 844, where the lower rank of the municipal legislative body is made the ratio decidendi.

On the other hand, many of the cases in which the injunction is refused stress the point that a municipal legislature enjoys all the immunities of a state legislature. Of course, it may well be said that considerations such as these are beside the point, at least so far as municipal corporations are concerned. A municipal corporation is a creature of the state, and has just as much immunity as the state has chosen to give it. Cf. Cal. Civ. Code § 3423 (7).

[38] The first constitution containing a referendum clause applicable to general legislation was that of South Dakota, in 1897. Lobingier, The People's Law, p. 359.

seen other modifications of the separation of powers in government; that on the surface the injunction is not directed at the electorate-legislature at all, but merely at some ministerial officer;[39] and that direct legislation, in some respects, calls for supervision more urgently than does representative legislation. This last point will be discussed more fully later.

The practical result of this situation is that with regard to local and referendum measures, the courts are called upon to determine constitutionality (or other questions of validity) without having the previous approval of the legislature to guide them.

To this there are the following important objections:

1. The presumption of constitutionality,[40] which is present as to acts which have passed the legislature, is here lacking alike as to all—Those which will and those which will not pass. Accordingly, more laws are likely to be held unconstitutional.
2. Alternatively, or possibly in any case, the courts would be given a large measure of legislative power.[41] This is so, principally because questions of constitutionality are often mixed questions of law and of policy. The latter would have to be decided by the judiciary where the legislature would have largely decided them before.[42]

For the other side the outstanding points may be summed up as follows:

1. Questions arising under detailed and specific state constitutions will, as a rule, involve law only, unintermingled with policy. The same is true to an even greater extent of cases of local laws which are alleged to conflict with a state statute.[43] If the right to injunction were to be

[39] Probably, mostly because the judges are not restrained by the psychological inhibitions against enjoining the legislature. That it is legislative processes which are being enjoined is generally recognized. For the clearest exposition of this, see State v. Osborn (1914) 16 Ariz. 247, 143 Pac. 117.

[40] A statute is presumed to be constitutional until proven otherwise. See, for example, Adkins v. Children's Hospital (1923) 261 U. S. 525, 544, 67 L. ed. 785, 24 A. L. R. 1238.

[41] The separation of powers will be assumed to be a good thing. Whatever its merits or demerits, there is not room or opportunity to discuss them in this note.

[42] Though the courts may be exercising such power at present, under any system of anticipatory judicial review they would be doing so with official sanction rather than by way of conscious or unconscious usurpation. The psychological difference which this makes, would, in the long run, make the injunction against legislative proceedings not a mere recognition of what exists but a further extension of it.

[43] In extreme cases validity may be determined by arithmetic. Cf. the principal case (where the measure proposed to change the boundaries of the supervisor districts so as to give the latter populations of 35,000, 34,500, 29,500, respectively, for three and 29,000 for the remaining two. California Pol. Code, § 4029 provides that when such a change is made, the districts after the change must have approximately equal populations); and Gulick v. Linn, supra, n. 26 (where the state statute provided that county lines should at no point be less than 15 miles from the county seat, and the measure in question proposed to establish a county having its county seat 11 miles from the boundary).

confined to such as these, the separation of powers would be only slightly abrogated.

2. It is an inefficient system which allows several thousand dollars to be spent in passing an act, only to be told that the "act is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; it creates no office; it is in legal contemplation as inoperative as if it had never been passed."[44]

This situation is even more likely to arise with direct than with representative legislation, since such large expenditures are rare[45] in merely passing a bill in the legislature, while they are the rule in enacting it at the polls. Nor have the people exercised their power of direct legislation infrequently.[46]

Since the question thus resolves itself into one of balancing the importance of the tripartite form of government against public economy, the sole remaining consideration is the suggestion that allowing anticipatory judicial review of questions under detailed state constitutions and under statutes might afford a partial solution. Clearly, it would at best be partial, since no provision is made for questions under the federal constitution, nor for those states which have constitutions of the old style.[47] But even aside from this, while such a course might make the question of balancing less acute, it would not remove it. Virtually all state constitutions contain a paraphrase of the federal constitution (except for parts which are inapplicable); it is improbable that the remaining parts will never give rise to questions of policy. Again, as a rule cases like the present one will probably not require the courts to go into questions of policy in determining the validity of the local statute, yet those which do will loom largest in the public eye. It is just then that an injunction would be most unwelcome.

As has already been pointed out, some states have chosen to surrender some legislative independence in favor of cheaper law-making. It might be added that there is no available evidence that they have suffered in consequence.

What trend there is toward the injunction against legislative proceedings may simply be the same that has always existed. In that case it can be expected to continue to receive much the same treatment as it has in the past; and the present state of the law on the subject will not undergo any great changes for some time to come.

[45] The only cases in which large expenditures could arise before the initiative and referendum were used for ordinary legislation were local option elections and elections on state constitutional amendments.

[47] E. g., Massachusetts. See O. K. McMurray, Some Tendencies in Constitution Making, 2 Cal. Law Rev., 203 ff.

On the other hand, it may be a new development—either as a manifestation of a general tendency toward "government by injunction" (which is sometimes said to be present in other fields),[48] or as an attempt to cope with the problems which are the outgrowth of the introduction of direct legislation for every-day use. Under these circumstances the present state of the law would represent a transition stage. It would be one step in a process of readjustment of the relative powers of the judiciary and the legislature in this particular field.

The solution is, of course, like the solution of most problems of constitutional law, a matter of trial and error. The course finally adopted will be the one which experience will have shown to have the greatest practical advantages and the least practical disadvantages in the long run.—George G. Olshausen (1925) 14 Cal. Law Rev. 37-44.

Section 3.—Effect of Unconstitutionality: Reliance Upon Validity of Legislation.

SUMNER ET AL. v. BEELER.

1875. Supreme Court of Indiana. 50 Ind. 341.

PETTIT, C. J.—This suit was brought by the appellee against the appellants, to recover damages for an illegal arrest, imprisonment, prosecution, and causing him to be fined on the charge of being found drunk, under the ninth section of the Baxter bill of 1873.

The defendants answered jointly and separately, by the general denial and by a third paragraph in justification under the ninth section of said law. * * *

This section has been held to be unconstitutional, or, in other words, that it is not law, [because the content of the section was not indicated in the title of the Act as required by the state constitution]. The State v. Young, 47 Ind. 150.

No question in law is better settled, and this is admitted by the counsel for the appellants in their brief, than that ministerial officers and other persons are liable for acts done under an act of the legislature which is unconstitutional and void. All persons are presumed to know the law, and if they act under an unconstitutional enactment of the legislature, they do so at their peril, and must take the consequences.

There was no error in sustaining the demurrer to this paragraph of the answer. * * *

The judgment is affirmed, at the costs of the appellants.[1]

GROSS v. RICE.

1880. Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. 71 Maine 241.

[Action of trespass to the person, and false imprisonment. Tried in the Supreme Judicial Court on an issue of law on facts agreed. The plaintiff after discharge from imprisonment brought this action against the warden for sixty-eight days detention beyond the term for which he had been sentenced. It was admitted that in detaining the prisoner for these sixty-eight days the warden acted in strict conformity with the statute stated in the opinion. It was agreed that if on these facts the action was not maintainable the plaintiff was to be non-suited. Otherwise he was to have judgment against the defendant for damages to be assessed by a jury.]

Peters, J. The sentence was for four years. For good conduct, the prisoner had credits which gave some deduction from the sentence. For bad conduct, he was in solitary confinement one hundred and forty-four days. The punishment in solitary confinement was at various times and for various causes. Among the causes were disturbance, laziness, insolence, noise, breaking rules of workshop, assault upon a fellow convict, disobedience, refusal to work, threats, spoiling work, and laughing and talking. He was not discharged, until he had served his sentence and sixty-eight days imprisonment additional thereto. This detention was in pursuance of section 40, c. 140, R. S., which provides that a convict shall not be discharged from the state prison until he has remained the full term for which he was sentenced, excluding the time he may have been in solitary confinement for violation of the rules and regulations of the prison.

[1] "It is contended * * * that an unconstitutional law is no law, and therefore must be considered as never having been written. This is a fallacy. The rule of universal application is, that all laws are presumed to be constitutional until the contrary is decided. * * * Rights can be acquired under a law which may be determined to have been unconstitutional, and pains and penalties be avoided by those who justify their acts as having been committed under a law, however that law may have been subsequently declared to have been unconstitutional. If a piece of property is sold under a fi. fa. issued in the case of A v. B, and C purchases it, if it should thereafter be determined in a litigation between D and C that the law under which A obtained his judgment against B was unconstitutional, would B be entitled to get back his property from C? If the legislature passed a law regulating trials in criminal cases, and A, being indicted for murder, was tried under that law, found guilty, sentenced and was hung, and in the case of B, tried before the same tribunal for the same offense, B's counsel should, after conviction, and on a motion in arrest of judgment, convince the judge that the law under which he was trying the case was unconstitutional, and the prisoner be discharged, would the sheriff who had hung A be liable to be punished? Certainly, if the position contended for be correct that an unconstitutional law is ipso facto null and void," * * *. Morgan, J. in Factors & Traders' Ins. Co. v. New Orleans (1873) 25 La. Ann. 454, 460.

Is this section of the statute valid and constitutional? We think not.

By the declaration of rights in our state constitution, the accused, in criminal prosecutions other than cases of martial law and impeachment, has the right of a public trial by jury, and cannot be deprived of his life, liberty, property or privileges, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. By the Fourteenth Amendment to the national Constitution, no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law. It is not now worth while to discuss the effect of any verbal differences between the state and national prohibitions, as we feel clear that the clause in the national Amendment is directly applicable to the question presented.

No one would for a moment deny the proposition, that a person cannot be taken to the state prison and detained there, as a punishment, without an accusation, trial by jury, conviction and sentence. Nothing less than these forms would amount to due process of law, where an infamous punishment is to be inflicted. No one would deny that such an act, done by the state, would be in direct defiance of the constitutional amendment. But a man, lawfully imprisoned, is detained in prison beyond the term of his sentence, without any new accusation, trial and sentence as a justification therefor. Is not this detention a new imprisonment? Is there a difference whether the person is seized within or without the walls of the prison, to be incarcerated? Does not the constitutional inhibition in its terms apply as clearly and literally to this act as to the other? Suppose the statute was not in existence, and never had been passed. Would it be pretended that the warden would be justified in detaining a convict for a single day over his sentence? If he did, would not the act deprive the prisoner of his liberty without any process of law and without any legal excuse or justification whatever? The state orders it to be done. Does not the state then deprive the prisoner of his liberty without due process of law?[2] Here, punishments are inflicted upon the prisoner during the term of his sentence; for solitary confinement is deemed a much severer infliction than hard labor. After his sentence has expired, he is imprisoned anew for sixty-eight days without a formal accusation, or trial or sentence by any court. It is clear that the imprisonment for more than the four years was not warranted by the sentence itself, nor could it be. A man cannot be sentenced for a crime or offence before he has committed any; not for an offence to be committed; not conditionally. The plaintiff was punished, after his term of sentence, for having been punished during the term. The detention was not as a punishment bestowed by the warden in the exercise of his discretion, but was one imposed by the legislature as a consequence of the warden's doings. In effect, the plaintiff was punished both during his term of sentence and after it, for the same offence. He was doubly punished for a violation of the rules and regulations of the prison. The very statement of the proposition would seem to be its proof. Res ipsa loquitur.

[2] Why was the state not liable? Compare the following case:—

A city acting in accordance with a statute directed its commissioner of highways to remove part of a house from an area over which a street was being opened. The commissioner gave a peremptory notice to the owner to remove it. If the statute was valid the city had the right to remove the house at the owner's expense if he did not do so. He did so. A tenant under an unexpired lease sued the owner for damages for eviction. After this suit was begun the statute, in a suit between other parties, was held unconstitutional. The court in the instant case reasoned that the city would be liable to the tenant, that the officer would not be, nor the defendant, both having acted in obedience to the city's orders. Dunn v. Mellon (1892) 147 Pa. St. 11, 23 Atl. 210.

It is said that the warden must have the power to inflict punishments upon prisoners for the prison discipline. There can be no doubt of that. It is not to be denied, that the punishment of refractory convicts is a matter within the discretion of the warden, within reasonable limits. Nor is it denied, that the warden had the right to hold the convict in solitary confinement for the time and upon the charges that he did so hold him, during the term of sentence. We are of the opinion, that the warden had no authority to detain or punish him after his sentence had expired. It would be according to due process of law to do the one thing, and in defiance of it to do the other. [After further discussion of the constitutionality of the statute, the opinion continues:]

A point is raised for the defence, that the warden should be protected, because the statute had not been declared unconstitutional when he acted under it. We do not comprehend the logic of a statute having effect as if constitutional, when not so; to be a law for one purpose and not another; a law for one man and not another. It must be either valid or invalid from the beginning, or from the date of the constitutional provision affecting it. Judge Cooley says, (Const. Lim. *188), "when a statute is adjudged to be unconstitutional, it is as if it had never existed." Such is much the better opinion upon the authorities, and such has been the view of the question in the practice in this State. An unconstitutional law is not a law. It is null and void. The warden is only liable to the perils that more or less follow official stations. He had no warrant of court that could protect him. He is liable for the actual, not punitive, damages for the injury suffered.[3]

[3] In Williams v. Morris (1911) 22 Ohio Cir. Dec. (32 O. C. R.) 453, 458, it is held that where the act for which an officer made an arrest without warrant is declared by state statute to be a crime, the officer is not liable merely because the statute is unconstitutional, on the ground that a statute is presumed to be valid until a court has declared it invalid and "courts should protect officers and others in the administration of the law as it appears in the statute, promulgated by proper authority, and so long as they do not transcend the authority given by such

WALTON, VIRGIN and LIBBEY, JJ., concurred.

DANFORTH, J., being a relative of the defendant, did not sit.

[Appleton, C. J., Barrows and Symonds, J. J., dissented from holding the statute invalid. The dissenting opinions of Appleton, C. J. and of Barrows, J. are omitted. The latter concluded:]

At least, the doubt whether the legislature have exceeded their constitutional power in this instance, ought to restrain us from pronouncing the law invalid.

TRAMMELL v. TOWN OF RUSSELLVILLE ET AL.

1879. Supreme Court of Arkansas. 34 Ark. 105.

[The council of the incorporated town of Russellville passed an ordinance requiring all sellers of alcoholic liquor within the town to pay an annual tax of $300 and made selling without compliance with the ordinance a finable offense. Upon an information filed in the mayor's court charging Trammell with a violation of the ordinance the mayor issued to the town marshall a warrant for the statute, their action should be upheld and they should not be mulcted in damage merely because the law is afterwards declared unconstitutional."

In Barling v. West (1871) 29 Wis. 307, 9 Am. Rep. 576 and Chapman v. Selover (1916) 172 App. Div. 858, 159 N. Y. S. 632 officers were held liable for arrest without warrant in circumstances in which such an arrest would have been legal had the city ordinance which purported to authorize it been valid. The latter case was reversed in (1919) 225 N. Y. 417, 122 N. E. 206, on the ground that the ordinance was valid.

It is usually held that where a harmful act (seizure of chattels, invasion of land, etc.) done by an executive, administrative or ministerial officer would be a tort if not authorized by legislation, it is a tort though done in strict accordance with invalid legislation. Reliance in good faith upon supposedly valid legislation is no defense even though the invalidity is not judicially determined until after the act. Hopkins v. Clemson Agr. College (1911) 221 U. S. 636, 55 L. ed. 890 (liability of a corporate personality which was a state agency, invading plaintiff's land); Saratoga State Waters Corp. v. Pratt (1920) 227 N. Y. 429, 433, 447, 125 N. E. 834 (public officer who prevented enjoyment by plaintiff of his right in land); Merrit v. St. Paul (1866) 11 Minn. 223, 232 (city acting as a private suitor sued out a warrant of attachment of property in compliance with statute); Nass v. Maxwell (Tex. Civ. App., 1895), 32 S. W. 565 (for impounding in accordance with statute plaintiff's hogs damaging defendant's land, the defendant held liable in damages for conversion and detention and all costs in trial court which had given judgment for defendant and for all costs in the Supreme Court); Waterloo Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Shanahan (1890) 58 Hun 50, 11 N. Y. S. 829, 33 N. Y. St. 361 (officer violating private water-rights); Titus v. Poland Coal Co. (1923) 275 Pa. St. 431, 119 Atl. 540 ("The statute under which defendant sought to take the land in question being unconstitutional, was void * * * and it follows that defendant was a mere trespasser upon plaintiff's land, and title to the buildings * * * it placed thereon vested at once in the owner of the land" and for removal of the buildings without plaintiff's consent defendant is liable for their value.); Kinneen v. Wells (1887) 144 Mass. 497, 11 N. E. 916 (action of tort lies against registrars of voters for refusing to register a voter who would have been ineligible to vote had the statute the officers relied upon been valid); and see the statutory liability enforced in Myers v. Anderson (1915) 238 U. S. 368, 59 L. ed. 1349.

arrest of Trammell; the marshall arrested him under the warrant, and in the mayor's court he was tried, convicted and sentenced to pay a fine from which judgment he appealed to the circuit court. What disposition was made of this appeal is not reported. Another like proceeding was begun against Trammell for a later act of selling but before trial the circuit court enjoined the enforcement of the ordinance. For the above arrests Trammell brought this action for false imprisonment against the incorporated town, the mayor personally and the marshall.]

Harrison, J. * * * It is, and was upon the trial, conceded that the town council had no authority to pass such an ordinance, and that the same was void, as was held in regard to a similar ordinance, in Tuck v. Town of Waldron, 31 Ark. 462.

Municipal corporations are created by the state for political objects, and invested with a portion of governmental power, to be exercised for local purposes connected with the public good. "They possess, according to many courts," says Judge Dillon, "a double character, the one governmental, legislative or public; the other, in a sense, proprietary or private. The distinction between them," he continues, "though sometimes difficult to trace, is highly important, and is frequently referred to, particularly in the cases relating to the implied or common law liability of municipal corporations for the negligence of their servants, agents or officers in the execution of corporate duties and powers. On this distinction, indeed, rests the doctrine of such implied liability. In its governmental or public character, the corporation is made by the state one of its instruments, or the local depositary of certain limited and prescribed political powers, to be exercised for the public good on behalf of the state, and not for itself." Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 39.

For acts done by them in their public capacity, and in discharge of the duties imposed upon them for the public benefit, cities and towns incur no liability to persons who may be affected or injured by them. * * *

Then, for neither the act of the council in passing the ordinance, the acts of the mayor in issuing the warrants, nor those of the marshall and his deputy in making the arrests, was the town liable to the plaintiff. * * *

That the marshall and his deputy were protected from liability by the warrants, we think is clear.

The judgment is affirmed.[4]

[4] The person who makes affidavit of complaint initiating the prosecution is not liable in such circumstances, nor is the prosecuting attorney, nor the justice of the peace before whom the conviction is had, nor the officer who executes the warrant, that is, where the invalidity of the legislation defining the offense is the sole defect. Bohri v. Barnett (1906) 144 Fed. 389.

RUSH v. BUCKLEY ET AL.

1905. Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. 100 Maine 322.

Two actions for false imprisonment heard together.

WISWELL, C. J. The plaintiff had been arrested upon two occasions, brought before the Augusta Municipal Court, tried, convicted, sentenced to pay a fine in each case and committed to jail in default of such payment, upon warrants issued by that court. The offense alleged in the complaint and warrant in each case was the violation of an ordinance of the City of Augusta regulating public carriages therein, and which prohibited all persons from driving such a carriage in the City of Augusta without a license therefor, under a penalty therein provided. In these two cases, reported and argued together, the plaintiff sues the judge of the municipal court who issued the warrants, the officer who served them and the persons who made the two complaints, for false imprisonment, upon the ground that the ordinance had never gone into effect, and was void, because it never had been published in some newspaper printed in Augusta as required by the statute authorizing such ordinances. R. S., c. 4, sec. 93, paragraph IX. * * *

As to the liability of the defendants who made the original complaints upon which the warrants were issued: It is settled by an almost unbroken line of authorities, that where a person does no more than to prefer a complaint to a magistrate, in a matter over which the latter has a general jurisdiction, he is not liable in trespass for false imprisonment for the acts done under the warrant which the magistrate thereupon issues, even though the magistrate has no jurisdiction over the particular complaint.[5] Barker v. Stetson, 7 Gray 53; Langford v. Boston & Albany R. R. Co., 144 Mass. 431; Gifford v. Wiggins, 50 Minn. 401, 52 N. W. 904; Murphy v. Walters, 34 Mich. 180; Teal v. Fissel, 28 Fed. R. 351. If the complaint is malicious, and without probable cause, the complainant would be answerable in another form of action,[6] and it would be no defense that the facts stated to the magistrate, upon which the warrant was issued, did not constitute a criminal offense. Finn v. Frink, 84 Maine 261. In order for a complainant to be liable in this form of action, whether his motives were malicious or not, he must do something more than merely to make complaint before a magistrate having jurisdiction of the party and over the general subject-matter, by interfering and instigating the officer to enforce the warrant. * * *

[6] In Birdsall v. Smith (1909) 158 Mich. 390, 122 N. W. 626, it was held that in an action for malicious prosecution the question whether prosecutor had probable cause can not depend upon what may be held as to the validity of the statute under which the prosecution was instituted. The court said that every statute should be considered valid until there is a judicial determination to the contrary and that the prosecutor had a right to act upon that assumption. See also Goodwin v. Guild (1895) 94 Tenn. 486, 29 S. W. 721, where a city mayor instituted a prosecution for violation of an ordinance subsequently held unconstitutional, and was held not liable in suit for malicious prosecution, although the validity of the ordinance had been mooted in the town and the mayor acted with a view to test it.

As to the liability of the officer: For reasons founded on public policy, and in order to secure a prompt and effective service of legal process, the law protects its officers in the performance of their duties, if there is no defect or want of jurisdiction apparent on the face of the writ or warrant under which they act. The officer is not bound to look beyond his warrant. He is not to exercise his judgment touching the validity of the process in point of law; but if it is in due form, and is issued by a court or magistrate apparently having jurisdiction of the case or subject-matter, he is to obey its commands. In such case, he may justify under it although in fact it may have been issued without authority, and therefore be wholly void.[7] * * * Where, however, the process is void on its face, or where the court or magistrate issuing the warrant has no general jurisdiction over the subject-matter, the officer is not protected by his process.

We have had numerous illustrations of this latter rule in the reported decisions of this court, some of which may be referred to for the purpose of showing the ground upon which all of these decisions have been based. In Warren v. Kelley, 80 Maine 512,[8] the process commanded the officer to seize a vessel for the purpose of enforcing a lien created by a state statute for repairs upon a vessel. The statute authorizing the enforcement of such a lien by a proceeding in the state court was unconstitutional. The court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter, which, by the Constitution of the United States, was vested in the federal courts. It was therefore held by this court that the officer was not protected by the process, because the process was absolutely void inasmuch as the state court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and, "sufficient appeared upon its face (the process) to show that it was not from a court of competent jurisdiction in reference to the subject-matter." * * *

[7] That is, void in the sense that the prisoner is entitled to immediate discharge which if refused he may obtain by writ of habeas corpus or other summary process.

[8] The cited case followed Campbell v. Sherman (1874) 35 Wis. 103 where the statute and the grounds of its invalidity were the same. The Wisconsin court said: "That a proceeding against a vessel to enforce a contract for pilot's wages is a subject of admiralty jurisdiction, and partakes of all the incidents of a suit in admiralty, is equally well settled. It therefore results from these propositions of law, that the [state] circuit court which issued the warrant commanding the sheriff to seize and safely keep the steamer Ida Campbell to answer any lien which should be established against the boat in favor of the plaintiff in that action for pilot's wages, had no jurisdiction of the cause, and its process was void. It gives no strength to the position of defendant's counsel, nor does it aid the discussion, to say that the circuit court is a court of general jurisdiction, when it is conceded that it had no jurisdiction over a proceeding exclusively vested in the courts of the United States. For as to the subject matter of such a suit, it had no jurisdiction whatever, and the act of the legislature clothed the court with no power to try and determine it." The warrant was said to show its invalidity because it referred to the statute and directed the seizure of a vessel in enforcement of a lien for wages. The holding of these two cases is accepted in the American Institute of Law Restatement of Torts, No. 3, pp. 97-98. For a discussion of other points of the principal case see ibid. pp. 99-103.

It is apparent that in all of these decisions of our own court, some of which are cited and relied upon by counsel for the plaintiff, the officer was held liable because of the fact that the process under which he attempted to justify was void upon its face, or because the court or magistrate by whom the process was issued had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and the process itself clearly showed the want of jurisdiction. None of these cases are authority for the proposition that a warrant, fair upon its face, which discloses no defect or want of jurisdiction, and which was in fact issued by a court having general jurisdiction of offenses of like nature, does not afford protection to the officer. Upon the other hand, the doctrine that an officer is protected under such circumstances is abundantly supported by the authorities. * * *

The case of Hofschulte v. Doe, 78 Fed. R. 436, is very much in point and contains a full discussion of this question. It was there decided that when a court which, though of inferior and local jurisdiction, has general jurisdiction with respect to the violation of the ordinances of the town, entertains a complaint under such an ordinance, and thereupon issues process, fair on its face, to an officer, the process is a justification to the officer in doing the acts thereby required, notwithstanding the ordinance under which the court acts is invalid, and that no action lies against an officer for the acts done by him pursuant to such process.

In accordance with these general principles it is clear that the officer who served these warrants upon the plaintiff is not liable in damages to him, even if the ordinance upon which the complaints and warrants were based had never gone into effect for the reason before stated. The warrants were issued by the judge of the municipal court of the city of Augusta, which court had general jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the violation of city ordinances. When we speak of a court as having jurisdiction over the subject-matter, we mean, as said in State v. Neville, 110 Mo. 345, 19 S. W. 491, "the power to hear and determine cases of the general class to which the proceeding in question belongs." The complaints were for the violation of a city ordinance in regard to the regulation of public carriages. The city had power to pass such an ordinance, express authority therefor being given by the statute R. S., c. 4, sec. 93, paragraph 9. * * * If it were necessary for an officer, before serving a warrant issued by such a court, having general jurisdiction of offenses of this nature, and over the alleged offender, to first make inquiries as to whether all of the necessary preliminaries necessary to make a city ordinance effective had been complied with, it would cause intolerable delay and very seriously interfere with the efficient administration of the criminal laws. The ministerial officer is bound to know the jurisdiction of the court which issues process to him, he is bound to know whether, from constitutional or other reasons, the court has jurisdiction over offenses of that nature,[9] but he is not bound to inquire into the question of fact as to whether or not a city ordinance in relation to a subject-matter, concerning which the city is by statute authorized to pass ordinances, has been published as required by the statute.

We finally come to a consideration of the question as to whether, under the circumstances which have already been stated, the judge of the municipal court is liable in damages to the plaintiff for any of the acts done by him. The rule is well established that judges of courts of superior jurisdiction are not liable to civil actions for their judicial acts, even where such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction. As to whether this immunity from civil liability is equally applicable to a judge of an inferior court, or to a magistrate of limited jurisdiction, is a question about which the authorities are not in entire accord. We favor the doctrine, towards which, we think, there is a strong tendency in more recent judicial opinion, that where a judge of an inferior court, or a magistrate, is invested by law with jurisdiction over the general subject-matter of an alleged offense, that is, has the power to hear and determine cases of the general class to which the proceeding in question belongs, and decides, although erroneously, that he has jurisdiction over the particular offense of which complaint is made to him, or that the facts charged in the complaint, constitute an offense, and acts accordingly in entire good faith, such erroneous decision is a judicial one for which he should not be, and is not, liable in damages to a party who has been thereby injured. We can perceive of no good reason why the judge of general local, but inferior, jurisdiction should not be as fully protected against the consequences of his erroneous judicial decision, concerning a matter within the limits of his general jurisdiction over offenses of the same general nature, as should judges of superior courts for their judicial mistakes.

[9] Is a mittimus issued to a prison warden by a court after conviction of a person on a charge of felony a justification of the warden for confinement of the prisoner where under the statutes of the state the court has no jurisdiction to try felonies? Would the reason that the court had no jurisdiction be material? In Patterson et al. v. Prior (1862) 18 Ind. 440, 81 Am. Dec. 367 where Prior had been convicted and sentenced to imprisonment in a state prison and had been discharged upon habeas corpus because the court had no jurisdiction of felonies, (a statute giving it jurisdiction had been impliedly repealed by a later statute, both being passed at the same session of the legislature; see Spencer v. State (1854) 5 Ind. 41), it was assumed that Miller, the warden, and Patterson, lessee of the prison, committed a tort by confinement of Prior and in an action of assumpsit, waiving the tort, judgment was given Prior for the value of his labor against Patterson who had received the benefit of the labor but not against Miller who had acted merely as warden and had received no benefit. See also Patterson v. Crawford (1859) 12 Ind. 241, but compare Thompson v. Bronk (1901) 126 Mich. 455, 85 N. W. 1084. Where, as is usual, the state receives the benefit why could not recovery be had against it in such a case? Should the warden be liable for false imprisonment either civilly or criminally? Compare with the hypothetical case put by Morgan, J., p. 133, n., supra.

In the application of this doctrine, the distinction must be observed between mere excess of jurisdiction and the clear absence of all jurisdiction over the subject-matter. This distinction was very clearly pointed out in the case of Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. 335, a leading case upon the question of judicial liability. In illustration of this distinction, the court in that case said: "Thus, if a probate court, invested only with authority, over wills and the settlement of estates of deceased persons, should proceed to try parties for public offenses, jurisdiction over the subject of offenses being entirely wanting in the court, and this being necessarily known to its judge, his commission would afford no protection to him in the exercise of the usurped authority. But if, on the other hand, a judge of a criminal court, invested with general criminal jurisdiction over offenses committed within a certain district, should hold a particular act to be a public offense, which is not by law made an offense, and proceed to the arrest and trial of a party charged with such acts, or should sentence a party convicted to a greater punishment than that authorized by the law upon its proper construction no personal liability to civil action for such acts would attach to the judge, although those acts would be in excess of his jurisdiction,[10] or of the jurisdiction of the court held by him, for [10] In Henke v. McCord (1880) 55 Iowa 378, 385, 7 N. W. 623 though holding the ordinance invalid for violation of which the justice of the peace issued the warrant of arrest, and admitting that judicial officers have no immunity for acts done without jurisdiction, the court said, "when the information was presented to the justice in this case all the matters pertaining to his right to issue a warrant were properly brought within his jurisdiction. He was called upon to exercise judicial powers. If the ordinance was valid it was his duty to issue the warrant. A refusal to do so would be a disregard of the obligations imposed upon him by his office. He could justify his refusal only upon the ground that the ordinance was invalid. He was thus called upon to pass judicially upon the validity of the ordinance. In making this determination he acted strictly within his jurisdiction. * * * There is neither reason nor justice, it seems to us, in holding a justice of the peace liable to a civil action for such an error of judgment." Followed in Brooks v. Mangan (1891) 86 Mich. 576, 49 N. W. 633, 24 Am. St. 137, and the same reasoning is adopted in Bohri v. Barnett (1906) 144 Fed. 389.

On a like issue it has been said, "The jurisdiction of the magistrate was not derived from, and did not depend upon, the act which is challenged, but upon the general statutes of the state. He had jurisdiction to pass upon every question involved in the action, including the validity of the law imposing the penalty." Therefore it was held that though the challenged act which defined the offense these are particulars for his judicial consideration, whenever his general jurisdiction over the subject-matter is invoked. Indeed some of the most difficult and embarrassing questions which a judicial officer is called upon to consider and determine relate to his jurisdiction, or that of the court held by him, or the manner in which the jurisdiction shall be exercised. And the same principle for exemption from liability which obtains for errors committed in the ordinary prosecution of a suit, where there is jurisdiction of both subject and person, applies in cases of this kind, and for the same reasons." The particular appropriateness of this language above quoted to this case is apparent. * * *

Emery, J. I think the majority opinion holds doctrines impairing the right of personal liberty and subversive of long established rules of law of this state. * * * The Augusta Municipal Court, however, is an inferior court of limited jurisdiction, which is presumed not to have jurisdiction until it affirmatively appears that jurisdiction has been expressly conferred. Hersom's Case, 39 Maine, 476; Gurney v. Tufts, 37 Maine, 130; Thurston v. Adams, 41 Maine, 419, 423; Wills v. Whittier, 45 Maine, 544; Inman v. Whiting, 70 Maine, 445. It has jurisdiction expressly conferred by statute to entertain complaints "charging a person with the commission of an offense," R. S., ch. 133, sec. 6; but I find no statute nor other authority conferring upon it jurisdiction to entertain a complaint only charging an act which is not an "offense." * * *

In Warren v. Kelley, 80 Maine, 512, the officer was held liable because the supposed statute authorizing the seizure had no force, being unconstitutional. * * * Despite the able argument in the opinion, I think it remains unrefuted and irrefutable that a lifeless ordinance and a lifeless statute are equally without force whatever the cause, and that the one can afford no more protection than the other.[11] * * * and prescribed the penalty might be invalid, yet a warrant of arrest in execution for nonpayment of the penalty was a justification to a person who directed its execution. Hallock v. Dominy (1877) 69 N. Y. 238.

A judgment which results from applying as the law of the case an unconstitutional statute is at worst an erroneous judgment, but it is not a "void" judgment if the court's jurisdiction of the case does not depend upon the statute. Brandhoefer v. Bain (1895) 45 Nebr. 781, 64 N. W. 213.

For instances in which justices of the peace acted wholly without jurisdiction see Heller v. Clarke (1904) 121 Wis. 71, 98 N. W. 952; De Courcey v. Cox (1892) 94 Cal. 665, 30 Pac. 95.

[11] The language of many of the earlier opinions support this undiscriminating generality, though the facts of some of them might have justified the result upon more restricted reasoning. In Fisher v. McGirr (1854) 1 Gray (Mass.) 1, 45, 46, 61 Am. Dec. 381, Shaw, C. J., said:—"If the magistrate or tribunal, from which the process issues, has jurisdiction, and the process is apparently regular, the officer may safely follow and obey it, and justify himself under it. But if the magistrate has no jurisdiction, the process is not merely voidable, but wholly void; the officer taking the property under it, has no authority, and is therefore liable to an action of trespass, * * *. The law relied on for a justification, being void, gave the magistrate no jurisdiction and no authority to issue the

COTTAM v. OREGON CITY.

1899. United States Circuit Court, D. Oregon. 98 Fed. 570.

This was an action to recover damages for alleged false imprisonment. On demurrer to complaint.

Bellinger, District Judge. This is an action brought against Oregon City, a corporation, and against Ryan, who is the recorder, and Burns, the acting chief of police, of the city, for damages resulting from the arrest and imprisonment of the plaintiff on what is admitted to have been a groundless complaint. The action taken by the officers grows out of an ordinance passed by the city requiring all persons selling goods, or soliciting the sale of goods, to pay a license tax therefor. * * *

It is established, upon the authority of the supreme court of the United States, that an ordinance of the character in question, so far as it applies to persons soliciting the sale of goods in behalf of those doing business in another state, is a regulation of interstate commerce, and void. Robbins v. District, 120 U. S. 489, 7 Sup. Ct. 592, 32 L. ed. 292. The rule does not extend so far as to make the ordinance void, except as it is applied to interstate business, and not then if the solicitor carries his goods with him, and thereby becomes a peddler, and so comes within reach of the general or police power of the state,—a distinction, whether wise or otherwise, that is clearly made, although there was a strong dissent from the chief justice, concurred in by Justices Field and Gray.

If the officers of the city acted without any jurisdiction, if there was a clear absence of jurisdiction, if the ordinance was of such a character that any authority exercised under it was a void authority, the defendants are liable, and this would result in any such case, whether the court was of general jurisdiction or was inferior. * * * The distinction between the two cases is confined to the mere presumption that exists in favor of the court of superior jurisdiction,—to the presumption, in other words, that the court of search warrant." The statute was held invalid because it purported to authorize magistrates to issue search warrants lacking in the specificness required by the state constitution. [Is it unreasonable to require officers whose duty it is to issue or execute warrants to know the requirements of the constitution as to specificness of warrants?] In Ely v. Thompson (1820) 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 70, it was said that the state constitution "is an instrument that every officer of government is bound to know and preserve, at his peril, whether his office be judicial or ministerial; and he can not justify an act against its provisions, even with the authority of the legislature to aid him, however much that may mitigate his case." The court held a justice of the peace and a constable liable for issuing and serving a warrant of arrest and sentencing and executing sentence (thirty lashes) because the statute which purported to authorize the proceeding was unconstitutional. This statute declared the offense and perhaps also was the source of jurisdiction or authority for the peculiar proceedings.

superior jurisdiction, in acting, has acted within its jurisdiction, unless the absence of all jurisdiction is shown; but, where there is an absence of all jurisdiction in either case, the liability is equal. Nor is there any reason for the exemption of judges of the superior court of record from liability to civil suit for their judicial acts exercised when there is jurisdiction of the subject-matter, though irregularity and error attend the exercise of this jurisdiction, that does not equally apply in cases where the jurisdiction is an inferior one. * * *

In this case, so far as appears, there was jurisdiction under the ordinance of the city to collect license taxes, and that was what was done, and what is complained of in the present case; but in the enforcement of that ordinance the recorder and chief of police erred in the conclusion that the plaintiff was within its provisions, and for this erroneous judgment they are sought to be held liable in damages. Now, can it be said to be clearly apparent that there is no jurisdiction in such case? Technically construed, it does not appear from the complaint that the plaintiff was soliciting orders for goods manufactured in another state. It is immaterial, except for the purposes of jurisdiction in this court, that the plaintiff was a citizen of the state of California. The material thing with reference to this liability is the soliciting of orders for goods manufactured out of the state, and this does not appear. But, for the purposes of this demurrer, I will assume that it does appear. Now, upon such a state of facts, might not the recorder issue a warrant for the arrest of the plaintiff, and might not the chief of police execute such warrant, in ignorance of the fact that the business in which the plaintiff was engaged was interstate business? And the conclusion might reasonably be reached by the officers charged with the enforcement of this ordinance that even such business was not exempt from the payment of the license tax. Such was the opinion of the chief justice and two of his associates in the case of Robbins v. District. If there was convincing reason for such a conclusion on the part of these learned men, why should a recorder and chief of police of the city of Oregon City be held liable in a civil action in damages for taking the same view? It is clearly not a case where there is a clear absence of jurisdiction of the subject-matter, since, as already stated, the city is authorized to collect license tax from persons soliciting business, and, at the most, it is only in the case of persons soliciting for the sale of merchandise outside of the state that the party would be exempt from liability to pay the license. It seems very clear that the officers, in the execution of this ordinance, are within the rule of exemption from civil liability. They are certainly within the reason of the rule, and, so being, are exempt.* * *

In this case the plaintiff could have relieved himself from the damages which he has sustained by the payment of the license tax, in which case he would have had his remedy against the city to recover the money thus paid, without serious injury or damage to himself; and so he ought not to be permitted to make use of imprisonment, which has, in a sense, been voluntarily submitted to by him, for the purpose of recovering damages. The demurrer is sustained.

ELLINGER v. COMMONWEALTH.

1903. Supreme Court of Virginia. 102 Va. 100.

[By statute the legislature authorized the State Fish Commissioner to settle as between the state and Ellinger a disputed low watermark line and did so by, in effect, quit claiming on behalf of the state to Ellinger a part in dispute in exchange for Ellinger's quit claim of a part. The legislature, not satisfied, shortly thereafter directed this suit for rescission to be filed by the attorney-general. The Supreme Court affirmed the decree below granting rescission, on the ground that the statute was "null and void" because its purpose was not stated in its title in the manner required by the state constitution. The court then added:]

KEITH, P. * * * It is suggested that the state has acquiesced in or ratified, or is in some way morally bound by, what was done. The legislature, it is true, to a large extent represents the commonwealth, but it does so in subordination to the constitution of the state. It can do nothing which that instrument prohibits and, in what is confided to it, must conform in its mode of action to the requirements of the constitution. If it transcends its power, or if it acts in contravention of the constitution, its acts are void; they confer no rights and bind no man, and all the world is charged with notice of the limitations which the constitution imposes. But, even if it were not so, if it be that the state can be charged by reason of acquiescence in or ratification of, the unauthorized acts of its agent, there is nothing in this record by which the state can be so compromised, for from the recital of facts at the beginning of this opinion it sufficiently appears that the state was energetic in discovering and prompt to disavow the whole course of procedure by which she was divested of her rights.

If, relying upon the act approved February 26, 1894, Ellinger has in good faith expended money, it may be that he has some ground upon which to appeal to the General Assembly to be reimbursed, but upon that aspect of the case we are not sufficiently advised to entertain an opinion, and it would be beyond our province in any event to give expression to it. The General Assembly, with full knowledge of all the attending circumstances, will doubtless do whatever good faith and fair dealing shall dictate.

We are of opinion that the case must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

NORWOOD v. GOLDSMITH ET AL.

1910. Supreme Court of Alabama. 168 Ala. 224.

[County boards of revenue had statutory authority to consider claims for refund of taxes "paid under mistake of law, upon an illegal assessment made under color of law." Such a board allowed plaintiff's claim on their determination that the statute under which he had paid the tax was unconstitutional, and issued a warrant on the county treasurer. The latter refused to honor the warrant. Plaintiff then proceeded by motion in the county circuit court for judgment against the treasurer and his sureties under a statute authorizing such summary action where a county treasurer should "fail on demand and without good excuse" to pay an allowed claim. From a judgment denying the motion Norwood appealed.]

Mayfield, J. [after holding the assessment statute unconstitutional proceeded:]

It is here insisted by appellee Goldsmith that appellant cannot proceed against him as treasurer until he has first had the local law, under which the taxes were paid, collected, and held, declared void in a proper proceeding by a court of competent jurisdiction; that neither he nor the board of revenue can pass upon the constitutionality of the local act. A complete answer to this, though in the inverse order, is that both he and the board of revenue have already passed upon the constitutionality of the act—one holding it valid, and the other, void—and that he has brought this, a "proper proceeding," in a court of competent jurisdiction to so test the constitutionality of such act.

All persons or officers are of necessity required to pass upon the validity of all acts or proposed statutes under which they are required to act or to decline to act. In so acting or declining to act under such proposed statute he must necessarily pass upon it for himself. He may do so with or without advice from attorneys or other sources of information. But courts are the one source from which he can get no information, in advance, as to whether he should, in any particular instance, observe or decline to observe the requirements of the proposed act or statute. Every executive officer, or every person as for that matter, is presumed to know the law—a presumption often violent but always necessary. Hence every man is his own constructionist. If two differ as to the construction of a given act, and it is acted upon or declined to be acted upon by the one, to the hurt or injury of the other, and the one is sued in the courts by the other for so acting or declining to act, and in the decision of the cause it becomes necessary to pass upon the validity of the act in order to determine the rights of the parties in that suit, the court will then—but not until then—pass upon the constitutionality of the act; and it is then only passed upon by the court in so far as the rights of these particular parties to the particular suit are concerned. When so decided by the highest court of the land all people, including executive and judicial officers, ought and usually do consider that particular question as settled and binding; but this is only so by the rules of policy, propriety, and common consent, and the credence which the people have in the opinions of such courts. * * *

It has often been decided by this court that "county warrants import a prima facie, though not a conclusive, liability against the county. The warrant is a mere command or order from one public county officer to another to pay from the county funds as therein directed. Strictly speaking, no action can be maintained upon the warrants against the county, or any officer or person. If the treasurer has funds in his hands lawfully applicable to the payment of the warrant, it is his official duty to pay it; but he is not bound by virtue of any contractual obligation as a party to the instrument. For his wrongful refusal to pay he is liable officially, and, being liable officially, his official bondsmen are also liable. The action, however, is not on the warrant, but is for a breach of his official duty.—Savage v. Mathews, 98 Ala. 535, 13 South. 328; Grayson v. Latham, 84 Ala. 546, 4 South. 200, 866. No action can be brought against a county on a claim until it has been presented to the court of commissioners, as required, and until it is disallowed or reduced by the court, and the reduction refused by the claimant. —Looney v. Jackson Co., 105 Ala. 597, 17 South. 105." State ex rel. Norwood v. Goldsmith, 162 Ala. 171, 50 South. 396.

It follows that the judgment appealed from is erroneous and must be reversed, and the cause is remanded.

Reversed and remanded.[12]

[12] In applying the rule that a ministerial officer charged by statute with an absolute and definite duty, in the performance of which an individual has a special interest, is liable personally if he refuses or omits performance, it has been held no defense that he in good faith erroneously believed the statute to be unconstitutional. Thus where an officer declined under such belief to present to county supervisors a private person's claim against the county, judgment against the officer for the amount of the claim was affirmed. Clark v. Miller (1874) 54 N. Y. 528.

Dowdell, C. J., and Simpson and McClellan, JJ., concur.

McClellan, J. I concur in the conclusion on this appeal on the ground that the appellant had the right to elect whether he would invoke mandamus to compel the county treasurer to pay the warrant in question, validly issued as it clearly was, out of the funds so illegally gathered, or to proceed summarily, as was done in this instance, against the officer and his sureties as for the breach of his official duty to pay the warrant.—Wyker v. Francis, 120 Ala. 509, 519, 24 South. 895, et seq. The reasoning and authorities in Wyker v. Francis are, in my opinion, conclusive on the question that mandamus is an available remedy in cases of the character in hand. In ation of property in counties of the state. In accordance with this statute the board ordered the clerk of the court of Cook county, who was the appropriate officer for the purpose, to enter on the books of the county collectors an increase of twenty-four per cent. He did not do so, acting under his belief that the statute was unconstitutional. Mandamus was sought against him and he pleaded the unconstitutionality of the statute. The court held the statute valid, and issued a mandamus ordering him to extend the increase on the books. He did not do so. Brought before the court to answer a charge that this was a contempt, he set up that before the mandamus proceedings had begun he had delivered the books to the various collectors who now refused to return the books, that it was their legal duty to retain the books because without them they could not perform their duties as collectors. Conceding these facts to be true, the court held that they did not purge the contempt, (1) because respondent had not disclosed in the mandamus proceedings that he had then already delivered out the books to the collectors, and mainly (2), addressing the respondent: "you are endeavoring to excuse your disobedience to a command of the court, by setting up your own previous disobedience to a command of the legislature."

"The law under which this additional tax was imposed, had passed the legislature under all the forms of the constitution, and had received executive sanction, and became, by its own intrinsic force, the law to you, to every other public officer in the state, and to all the people. You assumed the responsibility of declaring the law unconstitutional, and at once determined to disregard it, to set up your own judgment as superior to the expressed will of the legislature, asserting, in fact, an entire independence thereof. * * * To allow a ministerial officer to decide upon the validity of a law, would be subversive of the great objects and purposes of government, for if one such officer may assume infallibility, all other like officers may do the same, and thus an end be put to civil government, one of whose cardinal principles is, subjection to the laws. * * * Had the property owners, who were subjected to this additional tax, considered the law unconstitutional, they could, in the proper courts, have tested the question, and it was their undoubted right so to do. Your only duty was obedience. * * *

"The court, therefore, in view of all the circumstances, have come to the conclusion, that you make your fine to the people of the state, of one thousand dollars, and it is further considered, that you stand committed until the fine and costs are paid."

It has sometimes been held that in mandamus proceedings against a public officer to compel him to perform a statutory duty he may not put in issue the validity of the statute but the great weight of authority is that he may do so. The latter is especially true where the officer risks personal liability by obedience or disobedience. Cases are collected in 38 C. J. pp. 921-922. A good discussion is in State v. Candland (1909) 36 Utah 406, 104 Pac. 285, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1260, 140 Am. St. 834. See also Norman v. Kentucky Board of Managers (1892) 93 Ky. 537, 20 S. W. 901, 14 Ky. L. 529, 18 L. R. A. 556.

On a petition for a mandamus to compel an officer to perform his duty, petitioner may challenge the validity of a statute which appears to repeal or conflict with the alleged duty and get its validity decided, and a mandamus granted or refused accordingly, though a few cases are contra. See cases collected in a note in 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 266.

consequence of the rulings made in the opinion in this case and upon the considerations referred to in Wyker v. Francis, it appears clear to the writer that State ex rel. Norwood v. Goldsmith, County Treasurer, 162 Ala. 171, 50 South. 394, and Hines v. Salter, 154 Ala. 248, 45 South. 587, are not only in conflict with the opinion on this appeal but also are unsound and should be overruled. It was ruled in the former case, denying the writ of mandamus prayed, that the remedy at law was adequate. Wyker v. Francis, at page 523, 120 Ala., at page 895, 24 South., contains a full answer to this proposition. Indeed, it is too evident for doubt that the legal remedy as for misfeasance of the officer is in no sense the substance or effect of the remedy mandamus offers to compel the payment out of funds held by the county.

MINNESOTA SUGAR CO. v. IVERSON.

1903. Supreme Court of Minnesota. 91 Minn. 30.

Writ of certiorari issued from the supreme court upon petition of Minnesota Sugar Company, to review the act of respondent, as State Auditor, in refusing to issue a warrant upon the state treasurer for $19,925.36, to which amount petitioner claimed to be entitled as bounty under the provisions of Laws 1895, c. 205, as amended by Laws 1899, c. 307. Writ discharged. * * *

Collins, J. We shall first express our views on the right of the petitioner to the writ. In State v. Clough, 64 Minn. 378, 67 N. W. 202, it was stated that to render the proceedings of special tribunals, commissioners, or ministerial officers judicial in their nature, they must affect the rights and property of a citizen in a manner analogous to that in which such rights are affected by the proceedings of courts acting judicially. Further discussion in that opinion was merely elaborative of the above concise proposition. The perplexity in determining whether or not certiorari will lie in any given case arises out of the difficulty in distinguishing between legislative, executive, or ministerial acts, and those of a judicial nature, in which an officer, commissioner, or a special tribunal is called upon to act in a judicial or quasi-judicial capacity. This is the chief distinguishing test, as is conceded by the attorney general. If the determination of the tribunal or the officer called upon to act affects the rights or property of a citizen analogous to the manner in which they are affected by proceedings or decisions of courts acting judicially, the proceedings in question are of a judicial nature, and the writ will lie. If they do not so affect rights or property, the determination in question must be considered as ministerial, legislative, or administrative, as the case may be, and so treated by the courts. The character of the office or tribunal does not determine the question, but, rather the nature of the act performed.

Under the 1899 statute the state auditor is made the officer who has to pass upon and determine the validity of all claims for bounty made by any party under the act. If the auditor, by acting in conformity with the statute, has the power of adjudication upon the rights of persons and property, his acts must be quasi-judicial, at least. He is the special tribunal or officer called upon to determine what the law is, and what the legal rights of the parties are, and he acts judicially when passing upon the constitutionality of the law and disposing of such rights. In the case at bar the state auditor exercised no ministerial duties whatever when he declined and refused to allow the claim upon the ground that the law upon which the petitioner was obliged to rely was unconstitutional. He disposed of the petitioner's property rights in precisely the manner in which they might be affected or swept away by proceedings in the courts. He ascertained no facts, nor was he compelled so to do, according to the stipulation, for they were agreed upon. He did not have to construe the law, because its terms were plain and beyond controversy. The facts being undisputed, the auditor declared that the law in question was obnoxious to the constitutional provisions, and for that reason alone he refused to comply with it.

In State v. Dunn, 86 Minn. 301, 304, 90 N. W. 772, it was said that "the exercise of judicial functions may involve the performance of legislative or administrative duties, and the performance of administrative or ministerial duties may, in a measure, involve the exercise of judicial functions. It may be said generally that the exercise of judicial functions is to determine what the law is, and what the legal rights of parties are, with respect to a matter in controversy; and whenever an officer is clothed with that authority, and undertakes to determine those questions, he acts judicially." It is obvious that in the present case the act of the auditor was judicial. It matters not that the court cannot by a writ of certiorari cause the auditor to act in conformity with the bounty act. We can merely review his determination at this time, and, if found erroneous, another and further remedy must be discovered by the petitioner.

Having stated the sole issue made by the return, we pass to the merits of the case, and find involved the constitutionality of Laws 1899, p. 389 (c. 307), the requirements of which have been complied with in all matters of detail by the petitioner. * * * [The court held the statute to be in conflict with the state constitution and discharged the writ.]

STATE v. GODWIN ET AL.

1898. Supreme Court of North Carolina. 123 N. Car. 697.

Montgomery, J.: The defendants were justices of the peace and by virtue of their office (Code, Section 2014) were a board of supervisors and were required to look after the public roads in their townships. They were required also (Code, Section 2015) to hold stated meetings for the purpose of consulting on the condition of the roads, and, by Section 2024 of The Code, to make to the Superior Court at term time an annual report of the condition of the roads. The General Assembly of 1897 in Chapter 514 undertook to repeal the provisions of The Code, above referred to, as to Hertford County, and to impose upon others the duties required of the defendants. The defendants after the enactment of the Act of 1897, failed and refused to discharge the duties enjoined upon them under the provisions of the former law (The Code) and they were indicted on account of such failure and refusal. The Act of 1897, in its entirety, is contrary to the provisions of our State Constitution and is therefore void. * * *

The question for decision then is, is one who is a public officer under a former provision of law compelled under pain of indictment and punishment to perform the duties of the office during the time when there was on the statute books a subsequent [repealing] act unconstitutional in all its provisions? The matter is an important one both to the public and to the individual. With us, public office is a public trust and public officers are merely the agents of the people. * * * What an anomalous state of things would we have then, if a person believing himself to be a public officer, because of the discharge of the duties which he thought he owed to the public, should afterwards be indicted and punished because the courts had held the act, which created the office and prescribed its duties, to be against the provisions of the constitution and void. Such a proposition would be equivalent to declaring that the individual office holder must be wiser than the whole people represented in their general assembly. Such a proposition to us seems opposed to every idea of justice. It could not be true. The criminal law cannot be invoked to punish one who acts as a public officer—as an agent of the people—and who in the discharge of a public duty had obeyed an act of the law-making power even though the law be unconstitutional, unless the act itself had required the committal of a crime—a thought which could not be entertained for a moment. And it makes no difference that in the case before the court the defendants are indicted for a refusal to perform certain duties under a former law attempted to be repealed by a subsequent unconstitutional statute and not for doing positive acts under an unconstitutional law. The principle is the same in both cases. The defendants here cannot be punished under the criminal law for failing and refusing to perform the duties of an office which office and the duties pertaining to it had been sought to be repealed by a subsequent act of the legislature, afterwards declared by the courts to be unconstitutional. Until the subsequent statute was declared to be unconstitutional by competent authority, the defendants, under every idea of justice and under our theory of government had a right to presume that the law-making power had acted within the bounds of the constitution, and their highest duty was to obey. * * *

Upon the special verdict the judgment of the court below was that the defendants were not guilty, and the judgment is affirmed.[13]

Flaucher v. Camden (1893) 56 N. J. L. 244, 82 Atl. 82:—A general statute of the state declared selling liquor without license to be a criminal offense. Another statute purported to create county boards of license commissioners in some, not all, counties of the state, with authority to issue licenses. F obtained a license from such a board and was convicted for selling without a license. Conviction sustained on the ground that the second statute violated a provision of the state constitution against special or local legislation, and that a license granted by a board organized under the provisions of that act could not be invoked for any purpose. The court relied on the formula, there can be no de facto officer where there is no de jure office. This formula was later disapproved in Lang v. Bayonne, infra, p. 182.

An Indiana statute of 1853 prohibited retail sale of intoxicating liquor without a license. An act of 1855 expressly repealed the act of 1853. [The validity of the act of 1855 which flatly prohibited manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor was apparently a live controversy in the state. See Beebe v. State (1855) 6 Ind. 501, 63 Am. Dec. 391 in which parts of it were held unconstitutional, and the court divided as to its total invalidity. In O'Daily v. State (1857) 9 Ind. 494 an information for violation of the act of 1855 was directed to be quashed because a "majority" of the court "regarded" the "act of 1855 as void."] In Howe v. State (1858) 10 Ind. 423 the act of 1855 was unanimously declared "unconstitutional and void." The court added that whether the act of 1853 remained unrepealed was not before them. In Ingersoll v. State (1859) 11 Ind. 464 on appeal from a conviction for selling without license contrary to the act of 1853 a conviction was reversed. After stating that the Howe case was the first that "annulled" the Act of 1855, the court said "This law [act of 1855] went into operation, was acted under, and was not judicially annulled till about three years from the time of its going into force. Under such circumstances, it would be unjust—would be a violation of all principles of right—to hold that the act of 1853 was all this time in force, and the people incurring its penalties. It would make the law a concealed trap to catch victims." N. B.—The court does not allude to the facts above set out in brackets.

Tax collectors paid to a city a portion of a tax levy all of which would have gone to a township except for a proviso in a statute which directed this portion to be paid to the city, and the city expended the money for repair and maintenance of its streets. Subsequently the state supreme court held the proviso to be in conflict with the state constitution. The township then sued the city for the amount of the portion. Recovery was allowed. Vickers, J. for the court said: "The rule is universal that an unconstitutional law confers no right, imposes no duty and affords no protection. It is in legal contemplation as though no such

SESSUMS v. BOTTS.

1871. Supreme Court of Texas. 34 Tex. 335.

Ogden, J.—On the 9th day of November, 1866, an act of the legislature was approved, entitled, "An act to prevent judgments from becoming dormant, and to create and preserve judgment liens," and provides "that whenever final judgment shall be rendered by any court of record of this State, such judgment shall be a lien on all the real estate of the judgment debtor situate in the county where the judgment is rendered, from the date of the judgment; provided, that said lien shall cease and become inoperative, if execution be not issued upon such judgment within one year from the first day upon which such execution can by law be issued thereon." And on the tenth day of the same month, an act regulating the collection of debts was approved, which enacts, "that on all judgments rendered prior to the first day of January, 1867, the judgment debtor shall have twelve months thereafter within which to pay to the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, one-fourth part of said judgment, and all costs; and that no execution shall be issued thereon until the expiration of the time aforesaid." This last act was, at the January term, 1868, of this court, in the case of Jones v. McMahan, 30 Texas, 719, declared unconstitutional, and consequently void. And now we consider the only question presented by the record of this case, which requires a decision by this court is, as to the effect, if any, of this act of November 10, 1866, over judgments and judgment liens, until the same was declared unconstitutional. The judgment of Ball et al. v. L. A. Bryan was rendered on the thirtieth of November, 1866, and, without doubt, became a lien on all the real estate of Bryan situated in that county; and under the act of the ninth of November, such lien shall continue and be in force until one year from and after the first day upon which execution could by law law had ever been passed. (Norton v. Shelby [Co.], 118 U. S. 425, [30 L. ed. 178]) * * * the unconstitutional statute must be eliminated from all consideration." Board of Highway Commissioners v. Bloomington (1912) 253 Ill. 164, 176, 97 N. E. 280, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 471. [There is no reference whatever in the opinion to defendant's change of position. Moreover the court refused to allow the plaintiff interest because the city received the money in good faith and "the existence" of the proviso in the statute "was an apparent authority for the receipt of this money by the city." See p. 178.]

An administrator of a decedent's estate in reliance upon a statute which had not been judicially declared unconstitutional paid a sum of money to one who would have been entitled to the amount so paid as one of the next of kin had the statute been valid. The supreme court subsequently declared it invalid. Later in an action against the administrator by the rightful next of kin, it was held that they should recover the amount so paid. In affirming this judgment the supreme court relied upon the dogma of Norton v. Shelby County, quoted by Vickers, J. in the above paragraph. Boales v. Ferguson (1898) 55 Nebr. 565, 76 N. W. 18. Quaere, could the administrator recover from the erroneous payee?

issue thereon. The question in this cause, therefore, becomes narrowed down to the simple inquiry, when could an execution issue on a judgment rendered on the last day of November, 1866. The act of 1842, and which is now in force, provides, that from and after the rising of every court, it shall be the duty of the clerk to issue execution. But the act of 1866 was an attempt to repeal or amend the law of 1842, and to prohibit the issuance of execution until one year from the date of the judgment. This act passed the legislature with every formula of law and was therefore to be presumed to be a valid and binding law, until declared otherwise by competent and legitimate authority.

It is believed that any citizen of the state whose interests are affected by an act which he believes unconstitutional, may, by pursuing a legal course, test the constitutionality of a law; or, if he chooses, may wholly disregard that act as law, but in that case he acts at his peril, and should the act of which he complains be decided to be law, then he must suffer the consequences of a bad judgment or a perverted will. It is therefore deemed advisable for every good citizen to obey whatever may be promulgated by the law-making power as law, until the same shall have been passed upon by the courts of the country in a legitimate and proper manner. If this, then, is the duty of the citizen, and he obeys or submits to whatever has received the legislative sanction as law, then he should be protected in that obedience, or, at least, he should not be deemed guilty of laches, and his rights sacrificed to those who are ready to usurp the province of the judiciary and declare for themselves what is and what is not law. We are not willing to indorse the proposition, in its broadest sense, that a ministerial officer has the right or power to decide upon the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of an act passed with all the formality of law. It is the duty of such officers to execute and not to pass judgment upon the law, and we are of the opinion that the clerk of the district court should have refused to issue execution in violation of what appeared to be a valid and binding law, until the same had been declared void by the tribunal properly constituted for that purpose.

We are not willing to construe the quotation from Cooley's Constitutional Limitation[s], page 188, in the same light as the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error appears to have done. It is true that when an act has been declared unconstitutional, then it is as though it had never been; but we do not think that the author in the text, or the cases cited by him, intended to announce the doctrine that an unconstitutional law could be no protection to officers or citizens, before the same had been passed upon and adjudged invalid. The law of 1842 may never have been repealed, but most certainly it was not in force during the existence of the act of 1866; and, as suggested by appellant's counsel, the law of 1842, though not repealed, "may have been stripped of its power and validity for the time being, bound by the hand of usurpation, but by the assistance of this court it has been liberated and set free, to assert its dominion and majesty." The act of 1866 was declared to be unconstitutional in 1868, and thereby liberated and set free the act of 1842, which required that execution should issue within one year, not from the date of the judgment, for the year had already passed and the law during that time had not been in force, but from the decision of the court which gave it vitality. We are therefore of the opinion that at the time of the rendition of the judgment in the cause of Ball et al. v. Bryan, there was no law in force which authorized the issuance of execution until one year after the rendition of the judgment; and under the act of ninth of November, 1866, that judgment operated as a lien upon the real estate of L. A. Bryan, until one year from the time when execution might issue. This construction would cause the judgment to operate as a lien for two years from the rendition thereof, and we can see no objection, constitutional or other, to the law in this particular.

It follows that the judgment lien was preserved; and as the execution issued within a few months from the time when it could by law issue, and was levied on the land in question, upon which there was a lien to satisfy the execution, the sale was a good and valid sale, and Botts, the purchaser, received a good and legal title; and that the plaintiff, who purchased the land in question after the rendition of judgment, and after the issuance of execution, cannot be considered an innocent purchaser without notice, and therefore received no title as against the purchaser under the judgment lien, and execution thereon.

There being no error in the judgment of the court below, it is affirmed.

STATE OF IOWA v. O'NEIL.

1910. Supreme Court of Iowa. 147 Iowa 513.

McClain, J.—An agreed statement of facts filed on the trial before the justice of the peace was the basis of the finding of the district court that defendant in October, 1908, solicited, accepted, and took from various persons orders for the purchase by them and sale and shipment to them of intoxicating liquors from and by a certain brewing company in Kansas City, Mo., said orders being subject to the approval of said company, and that the liquors so ordered were to be shipped directly to the persons named from the place of business of said company. Defendant's motion for judgment in his favor, which was overruled, recited that the acts charged were not criminal under the law of this state at the time of their commission, and, further, that the statute of the state making such acts criminal is in violation of the Constitution of the United States as an interference with the clause thereof relating to interstate commerce and statutes on that subject passed by Congress. The acts with which defendant was charged were in violation of the provisions of Code, section 2382, as amended by Acts 28th General Assembly, chapter 74 (Code Supp., section 2382), prohibiting any person from soliciting, taking, or accepting "any order for the purchase, sale, shipment or delivery of any (intoxicating) liquor." In the case of State v. Hanaphy, 117 Iowa, 15, followed in State v. Bernstein, 129 Iowa, 520, decided, respectively, in 1902 and 1906, this statute was held unconstitutional, as in violation of the interstate commerce clause of the federal Constitution. In 1909 this court, relying upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Delamater v. South Dakota, 205 U. S. 93, decided in 1907, reached the conclusion that its previous holding that the statute was in violation of the federal Constitution was erroneous, and expressly overruled the two cases in which that conclusion had been announced, and sustained a judgment enjoining the maintenance of a place for carrying on the business of soliciting, taking, and accepting orders for the purchase, sale, and shipment of intoxicating liquors for and on behalf of a corporation located and doing business in another state as a nuisance. McCollum v. McConaughy, 141 Iowa, 172. * * * The contention for defendant is that the decision of this court sustaining the constitutionality of the statute should not be given a retroactive effect, and defendant should not be punished for acts which according to the prior decisions of the Supreme Court of this state were lawful.

It is, of course, well settled that a statute which has been held unconstitutional either in toto or as applied to a particular class of cases is valid and enforceable without re-enactment when the supposed constitutional objection has been removed, or has been found not to exist. That was the holding in McCollum v. McConaughy, supra, and is not now questioned. See, also, Pierce v. Pierce, 46 Ind. 86. And the conviction below was proper, unless some benefit is to be given to defendant of the fact that, when the acts were committed, the latest announced decision of this court was to the effect that the statute was unconstitutional, and therefore not enforceable. It is only by analogy, applying the rule of precedent and not of adjudication, that the decision in one case becomes in any sense the law in another case. The analogy may be so complete that the reasoning of the one case necessarily points out the conclusion to be reached in the other, and, if so, the court feels bound to bow to its previous decision, unless it is made to appear that it is so manifestly erroneous that it should be overruled. If overruled, its force as a precedent ceases, and the later decision becomes a precedent. The analogy, however, may be incomplete, and then it is for the court to determine in the subsequent case whether the reasoning of the prior case is applicable under circumstances in some of which the cases are similar, and in others dissimilar. It is not the function of a court to lay down the law for future cases, but to announce the law for the case which it is deciding. It is an important function of an appellate court to so announce its reasons for decision that they may be understood and applied with reference to subsequent cases which are likely to arise, but no court can attempt to anticipate by announcement what the law will be found to be in a case in some respects dissimilar which may subsequently arise. Therefore, as has often been said, there is no vested right in the decisions of a court, and, under the clause in the federal Constitution prohibiting any state from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts, the Supreme Court of the United States has uniformly held that the change of decisions of a state court does not constitute the passing of a law, although the effect of such change is to impair the validity of a contract made in reliance on prior decisions. National Mut. B. & L. Ass'n v. Brahan, 193 U. S. 635; Central Land Co. v. West Virginia, 159 U. S. 103. And see Storrie v. Cortes, 90 Tex. 283; Swanson v. Ottumwa, 131 Iowa, 540; Lanier v. State, 57 Miss. 102. It is also quite clear that the change in the decisions of a court of a state does not violate the prohibition found in the same clause of the federal Constitution against the making of ex post facto laws.

From the conclusion that in a constitutional sense there is no vested right in reliance on decisions of the court as precedent, and that one who is brought into court for a violation of law can not sustain himself on the mere plea that in some other case which he thought to be analogous the court rendered a decision which, if applied as he thought it would be applied, would result in exculpating him from wrong, it does not necessarily follow that the court can not take into account as a controlling consideration in reaching the conclusion as to the justice of a case that the party charged with wrongful conduct relied reasonably and in good faith upon decisions of the courts in determining whether a wrong was committed. The Supreme Court of the United States, while recognizing its general obligation to follow the decisions of the courts of the state in which a contract is made in determining its validity, has held that it will not recognize a change of rule in a state made by judicial decision where the effect of such change is to render invalid contracts which according to the views previously expressed by the state courts at the time the contracts were made were valid. Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175; Thompson v. Lee County, 3 Wall. 331; Douglass v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677; Center School Tp. v. State, 150 Ind. 168. In Muhlker v. New York & Harlem R. Co., 197 U. S. 544, the judges whose views on this point are expressed in the opinions filed were equally divided on the question whether one acquiring property in reliance on decisions of the courts of the state relating to his rights in an abutting street had a vested right as against a subsequent change of decision in the state courts. These cases are cited, not as indicating any constitutional duty on the part of the courts of a state to protect a litigant in rights which he in good faith supposed he had already acquired by reason of previous decisions of the same court in other cases, but for the purpose of illustrating the extent to which a court may properly go in administering the law for the purpose of effectuating justice; that is, for the purpose of rendering such decision as shall appeal to intelligent and fair-minded people as right and proper. Courts have always taken such considerations into account in the enforcement of legislative enactments. Before there was any separate equity jurisdiction, and when the term equity was used as a mere synonym of equality and justice, the courts interpreted statutes with a view to their equity, and not merely in accordance with their strict terms; so that the case might be within the equity of a statute, although not expressly covered by it, and, vice versa, the statute might be held not applicable in its equity, although its strict terms covered the case. The term "equity of a statute" has fallen into disuse since the establishment of a system of equity jurisprudence, but the courts have not ceased in either branch of their jurisdiction to give consideration to the general purpose of a lawmaker as furnishing a guide to interpretation. See Dr. Hammond's note in his edition of Lieber's Hermeneutics, page 283. This again is but an illustration of the effect the court will properly make to do justice in a broad sense. In criminal cases, where the life or liberty of an individual is involved on one side, and the enforcement of law in the interest of the public welfare on the other, no private right of contract or property being imperiled by liberality of construction, the courts go further than in civil cases to recognize the common judgment of humanity as to what is right and just, and they allow many exceptions to statutory definitions of what shall constitute a crime. For instance, in this state, although there is no statutory recognition of a coverture as a defense on the part of a married woman for a crime committed in the presence of her husband, we have said that the common-law exception in that respect is applicable. State v. Fitzgerald, 49 Iowa, 260; State v. Kelly, 74 Iowa, 589; State v. Harvey, 130 Iowa, 394.

And it is the general rule in all the states of the Union, even those in which the criminal law is codified, to recognize infancy and insanity as relieving from the punishment prescribed by statute for criminal offenses as they were recognized at common law, although such defenses are not allowed under any express statutory provision. The assumption is that even the statutory criminal law is to be administered in accordance with the general principles of right and justice recognized in the common-law system. 1 Bishop, New Criminal Law, section 35. In the determination of the criminality of an act even under the statutory definition, the intent is a material consideration. It is the absence of criminal intent which constitutes the basis of the defenses of infancy, insanity and coverture. Ignorance and mistake are also recognized in the same category, but here enters a question of public policy. One who is bound to obey the law ought not to be allowed to say that he was ignorant of it. He may show as a defense that he was mistaken as to a fact which, if it had been as he supposed it to be, would have rendered his act lawful, but he can not say that if the law had been as he supposed it to be, his act would have been lawful and he should not be punished. This principle of public policy has become crystallized into the maxim, "Ignorance of the law excuses no one," and as applied to the present case, it might well be said, if we followed this maxim, that defendant is not to be excused because he did not know the law, that is, did not know that the previous decisions of this court holding the statute which he was violating to be unconstitutional were wrong and the statute was in fact valid and operative. As between conflicting rights, we might well refuse to allow any impairment of so well settled a principle, and hold that parties act at their peril as to what the law shall be decided to be. But as already indicated, in a criminal case there is no such imperative obligation, for after all the punishment of crime is a matter of public concern only and we think that it would strike any reasonable and fair person as manifestly unjust that one should be adjudged criminal in having done an act not morally wrong, but only wrong because prohibited by statute, that is, an act malum prohibitum and not one malum in se, relying upon the decisions of the highest court in the state holding such statute to be wholly invalid because in excess of the power of the legislature to enact it.

In this connection it is to be noticed that the decisions of courts as to the constitutionality of a statute stand on somewhat different ground than those relating to the common law or the interpretation of statutes, as applied to particular cases. The function of determining whether a statute is invalid because in excess of the legislative power is one peculiar to our system of government, and unknown in other jurisdictions in which the common law prevails. It is true that such an adjudication is made in a particular case. Although the power to be investigated is that of the legislative department itself which can not be a party so as to be bound by any judicial decision, nevertheless the courts discuss such question when it arises, and decide the matter not only for the purpose of determining the rights of particular parties, but with reference to the effect of the decision upon the law of the state. A statute unconstitutional properly remains on the statute books as a part of the written law, but those who are bound to obey the law may, we think, reasonably take into account the decisions rendered by the courts in the exercise of their peculiar function of passing upon the constitutionality of the statutes in determining what the law of the state really is. To the ordinary mind it would smack of absurdity to say that defendant ought to have known that the statute was constitutional, and would in case he violated it be enforced against him, although the supreme court of the state had fully considered the validity of the statute as against the claim that it was unconstitutional, and had unanimously held that it was in excess of state legislative power as to its entire subject-matter, and therefore invalid. Under such circumstances, it is plain that there should be some relief to defendant from punishment, for the very purpose of punishment is defeated, if unreasonably and arbitrarily imposed. Respect for law, which is the most cogent force in prompting orderly conduct in a civilized community, is weakened, if men are punished for acts which according to the general consensus of opinion they were justified in believing to be morally right and in accordance with law. If we should sustain the conviction, we would do so in the belief that the case was one in which executive clemency ought to be exercised. But is it quite fair to throw upon the executive the responsibility of relieving from punishment on account of the very nature of the act committed which is made apparent to this court, and its nature as being innocent or guilty appears to depend upon the effect to be given to the decisions of this court? We think we would be shirking our responsibility if we should leave it to the executive to do what we believe to be manifest justice in this case, and should stigmatize the defendant with a conviction for crime when as it appears he was innocent of any real wrong. We think the real question as to the guilt of defendant is to be settled by referring to the doctrine of criminal intent, which has always been held to be of the essence of a crime. 1 Bishop, New Criminal Law, sections 205, 285-291b. And justifiable ignorance or mistake has always been taken into account in determining the criminality of the act. 4 Blackstone, Commentaries, 27; 1 Bishop, New Criminal Law, sections 292-312; Regina v. Prince, L. R. 2 C. C. 154. For reasons already pointed out, mere ignorance of law does not excuse, and even ignorance of fact which the statute expressly or impliedly makes it the duty of one acting in reference to the subject-matter regulated by the statute to know and with reference to which he is required to act at his peril will not excuse him. But even as to these strict rules there are necessary exceptions. If a mistake of fact is due to mistake of law, so that it appears there is no guilty mind, punishment should not be imposed. Rex v. Hall, 3 Carr. & P. 409 (14 E. C. L. 635); Regina v. Reed, 1 Carr. & M. 306 (41 E. C. L. 170); People v. Powell, 63 N. Y. 88;[14] People v. Husband, 36 Mich. 306; Commonwealth v. Stebbins, 8 Gray (Mass.) 492. And no matter how stringently the statute may impose the duty of knowing the facts on which the defendant has relied in a course of conduct that is prohibited, save under certain prescribed conditions, the common-law exceptions which relieve on account of lack of criminal intent due to infancy, insanity, coverture, or necessity are recognized. State v. Cutter, 36 N. J. Law, 125; The Brig William Gray (U. S. C. C.), 1 Paine 16 (Fed. Cas. No. 17, 694). These cases are cited not as directly in point for the solution of our present difficulty, but as illustrations of the fact that courts must, especially in the administration of the criminal law, make exceptions in the interest of justice and public policy to rules which it is very essential to maintain in ordinary cases. An exception to the rule that every one is required to know the law is justified, we believe, when, as to the validity of a statute on constitutional grounds, a person has relied upon the expressed decisions of the highest court in his state. We do not believe such exception to be against public interest, but rather in the furtherance of justice. This question seems not to have often arisen so as to have been considered in courts of last resort, but we have support in the conclusion we have reached in the cases of State v. Bell,[15] 136 N. C. 674, and State v. Fulton, 149 N. C. 485.

That our conclusion in this case may not be misapprehended and relied upon in support of propositions to which we have no disposition to yield consent, we desire to emphasize the following controlling conditions. This is a criminal case, and therefore involves no conflicting claims as to contractual or property rights. The defendant may be presumed to have acted with knowledge of the fact that the statute now invoked as rendering illegal an act not otherwise wrongful or immoral had been expressly held by this court in cases prosecuted under public authority to be unconstitutional because in excess of legislative power.

[14] Powell was indicted not for doing an illegal act but for conspiring to do an illegal act. The act was illegal only by statute. He pleaded lack of knowledge of the statute. Held that "evil purpose" or "criminal intent" is an element of the crime of conspiracy and that the jury should consider the defendant's ignorance of the statute in determining whether he acted with an "evil purpose."—Ed.

[15] In the cited case Bell, who was prosecuted for violation of a valid statute, set up a defense which the state supreme court by a former construction of the statute had held was allowed by the statute. The trial court excluded that defense adopting a different construction. On appeal from a conviction the supreme court accepted the trial court's reasoning, repudiated its own former construction, but in remanding the case directed that for the purposes of this retrial the statute should be treated as having the meaning which the court now repudiated. Cf. State v. Fulton (1908) 149 N. Car. 485, 507, 63 S. E. 145, 152.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed.

[All six of the judges concurred in the result. It seems that only Evans and Ladd, JJ., concurred fully in the above opinion. The other three concurred in separate opinions. Deemer, C. J., expressed dissent to resting the case upon any rule or exception to a rule about criminal intent, or to holding the circumstances to be an implied exception to the statute. He said that the result could be properly rested upon either of two principles, (1) that a judicial decision involving the constitutionality of a statute should be given prospective operation only by reason of analogy with a settled rule that where reasonably possible a statute is construed to have only prospective application. (2) That to punish the defendant would violate Article I, Section 17 of the Iowa constitution, "that excessive fines shall not be imposed and cruel and unusual punishment shall not be inflicted."[16] Sherwin, J. confined his concurrence to point (1) of Deemer's opinion. Weaver, J. said that a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $100 or imprisonment not to exceed 30 days could not be considered a violation of Art. 1, Section 17, and that the only tenable ground was to hold the act of the accused not within the "purpose, reason or intent" of the statute.][17]

[16] A decision by a state court of last resort that a state statute is in conflict with the national constitution, "is binding" said Deemer, C. J., p. 529 "not only upon the parties involved, but upon all departments of government; indeed, upon the state itself. An unconstitutional statute is absolutely void. It is, so to speak, as so much waste paper * * *. The decision is binding upon every one save the court itself." He further said that where a statute is first held unconstitutional a subsequent reversal of that decision would "vitalize or resuscitate" the statute without re-enactment by the legislature but the reversal should not be given retrospective effect against persons who had acted in reliance upon the former decision.

Crigler v. Shepler (1909) 79 Kans. 834, 101 Pac. 619, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 500, in which the plaintiff was employed by defendant as a liquor salesman in Kansas and rendered services therein at a time when there was on the statute books of Kansas a "statute" which in terms made such performance illegal, but prior to the making of this contract and its performance by plaintiff the state supreme court had held the statute unconstitutional. Plaintiff sued for commissions. Held, (1) that the statute was constitutional, following then recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court upon like statutes of other states; (2) that the performance was illegal and plaintiff could not recover for the services, saying, "The former decision between other parties, holding the statute invalid, does not give the plaintiff a right to recover."

State v. Longino (1915) 109 Miss. 125, 67 So. 902, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 371, where it was held that when a valid state statute is first construed by the state supreme court not to make a given act criminal and later construed to do so, a person who has done the act in the interval is not criminally punishable. Accord: Odom v. State (1923) 132 Miss. 3, 95 So. 253. The doctrine of State v. Longino was approved in State v. Striggles (1926) 202 Iowa 1318, 210 N. W. 137, but it was there held not to apply where the decision relied upon was that of any court inferior to the state supreme court. The court adds, "We might say in passing, however, that had the county attorney, when he was confronted by the facts,

CHARLES H. DAUCHEY COMPANY, INC. v. JOSEPH E. FARNEY AND JOSEPH A. FARNEY.

Take

1918. Supreme Court of New York. 105 Misc. 470.

Complaint was based upon section 44 of the Personal Property Law (Laws of 1914, chap. 507), and alleged that the defendant Joseph E. Farney sold to the defendant Joseph A. Farney a stock of merchandise and fixtures in bulk, and alleged the defendants' non-compliance with the said statute, and demanded the appointment of the defendant Joseph A. Farney as receiver for the benefit of the plaintiff and all other creditors similarly situated.

made a motion to dismiss the case, thus exercising his discretion, and the case had been dismissed, his action in so doing would not be subject to criticism"; and the court expressed gratification with the trial court's assessment of the minimum fine. [This case like the O'Neil case arose under a statute of the kind usually regarded as making the mere doing of a specified act an offense though it is done without an "evil mind" or "criminal intent."]

Lutwin v. State (1922) 97 N. J. L. 67, 117 Atl. 164, 166:—Statute No. 1 defined the act done by the accused to be a crime. Subsequent statute No. 2 in terms repealed No. 1 and an appellate court (not the court of last resort) held No. 2 to be constitutional and operative to accomplish the repeal. The accused thereafter did the act. Held, by the same appellate court that if (as was asserted by counsel) the court of last resort had between the time the accused did the act and the time of his indictment held No. 2 invalid and No. 1 not repealed by invalid No. 2, nevertheless the indictment should be quashed. The reason assigned was that though No. 1 defined the mere doing of the act to be a crime, requiring no intent to be proved, "there could be no presumptive intent to do a conscious wrong, for the act of wrongdoing has the sanction of law and the favorable judgment of the court at the time of the alleged criminal act. To punish one for doing an act apparently lawful at the time, because he could not foresee the possible judgment of another court, would be akin to methods applied during the times of the Inquisition."

Pierce v. Pierce (1874) 46 Ind. 86:—An Indiana statute of 1852 provided that where an intestate was survived by his widow and his mother the former should have three-fourths of the estate, the latter one-fourth. An amending act of 1853 changed this to an equal division between the widow and mother. In 1854, acts passed in the manner of the act of 1853 were held by the state supreme court to be unconstitutionally enacted. D died intestate in 1862, leaving only his widow and his mother. Relying upon the decision of the court the administrator distributed the estate in accordance with the original provision of the act of 1852. In 1867 the state supreme court overruled the decision of 1854. In 1867 the mother sued the widow and the administrator to get a full half. Judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed, on the ground that the act of 1853 had been the law of the state from the time of the enactment. The court added that it would not say what the rule would be "had the parties to whom the estate descended conveyed the same" before the reversal "and had the purchaser been the party asserting a claim." Accord: Christopher v. Mungen (1911) 61 Fla. 513, 534, 55 So. 273.

On retroactivity of judicial decisions that overrule prior decisions, in general, not involving reversals as to constitutionality of legislation, see Mason v. Nelson Cotton Co. (1908) 148 N. Car. 492, 62 S. E. 625, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1221, 128 Am. St. 635. Hoven v. McCarthy Bros. Co. (1925) 163 Minn. 339, 341-342, 204 N. W. 29; Hollaman v. El Arco Mines Co. (1910) 137 App. Div. 862, 122 N. Y. S. 852.

Ross, J. The defendant Joseph E. Farney about April 1, 1914, at Lyons Falls, N. Y., opened a retail hardware store. * * * [On January 24, 1916] Joseph E. Farney executed a bill of sale to Joseph A. Farney of his entire stock of goods, fixtures and book accounts. [Plaintiff is a judgment creditor of the seller, on a judgment obtained March 7, 1916. The court found that Joseph A. Farney, the buyer, did not comply with the Act of 1914 referred to in the complaint.] * * * So that the plaintiff's claim, and the defendant's claim as well, must rest solely upon the rights of the parties on January 24, 1916, under the act in question. * * *

A reference to the several acts of the legislature in reference to the sale of merchandise in bulk and the decisions thereunder is essential to an understanding of the questions involved.

Chapter 528 of the Laws of 1902 enacted that a sale of a stock of merchandise other than in the ordinary course of trade, in the regular and usual prosecution of the seller's business, or the sale of an entire stock of merchandise in bulk, "shall be fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the seller, unless the seller * * *" complies with a number of conditions which are specifically set forth in said act, which conditions are based upon a plan to give notice to the creditors of the seller of such proposed sale. This act was held in the case of Wright v. Hart, 182 N. Y. 330, decided October, 1905, to be unconstitutional in that it violated both the federal and state Constitution imposing arbitrary restrictions upon the liberty of contract. After the decision of the Wright case the validity of similar statutes was upheld in two cases by the United States Supreme Court. Lemieux v. Young, 211 U. S. 489, under a Connecticut statute, decided in January, 1909, and Kidd, Dater & Price Co. v. Musselman Grocery Co., 217 id. 461, under a Michigan statute, decided in May, 1910. Those decisions only determined that the laws under review were not repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution "because wanting in due process of law and denying equal protection of the laws." And this left still undecided the correctness of the decision in Wright v. Hart as to whether there was any conflict in the act of 1902 with our state constitution. See opinion of Cardozo, J., Klein v. Maravelas, 219 N. Y. 383.

Chapter 528 of the Laws of 1902 was amended by Laws of 1904, chapter 569, which amendment act provided that such sale "will be presumed to be fraudulent and void as against the creditors of the seller." This latter provision was re-enacted by Laws of 1907, chapter 722, also Laws of 1909, chapter 45, which also repealed Laws of 1902, chapter 528. The last word of the legislature was Laws of 1914, chapter 507, being section 44 of the Personal Property Law, which substantially in this regard re-enacted Laws of 1902, chapter 528, and provided that such sale "shall be void as against the creditors of the seller," etc. Under the act last cited, the Court of Appeals in the case of Klein v. Maravelas, 219 N. Y. 383 (December, 1916) held that the act in question is a valid enactment and violates no provision of either the Federal or State Constitution and overruled the case of Wright v. Hart.

In so far as the effect of a sale of merchandise in bulk is concerned there are no essential differences in the act of 1902 and the act of 1914. See opinion Cardozo, J., in Klein v. Maravelas, 219 N. Y. 387, in which the learned judge said:

> "The present statute is similar in essentials to the one condemned in 1905. In details it may be distinguished from the earlier one, but the details are in reality trifling. We cannot without a sacrifice of candor rest our judgment upon them."

What was the law of this state in regard to the sale of merchandise in bulk after the rendition of the decision of the Court of Appeals in Wright v. Hart, in October, 1905, and until the decision of the Court of Appeals in Klein v. Maravelas in December, 1916,—had parties selling and buying merchandise in bulk during said time the right to rely on the case of Wright v. Hart, or did they take the hazard that the principle of said case might be modified or impaired by subsequent acts of the legislature of the state, or by subsequent decisions either of its Court of Appeals, or of the Supreme Court of the United States? The question in the instant case is whether a decision of our Court of Appeals, though subsequently reversed by the same court, affords until such reversal "a reliable basis for business dealings."

The claim of the defendants is that the decision of the Court of Appeals in Wright v. Hart (1905) became and henceforth was the law of this state in so far as it determined questions other than a construction of the federal Constitution until the overruling decision of Klein v. Maravelas in December, 1916, and that the defendants in making the sale in question relied upon and are protected by the decision in Wright v. Hart.

Opposing theories are presented whether the law is a complete and existing entity which is merely interpreted by the courts, which interpretation may be incorrect, or whether the law is as stated by Alexander Lincoln in a leading article in 21 Harvard Law Review (1908) page 120, on page 128:

> "The law as an abstract entity is in truth nothing more than the sum of all the sources of the law actually in existence, together with the potential changes and additions which may occur from future legislative enactments and judicial decisions."

The former theory is apparently supported by Justice Story in the case of Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1 (1842), as appears in the following quotation at page 18:

> "In the ordinary use of language it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws. They are, at most, > only evidence of what the laws are, and are not of themselves laws. They are often re-examined, revised and qualified by the courts themselves, whenever they are found to be either defective or ill-founded, or otherwise incorrect."

* * * The former theory was also held by no less authority than the Commentator Blackstone (1 Black. Com. *70) to the effect that a decision is only a more or less successful attempt to discover and state what the law is. See note, 29 Harvard Law Review, 80.

This theory is stated by Surrogate Fowler in Matter of Tod, 85 Misc. Rep. 298:

> "It is for this reason, among others, that the common law assumes that the last decision of a final tribunal expresses the correct rule always latent in the bosom of the common law. Thus it is that the final judgment of a court of last resort is, as it were, antedated, and in the common law system such last judgment is assumed to have been true all along. This is the established principle pursuant to which I am fortunately compelled to approach the solution of all these important matters now before me."
> See James C. Carter's work "Law, Its Growth, Origin & Function."

The doctrine that a decision of a court is the law itself and therefore is a continuing rule of conduct upon which trust may be placed until fair notice is given that not it but another rule shall prevail in the future receives the sanction of Sir Henry Maine. Maine Ancient Law, chap. 2. See article of Wilbur Larremore "Stare Decisis and Contractual Rights," 22 Harvard Law Review, 182. Also article of Mr. Lincoln to which reference has been made (21 Harvard Law Review, p. 129), in which he uses the following language:

> "Instead, then, of being a complete and unchangeable body or entity, law is something incomplete and imperfect, but containing a wonderful power for adaptability and growth. It is true that law in the abstract can be applied to every case, since every case must be decided. The conclusion is not, however, that law is already complete, but that law is made in order to decide the case. The system is complete because of the fact that judges can and do make law, and so the system can be applied to all possible new circumstances. Judges do not enact laws as a legislature does, nor do they act arbitrarily, but they do make laws indirectly in the course of giving their decisions, and since they must decide a case in one way or the other, they cannot avoid so doing."

* * * Harris v. Jex, 55 N. Y. 421 (1874), was an action to foreclose a mortgage given prior to 1862, the time of the passage of the Legal Tender Act by Congress. On the 1st day of March, 1870, the defendant, Jex, tendered to the plaintiff the amount apparently due in United States legal tender notes, which was refused, the plaintiff claiming that she was entitled to payment in gold or its equivalent. In December, 1869, Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wall. 605, the Supreme Court of the United States held the Legal Tender Act unconstitutional as to antecedent contracts. This decision was reversed in Knox v. Lee, 12 Wall. 457, decided December, 1870. The tender made by the defendant to the plaintiff in this case was made on the 1st day of March, 1870. The court in sustaining the view of the plaintiff used the following language (page 424):

> "The plaintiff had a right to repose upon the decision of the highest judicial tribunal in the land. It was, as applied to the relations between these parties and to this case, the law, and not the mere evidence of the law. Respect for the decisions of courts is a duty inculcated by writers upon the law, and enforced by considerations of public policy. It is said by Kent (1 Com. 476): 'If a decision has been made upon solemn argument and mature deliberation, the presumption is in favor of its correctness, and the community have a right to regard it as a just declaration or exposition of the law, and to regulate their actions and contracts by it.'"

* * * The claim of the plaintiff that it had a right to rely upon the act of 1914, the validity of which was subsequently attested by the Court of Appeals, is one which can be, and has been in this case, supported by forceful argument; but I think the weight of authority and considerations of public policy justify a finding in the language of Kent: "If a decision has been made upon solemn argument and mature deliberation, the presumption is in favor of its correctness, and the community have a right to regard it as a just declaration or exposition of the law, and to regulate their actions and contracts by it." * * *

Judgment for the defendants with costs to the defendant Joseph A. Farney.

STATE EX REL. NUVEEN v. GREER ET AL.

1924. Supreme Court of Florida. 88 Fla. 249, 257.

[In refusing to issue a mandamus at the suit of bondholders to compel the defendants, officers of a city, to levy a tax for the payment of the interest on, and ultimately the principal of, bonds issued by the city under the apparent authority of a statute which after the bonds were issued had been held to be in conflict with the state constitution:]

WHITFIELD, P. J. * * * Here the bonds are invalid and there is no duty to pay the bonds. But there would be a legal duty to pay a judgment duly obtained for the return of the money, with appropriate interest, that was received and used by the municipality.

Issuance of the bonds was not expressly forbidden and penalized and the municipality and the relator, bond holder, were not in pari delicto. Thomas v. City of Richmond, 12 Wall. (U. S.) 349, 20 L.

Ed. 453. Neither party was at fault in the premises. The bonds were expressly authorized by statute and were issued as required by the statute. The proceeds were received by the municipality and used for its benefit. The implied limitation that was held by the Court to make the issue of the bonds contrary to organic law, was developed by judicial interpretation after the bonds had been sold and the money had been used by the city for its purposes as expressly and specifically authorized by the statute. These circumstances clearly render the municipality liable for the amount of the money so received by it with interest. See Brill v. Washington Railway & Electric Co., 215 U. S. 527; Louisiana v. Wood, 102 U. S. 294. See 7 A. L. R. 346 and notes. * * *

The bonds having been issued contrary to law as judicially determined, it is not the legal duty of the municipal officers to levy taxes to pay the interest on or the principal of the bonds as such, or to pay the indebtedness according to the tenor of the bonds; and correlatively, the bonds being illegal, the relator has no legal right to have them paid by the process of mandamus. Payment of a judgment duly obtained for the money received by the municipality would be a legal duty of the municipal officers, which duty the relator could enforce by mandamus or other appropriate proceedings in due course of law. * * *

Where a legislative enactment authorizing a municipality to issue bonds has never been adjudged to be constitutional, and it is judicially declared to be in conflict with organic law, the constitution by its dominant force renders the enactment inoperative ab initio, and bonds issued thereunder are void because issued without authority of law. * * *

While a municipality may be estopped to deny that the authority to issue bonds given by a valid statute was not properly exercised, in issuing bonds to bona fide holders for full value (County of Jefferson v. B. C. Lewis & Sons, 20 Fla. 980), yet a municipality will not be estopped from denying the validity of a statute under which bonds were issued even to bona fide holders. See L. R. A. 1915A 916 Notes.

* * * When an Act of the legislature is duly held to be invalid because in conflict with express or implied provisions of the constitution, it is invalid from its enactment and not from the date of the decision adjudging its invalidity; * * * all persons are held to notice that all statutes are subject to all express and implied applicable provisions of the constitution, * * * and further that the courts have no power to control the effect of the constitution in nullifying a statute that is adjudged to be in conflict with any of the express or implied provisions of the constitution. * * *

Validity or invalidity relate to the enactment of a statute under the existing organic law and not to a subsequent date. The courts have no power to make a statute inoperative only from the date of an adjudicated invalidity, because the courts merely adjudge that a statute conflicts with organic law, and the constitution then operates to make the statute void from its enactment, the courts having no power to control the operation of the constitution. It is not material whether the courts adjudge a statute to conflict with an express provision, or with a necessarily implied provision of the constitution, or with a subtle and not readily perceived implied provision of the constitution, since if a conflict with organic law is adjudged it is equally effective to let the constitution nullify the statute whether the conflict is with express or implied provisions or whether the implied provision is patent or concealed. The constitution recognizes no distinction in judicial processes between inescapable conclusions and other permissible conclusions in interpreting the controlling law. The adjudication suffices for the operation of the constitution, and the ease or difficulty of the processes leading to the adjudication is wholly immaterial. People v. Albertson, 55 N. Y. 50; 6 R. C. L. p. 105; 25 R. C. L. 979.

Rights acquired under a statute while it is duly adjudged to be constitutional are valid legal rights that are protected by the constitution, not by judicial decision. But rights acquired under a statute that has not been adjudged valid are subject to be lost if the statute is adjudged invalid; though the statute was considered valid by eminent attorneys, public officers and others. * * *

In this case the statute was never held to be valid. It was never administered as law in the courts of the state, and it was held invalid when first challenged. The facts that the validity of the statute was assumed by the legislature in enacting it and by the municipal officers in issuing the bonds under the statute and that eminent counsel considered the statute valid, do not affect the result that flows from a judicial adjudication that the statute is invalid. When the statute in this case was held to be invalid, it was void ab initio and bonds issued under it are void even though in the hands of bona fide holders for full value. The purchaser took the bonds subject to the contingency that the statute might be duly adjudicated to be invalid, its validity not having been already adjudicated; and if the statute be held invalid the bonds are necessarily void for want of authority to issue them, even though they are in the hands of bona fide purchasers for value, and no principle of estoppel by recitals in the bonds or otherwise can make the municipality liable in a suit brought on the bonds. 19 R. C. L. p. 1006, § 300, Note 15. * * *

The legislature in view of organic limitations upon the subject, being without power to authorize the bond issue, the Act, Chapter 6095, Acts of 1909, purporting to validate the bonds is of course ineffectual. 12 C. J. 1091; 15 C. J. 627.

UNITED STATES v. REALTY COMPANY.

1896. Supreme Court of the United States. 163 U. S. 427.

[An act of Congress of October 1, 1890 directed to be paid from the treasury of the United States a bounty of a few cents per pound to persons who produced sugar within the United States between July 1, 1891 and July 1, 1905. In 1894 Congress repealed the above act. By another act, March 2, 1895, Congress appropriated more than five million dollars to be paid to persons who had complied with the repealed act of 1890 and had produced or should produce sugar in the United States between specified dates the latest being June 30, 1895 and had not received bounty or had been prevented from receiving it by the repeal of the act of 1890. The defendants in error sued to recover their proportion of the appropriation of 1895, and obtained judgments in the lower court.]

MR. JUSTICE PECKHAM delivered the opinion of the court. * * *
In our opinion it is not correct to say that no moral, equitable or honorable obligation can attach in favor of persons situated as were the defendants in error here, when the act of 1895 was passed. We think obligations of that nature may arise out of such circumstances. We regard the question of the unconstitutionality of the bounty provisions of the act of 1890 as entirely immaterial to the discussion here. These parties did not at that time (when manufacturing under its provisions) know that the act was unconstitutional; they could not be regarded as failing to do their whole duty because they proceeded with the manufacture of sugar in reliance upon the bounty promised by the government, under an act recognized by the officers of the government as valid, and which they were at all times executing. But it is said that if the act be unconstitutional the law imputes to these parties at all times a knowledge of its invalidity, and that it is not rendered valid by acquiescence in its provisions for any length of time even by officers of the government holding the highest places therein and who are charged with its execution and believe in its validity. Being unconstitutional, there never was a moment, it is stated, when there was any valid act, and, therefore, no equities can arise in their favor because of any acts done by them upon the faith of the act, which they were bound to know was wholly void. This reasoning does not exactly fit the case. It is not a question whether any strictly legal rights can arise out of an unconstitutional act. It is a question whether equitable considerations can attach to a claim which, among other grounds, is based upon an act that was supposed by all the officers of the government to be valid and which was repealed only when the whole taxing act of 1890 was subjected to a careful and comprehensive revision. There are occasions when the presumption that every man knows the law must be enforced for the safety of society itself. An individual on trial for a violation of the criminal law will not be heard to allege as a defense that he did not know the act of which he was guilty was criminal. But in such a case as this, knowledge of the invalidity of the law in advance of any authoritative declaration to that effect will not be imputed to those who are acting under its provisions, and receiving the benefits provided by its terms. These parties cannot be held bound, upon the question of equitable or moral consideration, to know what no one else actually knew, and what no one could know prior to the determination, by some judicial tribunal, that the law was unconstitutional. Although it should finally turn out that the law is invalid, and is so pronounced, yet during all the time of its operation, as has been stated, all the officers of the government united in treating it as a valid act. No court had determined to the contrary. It was a question at least admitting of argument. Under such circumstances can it be said that the plaintiffs in these suits and persons situated like them were bound to know that this law was and would be pronounced unconstitutional, and that no rights could be acquired under it, and that they would not be justified in proceeding to manufacture sugar according to its provisions? Could no equities be built up in their behalf (which the government might subsequently recognize) founded upon the belief that the act was valid, and upon the action of the officers of the government under it, because it was, or subsequently might be pronounced to be, unconstitutional?

We are of the opinion that the parties, situated as were the plaintiffs in these actions, acquired claims upon the government of an equitable, moral or honorary nature. Could Congress legally recognize and pay them although the act of 1890 as to its bounty provisions might be unconstitutional? It is true that in general an unconstitutional act of Congress is the same as if there were no act. That is regarding it in its purely legal aspect. Being in violation of the Constitution, that instrument must govern, and no one can base any legal claim as arising out of such an act. That is a very different principle, however, from that which we think governs in this case. The persons for whose benefit the appropriation contained in the act of 1895 was made are not, in the view we take, asserting the existence of a legal and valid debt against the United States which is at the same time based upon an unconstitutional act of Congress. No such inconsistent and illogical position is taken. They are asserting that by reason of the occurrences which took place before the appropriation, among which was the passage of the act of 1890, they were so placed before Congress, as to authorize that body to recognize the equities of the situation, and to pay their claims which, while they were not of a legal character, were nevertheless of so meritorious and equitable a nature as to authorize the nation through its Congress to appropriate money to pay them.

It is also true that it does not appear from the terms of the act of appropriation that the parties for whose benefit it is made had commenced the business of sugar manufacturing or enlarged their previous manufacture of sugar by reason of the bounties provided under the act of 1890. That was not necessary. There was enough in the circumstances which are before this court and which have been already in part detailed to make it a question for the decision of Congress, whether upon the whole the persons so situated were equitably entitled to its consideration and to the appropriation asked for. If Congress possessed the power in any event to recognize equities of such a nature, we think it had enough in the case before it to uphold a favorable decision thereof. It is unnecessary to hold here that Congress has power to appropriate the public money in the treasury to any purpose whatever which it may choose to say is in payment of a debt or for purposes of the general welfare. A decision of that question may be postponed until it arises.

There was enough in the case as presented to Congress upon which to base the assertion that there was a moral and honorable claim upon the public treasury which that body had the constitutional right to recognize and pay.

Under the provisions of the Constitution, (Article 1, Section 8,) Congress has power to lay and collect taxes, etc., "to pay the debts" of the United States. Having power to raise money for that purpose, it of course follows that it has power when the money is raised to appropriate it to the same object. What are the debts of the United States within the meaning of this constitutional provision? It is conceded and indeed it cannot be questioned that the debts are not limited to those which are evidenced by some written obligation or to those which are otherwise of a strictly legal character. The term "debts" includes those debts or claims which rest upon a merely equitable or honorary obligation, and which would not be recoverable in a court of law if existing against an individual. The nation, speaking broadly, owes a "debt" to an individual when his claim grows out of general principles of right and justice; when, in other words, it is based upon considerations of a moral or merely honorary nature, such as are binding on the conscience or the honor of an individual, although the debt could obtain no recognition in a court of law. * * *

The judgments are, therefore,

Affirmed.[18]

[18] Speaking of the above case, it was said by Collins, J. for the court in Minnesota Sugar Co. v. Iverson (1903) 91 Minn. 30, 40, 97 N. W. 454: "That case has been very severely criticised, and we are unable to find any other in which

SHEPHARD v. WHEELING.

1887. Supreme Court of West Virginia. 30 W. Va. 479.

[A West Virginia statute purported to authorize the state circuit court upon petition of "ten tax-payers" of a city to "supersede, revoke and annul" "any ordinance" "made contrary to law." Ten tax-payers of the city of Wheeling petitioned the circuit court to exercise this power against an ordinance of that city which purported to create a board of police and fire commissioners. The court directed the city and the commissioners to be summoned as defendants. They appeared and moved for a dismissal asserting that the state statute was invalid. Overruling this motion the circuit court gave judgment annulling the ordinance in part. The defendants obtained a writ of error.]

Snyder, J. * * * The fifth article of our constitution expressly declares that "the legislative, executive, and judicial departments shall be separate and distinct, so that neither shall exercise the powers properly belonging to either of the others." It necessarily follows, then, from this positive constitutional inhibition, that if this act, in any degree, requires the circuit court to exercise legislative powers, it is to that extent void. The constitution does not define what are legislative or what are judicial powers; but what properly belongs to the one and what to the other of these departments of the government is to be determined by reference to the established law as it existed at the time the constitution was framed. It is an elementary principle of universal application that the laws and ordinances of a city adopted by its council, within the scope of its authority, partake of the nature, and it has been held that the unconstitutional act of a legislative body is any justification in law for any action or nonaction. It has again and again been held that an unconstitutional statute is simply a statute in form, is not a law, and under every circumstance or condition lacks the force of law, and, further, that it is of no more saving effect to justify action taken under it than as though it had never been enacted. A moral obligation upon the part of the state must have something more substantial than legislation obnoxious to the fundamental law to rest upon—something more for a foundation or starting point than a statute which is itself immoral."

In Miller v. Dunn (1887) 72 Cal. 462, 14 Pac. 27, 1 Am. St. 67, W. did work for the state under an agreement made solely under the authority of a state statute. His claim was unenforceable because the statute was unconstitutional. The state constitution forbade the legislature to pay any claim arising against the state out of any agreement or contract made "without express authority of law." The legislature made an appropriation to pay W.'s claim. The court held the appropriation valid for the reason that the unconstitutional statute satisfied the requirement of "express authority of law." In the majority opinion by Paterson, J., it is said:—"It is unnecessary to say whether in all cases an act duly passed and approved would be 'express authority of law' within the meaning of that section. There may be statutes palpably violative of principles so plain and well understood as to be no authority or protection at all; but as to that I express no opinion."

have the same effect within the corporate limits of the city, that the same laws could have if they had been enacted by the legislature of the state in which the city is located. In the one case the legislature exercises its legislative power directly, while in the other it does so indirectly, by delegating to the city a portion of its functions; but whether the power is exercised directly by the legislature itself, or indirectly by the council of the city under a legislative grant, the result is the same, and in both instances the power exercised is legislative. The enactment of an ordinance by a city council, or the enactment of a statute by a legislature, being in each case the exercise of legislative power, the repeal of such ordinance or statute must likewise be the exercise of legislative power. It does not require any precise definition of judicial power, or any nice discrimination as to its extent and limitations to determine that the act of repealing a statute is not the exercise of judicial power. * * *

Courts determine what the rights of parties are in suits or controversies inter partes which come before them in the ordinary and proper course of judicial proceedings. In determining the rights of the parties to the suit, they incidentally determine the law; but the judicial function is as effectually performed by the court which expresses no formal opinion as by the court which in an opinion announces the reasons for its decision. * * *

When, in the course of determining the rights of the parties to a particular suit or controversy, the court finds it necessary to ascertain whether or not a statute is unconstitutional, the court must necessarily pass upon that question; but in doing so it does not annul or repeal the statute if it finds it in conflict with the constitution. It simply refuses to recognize it, and determines the rights of the parties just as if such statute had no existence. The court may give its reasons for ignoring or disregarding the statute, but the decision affects the parties only, and there is no judgment against the statute. The opinion or reasons of the court may operate as a precedent for the determination of other similar cases, but it does not strike the statute from the statute-book; it does not repeal, "supersede, revoke, or annul" the statute. The parties to that suit are concluded by the judgment, but no one else is bound. A new litigant may bring a new suit, based upon the very same statute, and the former decision can not be pleaded as an estoppel, but can be relied on only as a precedent. This constitutes the reason and basis of the fundamental rule that a court will never pass upon the constitutionality of a statute unless it is absolutely necessary to do so in order to decide the cause before it. * * *

In a very able opinion by Shaw, C. J., * * * that eminent judge says: "* * * Prima facie, and upon the face of the act itself, nothing will generally appear to show that the act is not valid; and it is only when some person attempts to resist its operation, and calls in the aid of the judicial power to pronounce it void as to him, his property, or his rights, that the objection of unconstitutionality can be presented and sustained. Respect for the legislature, therefore, concurs with well-established principles of law in the conclusion that such act is not void, but voidable only; and it follows, as a necessary legal inference from this position, that this ground of avoidance can be taken advantage of by those only who have a right to question the validity of the act, and not by strangers. To this extent only is it necessary to go in order to secure and protect the rights of all persons against the unwarranted exercise of legislative powers; and to this extent only, therefore, are courts of justice called on to interpose." Wellington v. Petitioners, etc., 16 Pick. 96. * * *

The claim of the defendants in error requires them to maintain that the ordinance must be held naught by the court for all purposes, and not merely for the purposes of this proceeding; for, unless such is the case, no one will be bound by the judgment, except, perhaps, the petitioners,—certainly, no other resident of the city would be bound. * * * The petitioners do not allege any personal grievance or special injury to themselves or their rights. * * *

The Circuit Court of Ohio county therefore erred in overruling the motion to dismiss the petition of J. B. Shephard and others, and for that reason the judgment of said court must be reversed, and said petition dismissed, with costs.[19]

[19] Where the question raised was whether a New Jersey statute was a special and local act contrary to a restriction of the state constitution, Pitney, J., sitting alone for the Supreme Court of New Jersey, said:—"By stipulation of the parties it is made to appear that Paterson is the only city where proceedings were taken for division of wards in cities of the second class in virtue of the act of 1905, and that at the time of the approval of the act of 1906 Paterson was the only city where commissioners had been theretofore appointed by the mayor to divide the city into wards. Conceding the propriety of hesitating before deciding an act of the legislature to be unconstitutional upon a stipulation of parties, it must, at the same time, be remarked that in this litigation, as in all litigations, the interests of the parties are subject to the management and control of their attorneys and counsel respecting the production of evidence. This stipulation relates solely to matters of fact, and it is proper—and, indeed, necessary—for the court in each case to find the law that shall bind the parties litigant as applied to such facts as they produce in evidence. A decision based upon stipulated facts that results in declaring a law unconstitutional does not wipe the act from the statute books, but merely denies its efficacy to a party who has admitted the existence of a state of facts that in the opinion of the court renders the law unconstitutional." Rutten v. City of Paterson (1906). 73 N. J. L. 467, 475, 64 Atl. 573.

"These decisions [as to the effect upon state legislation of the due process of law clause of the Fourteenth Amendment] establish: (1) That the Supreme Court does not act at all upon a statute or undertake by any decree to affect it generally; that it merely declares the law applicable to the case of a particular litigant. (2) That the inquiry under the Fourteenth Amendment does not and can not embrace the general question of the validity of the statute, but it undertakes only to determine, and has only the effect of determining, whether the rights of the particular litigant are protected by the Fourteenth Amendment against the operation of that statute. In Dahnke-Walker Milling Co. v. Bondurant, 257 U. S. 282, 289, 66 L. ed. 239 the court said: 'A statute may be

NORTON v. SHELBY COUNTY.

1886. Supreme Court of the United States. 118 U. S. 425.

[A Tennessee statute purported to alter the county government of Shelby county by substituting a board of commissioners in lieu of the existing governing board called the "County Court" which was composed of elected justices of the peace. The statute purported to confer all the powers of the County Court upon the commissioners, including its power to issue county bonds in exchange for shares in a railway company, as an aid to the construction of the road. Within a month after the enactment of the statute the justices of the peace brought suit in an inferior state court to test its validity and from a judgment against them they appealed to the state supreme court. Pending this appeal the commissioners issued the bonds in question, in conformity with the statute. On the appeal the state supreme court held the statute invalid, that the old

"The constitutional validity of this statute was assailed in Bowman v. Virginia State Entomologist, 128 Va. 351, 105 S. E. 141, 12 A. L. R. 1136. In a very lucid and exhaustive opinion by the late Judge Sims, every objection raised to the statute was satisfactorily answered, and the statute was upheld and enforced. The same objections and some others have been raised in the instant case. So far as the facts of the two cases are the same, the Bowman Case stands until reversed. All objections to the constitutionality of the statute are concluded by the Bowman Case, whether brought to the attention of the court in that case or not. This must be so of necessity, for if a statute is unconstitutional for any reason, it is a void statute, and 'whenever a statute is enforced by a judgment or decree of a court, it is a judicial determination that the statute is a valid enactment and is free from all constitutional objections. If unconstitutional for any reason, whether assigned or not, the statute is void.' Portsmouth v. Weiss (1926), 145 Va. 94, 133 S. E. 781. We must, therefore, regard the assignments of error on constitutional grounds as an application to the court to reconsider its holding in the Bowman Case." Miller v. State Entomologist (1926) 146 Va. 175, 180, 135 S. E. 813, 814, per Burks, J.

Iowa passed a statute containing a provision prohibiting shipment of intoxicating liquor into the state. This provision was held unconstitutional in Rhodes v. Iowa (1898) 170 U. S. 412, 42 L. ed. 1088, on the ground that such liquor was a legitimate article of interstate commerce and that under the Commerce Clause, Congress alone could "outlaw" it. Subsequently Congress enacted a statute (the Webb-Kenyon Act) "outlawing" such liquor in interstate commerce, that is, in effect, making it subject to state prohibition of shipment into the state. In Stajcar v. Dickinson (1918) 185 Iowa 49, 169 N. W. 756 the Iowa court said of the above provision of the Iowa statute, "although non-enforceable, it remained a part of the statute, and by the enactment of the so-called Webb-Kenyon Act became operative and enforceable the same as though it had not previously been declared unconstitutional or had been enacted by the legislature subsequent to the passage of the law of Congress. State v. United States Express Co., (1914) 164 Iowa 112, 145 N. W. 451; Miller Brewing Co. v. Stevens (1897) 102 Iowa 60, 71 N. W. 186."

County Court was recognized in the state constitution and could not be supplanted by the legislature. A few years later Norton brought suit on some of the bonds in a Circuit Court of the United States which gave judgment for the county. On writ of error:]

MR. JUSTICE FIELD delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

But it is contended that if the act creating the board was void, and the commissioners were not officers de jure, they were nevertheless officers de facto, and that the acts of the board as a de facto court are binding upon the county. This contention is met by the fact that there can be no officer, either de jure or de facto, if there be no office to fill. As the act attempting to create the office of commissioner never became a law, the office never came into existence. Some persons pretended that they held the office, but the law never recognized their pretensions, nor did the supreme court of the state. Whenever such pretensions were considered in that court, they were declared to be without any legal foundation, and the commissioners were held to be usurpers.

The doctrine which gives validity to acts of officers de facto, whatever defects there may be in the legality of their appointment or election, is founded upon considerations of policy and necessity, for the protection of the public and individuals whose interests may be affected thereby. Offices are created for the benefit of the public, and private parties are not permitted to inquire into the title of persons clothed with the evidence of such offices and in apparent possession of their powers and functions. For the good order and peace of society their authority is to be respected and obeyed until in some regular mode prescribed by law their title is investigated and determined. It is manifest that endless confusion would result if in every proceeding before such officers their title could be called in question. But the idea of an officer implies the existence of an office which he holds. It would be a misapplication of terms to call one an officer who holds no office, and a public office can exist only by force of law. This seems to us so obvious that we should hardly feel called upon to consider any adverse opinion on the subject but for the earnest contention of plaintiff's counsel that such existence is not essential, and that it is sufficient if the office be provided for by any legislative enactment, however invalid. Their position is, that a legislative act, though unconstitutional, may in terms create an office, and nothing further than its apparent existence is necessary to give validity to the acts of its assumed incumbent. That position, although not stated in this broad form, amounts to nothing else. It is difficult to meet it by any argument beyond this statement. An unconstitutional act is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; it creates no office;

it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed. * * *

It remains to consider whether the action of the commissioners in subscribing for stock of the Mississippi River Railroad Company and issuing the bonds, of which those in suit are a part, being originally invalid, was afterwards ratified by the county.[20] * * *

It is unnecessary to pursue this subject further. We are satisfied that none of the positions taken by the plaintiff can be sustained. The original invalidity of the acts of the commissioners has never been subsequently cured. It may be, as alleged, that the stock of the railroad company, for which they subscribed, is still held by the county. If so, the county may, by proper proceedings, be required to surrender it to the company, or to pay its value; for, independently of all restrictions upon municipal corporations, there is a rule of justice that must control them as it controls individuals. If they obtain the property of others without right, they must return it to the true owners, or pay for its value. But questions of that nature do not arise in this case. Here it is simply a question as to the validity of the bonds in suit, and as that cannot be sustained, the judgment below must be

Affirmed.

STATE OF OHIO v. GARDNER.

1896. Supreme Court of Ohio. 54 Ohio St. 24.

Bradbury, J. At the September term of the Court of Common Pleas of Summit County, Omar N. Gardner was indicted for offering a bribe to Joseph Hugill, a city commissioner of the city of Akron. The accused demurred to the indictment on the ground that the act of April 20, 1893, under which Hugill was performing the duties of his office, was unconstitutional and void. The demurrer was sustained and the defendant discharged. To this holding of the court the prosecuting attorney excepted, and, by virtue of the provisions of sections 7305, 7306, 7307 and 7308 of the Revised Statutes, has brought the question to this court for review. Two questions are presented by the record: First, whether the act of April 20, 1893, which provides a municipal government for the city of Akron, is unconstitutional or not, and second, if unconstitutional, whether its constitutionality may be assailed in the collateral way undertaken by the accused. The first question which logically arises is the latter of the two; for if the accused should not be allowed to raise the question, in the way he attempted, it follows that the constitutionality of the act which created the office was not before the court. Whether an act of the general assembly creating an office and providing a method for filling it may be collaterally attacked, is a question of the utmost importance in the practical administration of governmental affairs. Different courts have decided the question differently. Leach v. The People, 122 Ill. 420; Burt v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 31 Minn. 472; Coyle v. Com., 104 Pa. St. 117; Mechem on Pub. Off., §§ 318, 327; Van Fleet on Collateral Attack, § 21, p. 33; Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425; Hildreth v. McIntire, 1 J. J. Marsh 206.

[20] For an example of ratification see Road Imp. Dist. v. Burkett (1924) 163 Ark. 578, 260 S. W. 718.

It is now before this court for the first time, and while we are not insensible to the consideration justly due to the high standing of those courts and authors we are bound to reach that conclusion which, in our judgment, is best sustained by sound reason; and that best comports with an enlightened public policy and the maintenance of public order.

If the official acts of officers acting in an office created by an unconstitutional statute should be regarded as falling within the principle that sustains the act of de facto officers until the statute has been held unconstitutional by competent judicial authority in a proceeding appropriate to that end, all difficulty vanishes. The opposite doctrine is based upon the assertion that there can be no de facto officer unless there is a de jure office. That is a simple and summary way to dispose of this grave question. That there can be no de jure officer without a de jure office is a proposition to which all minds will, of course, assent. But that there can [not] be a de facto officer without a de jure office is disputable if the phrase "de facto officer" includes one who in fact discharges the duties of a public office, recognized by the great body of the people and by virtue of a statute solemnly passed by the general assembly of the state, which may be unconstitutional. That there have been many officers who occupied and discharged the duties of offices created by laws that were afterwards held unconstitutional is a fact well known to every one. While in such occupancy innumerable official acts affecting both public and private rights may have been actually performed by them, the duration of the office may, and often does, extend through a series of years. In the case before us the act in question is one creating a municipal government for the city of Akron, and has been in force since its enactment in April, 1893. It superseded an act passed in the year 1891 for the government of that city, which latter act was subject to the same assault that was attempted to be made on the one under consideration. The existing government of the populous and thriving city of Youngstown also rests upon the act now assailed; while that of the city of Springfield depends upon an act, at least as vulnerable to the same attack as the act under consideration. The constitutionality of the governments of the cities of Springfield and Youngstown has not been assailed, even collaterally, and may continue unchallenged for many years. The officers who in these cities occupy offices created by the acts upon which the city government rests, are daily discharging duties affecting the rights of the city, and the private rights of individuals. These officers are either usurpers and trespassers, or de facto officers; if the latter, the rights of the public, or of individuals who have submitted to their authority, or acquiesced in its exercise, would be unaffected by a subsequent authoritative judicial declaration that the statute was unconstitutional; if they were usurpers merely every official act would be a nullity, and interminable confusion possibly follow such a decision. Were such results to follow, the courts might well pause, before declaring unconstitutional an act establishing a city government, unless its constitutionality was challenged upon the threshold of its existence.

The common law in relation to de facto officers had its origin in England. It was there laid upon a foundation as broad as their necessities required. Such a thing as a written constitution controlling legislative action was unknown to their jurisprudence; whatever office parliament chose to create was a de jure office. In the states of the American Union, however, we find written constitutions, limiting the otherwise absolute power of the people to act through the legislative branch of the government. As a consequence of this peculiar feature of our government, a statute, regularly enacted by the legislative branch thereof may, in express terms, create a public office, or it may authorize a municipal corporation to create one; an incumbent may be appointed in the mode prescribed by the statute. He may qualify, enter upon the discharge of the duties of the office, and continue to discharge those duties indefinitely—possibly for many years—during which he daily performs official acts affecting not only public rights, but private rights of the most sacred character. After all this has occurred, the constitutionality of the statute is successfully challenged, and the statute declared void, and for the first time in the history of the common law its principles must be invoked to ascertain the status of the rights of persons, and of the public, that accrued before the law was declared void.

We think that principle of public policy, declared by the English courts three centuries ago, which gave validity to the official acts of persons who intruded themselves into an office to which they had not been legally appointed, is as applicable to the conditions now presented as they were to the conditions that then confronted the English judiciary. We are not required to find a name by which officers are to be known, who have acted under a statute that has subsequently been declared unconstitutional, though we think such officers might aptly be called "de facto officers." They actually performed official acts authorized by a statute solemnly enacted by the law making department of the government. Such a statute is presumed to be constitutional. Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. v. County of Clinton Comrs., 1 Ohio St. 77. The unbroken current of authority supports this proposition.

Courts in the practical administration of justice should regard the substance of things and deal with conditions as they actually exist. Here are grave and important official acts actually performed by virtue of an office, created under the provisions of a statute regularly enacted by that branch of the government to which the power to make law has been delegated by the constitution; there is a clearly established legal presumption of its validity. The public in its organized capacity, as well as private citizens, has acquiesced in and submitted to their authority. Such circumstances, the majority of the court are of opinion, are sufficient to give such color to their title as to make them de facto officers; but whether they fall within the previously existing definition of such officers or not, their official acts thus performed fall within the protection of that principle of public policy which defends them against collateral attack, and that therefore the question of the constitutionality of the statute in question was not before the court of common pleas.

Exceptions sustained. * * *[21]

LANG v. MAYOR ETC. OF THE CITY OF BAYONNE.

1907. Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey. 74 N. J. L. 455.

[Plaintiff had been appointed a policeman under authority given the city by legislation prior to the act of 1905. A supplement to the act of 1905 purported to create a board of ~~police com~~missioners with power to appoint and discharge for cause all members of the police force. After trial on charges before the commission it discharged the plaintiff from the force. The plaintiff petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus to compel the mayor and chief of police to restore him on the ground that the act of 1905 was invalid. The Supreme Court denied the petition whereupon he obtained this writ of error.]

[21] An indictment for extortion (exaction of illegal fees) charged that K was a license commissioner and by color of his office extorted. The court said such an indictment would be good against a de facto officer but that since the statute purporting to create the office was unconstitutional, the "inexorable legal conclusion" was that the indictment was fatally defective because it charged defendant with using for extortionate purposes an office that did not exist. Kirby v. State (1894) 57 N. J. L. 320, 31 Atl. 213.

GUMMERE, CHIEF JUSTICE. * * * At the term at which the hearing of this cause was had before the Supreme Court, that tribunal had before it for consideration and determination the case of State v. Nealon, 44 Vroom 100, which was a quo warranto proceeding, attacking the right of the members of the board of police commissioners of Bayonne to hold their respective offices, on the ground that the supplement of 1905, above referred to, was unconstitutional, and the conclusion reached by the Supreme Court in that case was in favor of this contention.

Notwithstanding the conclusion reached by it in the Nealon case, however, the court considered that * * * the board of police commissioners, at the time when it dismissed the relator from his position as a member of the police force, was a de facto body, exercising a public function under color of right, and that therefore its action in dismissing the relator could not be successfully challenged, * * *.

Plaintiff in error rests his right to a reversal of the judgment against him upon the ground that the conclusion of the Supreme Court that the board of police commissioners of Bayonne, appointed under authority of the supplement of 1905, was a de facto body, notwithstanding the fact that the statute is unconstitutional, is unsound in law, and * * * cites the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Flaucher v. Camden, 27 Vroom 244, as an authority in support of his contention that this question must be answered in the negative. An examination of the opinion in the Flaucher case discloses not only that the legal question there presented for consideration is identical with that which this case presents, but that the conclusion then reached by the Supreme Court is in direct opposition to that announced in the opinion delivered by it in this case. In the earlier case the plaintiff in error was tried in the police court of the city of Camden for selling liquor without a license. His defence was that he held a license from the county board of license commissioners. Notwithstanding this fact he was convicted. On writ of error this conviction was affirmed by the Supreme Court. The ground of affirmance was that the statute creating the county board of license commissioners was unconstitutional, as had already been determined by it at the same term in a quo warranto proceeding brought against the members of the board (Loucks v. Bradshaw, Id. 1); that being unconstitutional, the so-called county board of license commissioners never had legal existence, and that consequently the members of the board were neither de jure nor de facto officers; the court declaring that "where the office itself is created by an unconstitutional statute there can be no incumbent either de jure or de facto," and that consequently the license was mere waste paper. The opinion in the Flaucher case is a carefully considered one, and is fully supported by the authorities cited in it * * *, notably by that of Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425. * * * Notwithstanding that Norton v. Shelby County has been frequently cited with approval in other jurisdictions, I am unable to accept as sound the doctrine upon which it is rested, namely, that an unconstitutional law is void ab initio and affords no protection for acts done under its sanction. That it works injustice in its application to the citizen is apparent. The Flaucher case is a pregnant example of the truth of this assertion. The legislature had enacted a general law, making the unlicensed sales of intoxicating liquor a criminal offence, but legalizing such sales when made by a person holding a license from the proper authority. It then, by a subsequent statute, created the county board of license commissioners the proper authority to grant such licenses in the county of Camden. Flaucher applied to, and received from, this board a license to sell liquors at his saloon in the city of Camden. At that time the law creating the county board stood upon the statute book, apparently as valid, as much entitled to be respected and obeyed as the enactment which prohibited the sale of liquor without a license. And yet, notwithstanding that he scrupulously observed the law, as declared by the legislature, he was made a criminal by judicial decision, a decision which in its operation and effect was as much ex post facto as any statute which makes criminal an antecedent act which violated no law at the time when it was done.

The vice of the doctrine of Norton v. Shelby County, as it seems to me, is that it fails to recognize the right of the citizen, which is to accept the law as it is written, and not to be required to determine its validity. The latter is no more the function of the citizen than is the making of the law. Each of these functions has been delegated by the constitution, the one to the judicial and the other to the legislative branch of the government. And it is to be observed that the judicial function of determining the validity of statutes is confined within a very narrow scope. Courts are not vested with the general supervision of legislation. They have received no authority from the people to inspect each statute, as it comes from the hands of the legislature, and declare whether or not it infringes constitutional limitations. The function of the judicial department with respect to legislation deemed unconstitutional is not exercised in rem, but always in personam. Allison v. Corker, 38 Vroom 596. Only such statutes as affect the rights of parties to judicial proceedings are ever subjected to the scrutiny of the courts. And these are comparatively few. Of the twenty-four hundred and more acts of the legislature passed in this state during the last ten years, less than four hundred have received judicial consideration. The remaining two thousand which are upon the statute book (except those which have been repealed by the legislature) are accepted and enforced as a part of the law of the land. And this, in my judgment, is the only way in which a government such as ours can be safely administered. To require the citizen to determine for himself, at his peril, to what extent, if at all, the legislature has overstepped the boundaries defined by the constitution in passing this mass of statutes would be to place upon him an intolerable burden, one which it would be absolutely impossible for him to bear —a duty infinitely beyond his ability to perform. In my opinion the provisions of a solemn act of the legislature, so long as it has not received judicial condemnation, are as binding upon the citizen as is the judgment of a court rendered against him so long as it remains unreversed. * * * So necessary to the successful carrying on of a republican form of government is the principle * * *, that a statute which creates an office and provides an officer to perform its duties must have the force of law until condemned as unconstitutional by the courts, and that in the meantime the officer so provided is an officer de facto, that it is impliedly recognized and acted on, almost universally (so far as my examination has disclosed), in the case of municipal corporations which have been created by unconstitutional laws. Such corporations are declared to be de facto corporations. Dill. Mun. Corp., § 43a; Burt v. Winona, &c., Railroad Co., 31 Minn. 472, and cases cited. And not only so, but courts refuse to permit the legality of their existence to be called into question, except by the state itself, through its attorney-general, and hold that, so long as the state does not see fit to interfere and terminate the existence thereof by direct proceeding brought by the attorney-general, a municipal corporation which has been created by an unconstitutional statute may exercise upon the citizen, through its officers, the powers conferred upon it by the statute as fully and completely as if it was created by a law valid in every particular.[22]

And yet, if it be true that there cannot be such a thing as a de facto officer unless there be a de jure office, on what theory can the acts of such officers be recognized as valid? How can it be true that a law of this character, the validity of which no one but the attorney-general can challenge, and which is permitted to be enforced to the fullest extent against the public, "confers no rights, imposes no duties, affords no protection, creates no office," and "is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as if it had never been passed?" It may be said that, strictly speaking, the law does not recognize a municipality so created as an existing corporation; that it does not recognize the acts of its pretended officers as valid; but that it merely refuses to permit the right of such officers to exercise their functions to be challenged in order that a government which exists in fact may not be overthrown until another is provided. But this, it seems to me, is a mere verbal distinction. The fact remains that the acts of the incumbents of such so-called officers [offices] are as potent, so far as the public is concerned, as are the acts of any de jure officer who performs the duties of a legally existing office.

[22] For the various grounds upon which courts almost always reach this result see ch. 5 of Constantineau, Public Officers and the De Facto Doctrine (1910). See also, Charles W. Tooke, De Facto Municipal Corporations under Unconstitutional Statutes (1928) 37 Yale L. J. 935-954.

In my judgment, the same public policy which requires obedience from the citizen to the provisions of a public statute which creates a municipality, and provides for its government, even though unconstitutional, so long as it has not received judicial condemnation, equally justifies his obedience to every other law which the legislature has seen fit to enact until such law has been judicially declared to be invalid.

I conclude that an officer appointed under authority of a statute to fill an office created by the statute is at least a de facto officer, and that acts done by him antecedent to a judicial declaration that the statute is unconstitutional are valid, so far as they involve the interests of the public and of third persons; and the doctrine promulgated by the Supreme Court in Flaucher v. Camden rests upon an unsound basis and should not be followed.

The judgment under review must be affirmed for the reason stated in the opinion delivered in the court below, namely, that the board of police commissioners of Bayonne, at the time of its dismissal of the plaintiff in error from the municipal police force, was a de facto body and its action, therefore, valid as against him.[23]

[23] A note in (1907) 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 94-107 digests many cases on both sides of the conflict between the principal case and Norton v. Shelby County and discloses such a tendency to distinguish and qualify that a preponderance of authority does not appear. Moreover the note does not distinguish the character of the legal relations that were defeated or sustained by the adoption or rejection of the formula of Norton v. Shelby County. Compare the divers problems of the four cases herein printed with each other and with the issues in Ex parte Snyder (1876) 64 Mo. 58 (the invalid statute purported to create a court and a person convicted by that court was on habeas corpus discharged by the supreme court which recited the formula, no de facto officer where no de jure office); in State v. Pooler (1909) 105 Maine 224, 71 Atl. 119, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 408, 134 Am. St. 543 (a conviction was sustained over an exception to the indictment that a special prosecuting attorney represented the state in the grand jury room and swore in the witnesses, although the court conceded that the statute which purported to create the office of special prosecutor was unconstitutional), and in King Lumber Co. v. Crow (1908) 155 Ala. 504, 46 So. 646, 130 Am. St. 65. (Separate acknowledgment by a wife of assent to a mortgage on the homestead was necessary to bind her interest and a wife acknowledged before the "judge of the inferior court of Woodlawn," it was held in a bill to quiet title brought by a successor of the mortgagee that the acknowledgment was void because the statute which purported to create the court had not passed the legislature in the

MEAGHER v. COUNTY OF STOREY.

1869. Supreme Court of Nevada. 5 Nev. 244.

By the Court, Lewis, C. J. Plaintiff, who was the only qualified and acting Recorder for the City of Virginia, performed certain duties as a committing magistrate, imposed upon him by an act of the legislature, entitled "An Act concerning the Courts of Justice of this State and Judicial Officers," (Stats. 1864-5, 116) and now brings this action to recover the sum of five hundred and eighty dollars, claimed to be due for the services so imposed upon and performed by him. The law imposing these duties fixes no compensation for their performance, but the same fees are claimed by plaintiff that are allowed to committing magistrates for the like services.

Whilst not disputing the correctness of the charges thus made, the defendant contends that the law authorizing the plaintiff to perform the services is unconstitutional and void, and consequently that no compensation can be received. * * *

[The court held that the statute was in conflict with the state constitution; that the latter provided that the judicial power of the state should be vested in "a Supreme Court, District Courts, and Justices of the Peace," except that the legislature might "also establish courts for municipal purposes only, in incorporated cities and towns," whereas the statute attempted to confer upon the city recorder the authority of a committing magistrate as to violations of the general criminal laws of the state.]

Such being the case, it follows that he can derive no advantage from such law, for an unconstitutional law is no law at all. It is, so far as he is concerned, as if it had never been adopted by the legislature.

The plaintiff then had no legal authority to perform the services for which this action is brought, and without it, his services must be held to be simply gratuitous, for which no compensation can be recovered; for the right to the salary or compensation of an office depends upon the title to such office, and cannot be recovered by one who is simply an officer de facto. (Stratton v. Oulton, 28 Cal. 44.) * * *

Counsel is doubtless correct in the position that the plaintiff is an officer de facto, and that as such his acts are valid. They are valid, however, only as to third persons and the public. This is a rule founded upon considerations of public interest. (Mallett v. Uncle Sam S. M. Co., 1 Nev. 188.) But the public interest does not manner required by the state constitution,—that the de facto officer doctrine could not apply). See Ch. 4 of the treatise cited in the preceding note and consult it generally upon the numerous aspects of the law of de facto officers.

require that the officer acting without authority should reap benefit from his position. The considerations which support and validate the acts of an officer de facto do not go so far as to require the payment of fees to such officer for services so performed. No court has ever gone farther in this direction than to hold that acts performed by public officers are valid as to the public; they have not held that they themselves may in a direct proceeding of this kind recover any benefits from them.

The People v. Morris, (3 Denio, 382) referred to is not a parallel case, for the legislature made provision for the payment of Lynch after the unauthorized services were performed, which, the court held, it had the right to do. Hence, the question of the legality or illegality of Lynch's services could not regularly be raised in that case. His payment was provided for, notwithstanding the services were unauthorized when performed. Such is not the case here. The plaintiff is suing to recover the services rendered under a void law, with no subsequent act of the legislature authorizing his payment for services so rendered; and thus he is left with nothing but an unconstitutional law upon which to rest his claim for the money sought to be recovered.

The judgment, which was in his favor, must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

WHITMAN, J., did not participate in the foregoing decision.[24]

EX PARTE SIEBOLD.

1879. Supreme Court of the United States. 100 U. S. 371.

PETITION for writ of habeas corpus.[25]

MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

At the November Term of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, an indictment against each of the petitioners was found in said court, for offences alleged to have been committed by them respectively at their respective precincts whilst being such judges of election; upon which indictments they were severally tried, convicted, and sentenced by said court to fine and imprisonment. They now apply to this court for a writ of habeas corpus to be relieved from imprisonment. * * * The records of the several indictments and proceedings thereon were annexed to the respective original petitions, and are before us. These indictments were framed partly under section 5515 and partly under section 5522 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and the principal questions raised by the application are, whether those sections, and certain sections of the title of the Revised Statutes relating to the elective franchise, which they are intended to enforce, are within the constitutional power of Congress to enact. If they are not, then it is contended that the circuit court has no jurisdiction of the cases, and that the convictions and sentences of imprisonment of the several petitioners were illegal and void.

[24] And see Gustafson v. McPherson (1912) 88 Kans. 335, 128 Pac. 186, where however the invalid statute which purported to create the office also seems to have contained the sole provision for compensation, and was held totally invalid.

Where there is a de jure office, it has almost but not quite always been held that a de facto incumbent has no right to payment of the emoluments as against the paying authority; it has been held that the de facto officer may retain as against the paying authority any emoluments received, but not against his de jure rival if he has one. In Behan v. Davis (1892) 3 Ariz. 399, 31 Pac. 521 sub-nom. Behan v. Board of Prison Comrs., there was a de jure office, but no de jure rival, the de facto incumbent was held entitled to the emoluments as against the paying authority because the public had had the benefit of his services. See Gordon Stoner (1912) Recovery of Salary by De Facto Officer, 10 Mich. L. Rev. 178-186, 291-299 for discussion and citation pro and con. Is the principal case essentially distinguishable?

[25] SCOPE NOTE: Students should consult the usual sources for the law of habeas corpus in general. The cases here printed are intended to raise only the extent

The jurisdiction of this court to hear the case is the first point to be examined. The question is whether a party imprisoned under a sentence of a United States court, upon conviction of a crime created by and indictable under an unconstitutional act of Congress, may be discharged from imprisonment by this court on habeas corpus, although it has no appellate jurisdiction by writ of error over the judgment. It is objected that the case is one of original and not appellate jurisdiction, and, therefore, not within the juristo which the writ of habeas corpus may be used to test the constitutionality of a statute which defines the offense with which the accused is charged. From this question distinguish the following cases:—

Where a convict sentenced to imprisonment in a reformatory is by resolution of the board of managers, acting under the authority of a "statute," transferred to a prison he may by application for writ of habeas corpus obtain consideration of the validity of the statute. People v. Mallary (1902) 195 Ill. 582, 63 N. E. 508, 88 Am. St. 212.

Writ allowed to determine validity of the statute that purported to establish the court which sentenced the petitioner to imprisonment. Ex parte Settle (1913) 114 Va. 715, 77 S. E. 496. Contra: In re Parrish (1921) 214 Mich. 24, 182 N. W. 46 (and see In re Norton (1902) 64 Kans. 842, 68 Pac. 639, 91 Am. St. 255).

The petitioner was discharged where an invalid statute was the sole authority for the kind of proceeding used. State ex rel. Larkin v. Ryan (1888) 70 Wis. 676; and in Ex parte Bornee (1915) 76 W. Va. 360, 85 S. E. 529, L. R. A. 1915F, 1093, where petitioner was held for second trial after verdict of acquittal, the writ was allowed to determine whether a statute purporting to authorize such second trial violated the immunity from double jeopardy given by the state constitution.

In the cases distinguished in this note the courts say that the statute goes clearly to the jurisdiction of the officers or tribunal, and that habeas corpus lies where there is an unjurisdictional proceeding.

Confinement is always a prerequisite to the writ. "The uncontradicted return to the writ shows that the petitioner has not been in the sheriff's custody since he gave bond for his appearance. Indeed, he does not appear to be under any restraint except a moral restraint, from which he can not be relieved by habeas corpus. * * * Therefore the proceeding is dismissed at the cost of the petitioner." Burch, J. in In re Sills (1911) 84 Kans. 660, 662, 114 Pac. 856.

diction of this court. But we are clearly of opinion that it is appellate in its character. It requires us to revise the act of the circuit court in making the warrants of commitment upon the convictions referred to. This, according to all the decisions, is an exercise of appellate power. Ex parte Burford, 3 Cranch, 448; Ex parte Bollman and Swartwout, 4 id. 100, 101; Ex parte Yerger, 8 Wall. 98.

That this court is authorized to exercise appellate jurisdiction by habeas corpus directly is a position sustained by abundant authority. It has general power to issue the writ, subject to the constitutional limitations of its jurisdiction, which are, that it can only exercise original jurisdiction in cases affecting ambassadors, public ministers and consuls, and cases in which a state is a party; but has appellate jurisdiction in all other cases of federal cognizance, "with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make." Having this general power to issue the writ, the court may issue it in the exercise of original jurisdiction where it has original jurisdiction; and may issue it in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction where it has such jurisdiction, which is in all cases not prohibited by law except those in which it has original jurisdiction only. Ex parte Bollman and Swartwout, supra; Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. 202, 7 id. 568; Ex parte Wells, 18 How. 307, 328; Ableman v. Booth, 21 id. 506; Ex parte Yerger, 8 Wall. 85.

There are other limitations of the jurisdiction, however, arising from the nature and objects of the writ itself, as defined by the common law, from which its name and incidents are derived. It cannot be used as a mere writ of error. Mere error in the judgment or proceedings, under and by virtue of which a party is imprisoned, constitutes no ground for the issue of the writ. Hence, upon a return to a habeas corpus, that the prisoner is detained under a conviction and sentence by a court having jurisdiction of the cause, the general rule is, that he will be instantly remanded. No inquiry will be instituted into the regularity of the proceedings, unless, perhaps, where the court has cognizance by writ of error or appeal to review the judgment. In such a case, if the error be apparent and the imprisonment unjust, the appellate court may, perhaps, in its discretion, give immediate relief on habeas corpus, and thus save the party the delay and expense of a writ of error. Bac. Abr., Hab. Corp., B. 13; Bethel's Case, Salk. 348; 5 Mod. 19. But the general rule is, that a conviction and sentence by a court of competent jurisdiction is lawful cause of imprisonment, and no relief can be given by habeas corpus.

The only ground on which this court, or any court, without some special statute authorizing it, will give relief on habeas corpus to a prisoner under conviction and sentence of another court is the want of jurisdiction in such court over the person or the cause, or some other matter rendering its proceedings void.

This distinction between an erroneous judgment and one that is illegal or void is well illustrated by the two cases of Ex parte Lange (18 Wall. 163) and Ex parte Parks, 93 U. S. 18. In the former case, we held that the judgment was void, and released the petitioner accordingly; in the latter, we held that the judgment, whether erroneous or not, was not void, because the court had jurisdiction of the cause; and we refused to interfere. * * *

We are clearly of opinion that the question raised in the cases before us is proper for consideration on habeas corpus. The validity of the judgments is assailed on the ground that the acts of Congress under which the indictments were found are unconstitutional. If this position is well taken, it affects the foundation of the whole proceedings. An unconstitutional law is void, and is as no law. An offense created by it is not a crime. A conviction under it is not merely erroneous, but is illegal and void, and cannot be a legal cause of imprisonment. It is true, if no writ of error lies, the judgment may be final, in the sense that there may be no means of reversing it. But personal liberty is of so great moment in the eye of the law that the judgment of an inferior court affecting it is not deemed so conclusive but that, as we have seen, the question of the court's authority to try and imprison the party may be reviewed on habeas corpus by a superior court or judge having authority to award the writ. We are satisfied that the present is one of the cases in which this court is authorized to take such jurisdiction. We think so, because, if the laws are unconstitutional and void, the circuit court acquired no jurisdiction of the causes. Its authority to indict and try the petitioners arose solely upon these laws.

We proceed, therefore, to examine the cases on their merits. [Upon extended consideration the court concluded that the questioned acts of Congress were valid and denied the petition.][26]

[26] The Supreme Court has also decided that federal courts have power to determine upon a petition for habeas corpus whether a person then in the custody of state officers, even of state courts, is held in violation of the Constitution, laws or treaties of the United States and, if so found, power to discharge him. Ex parte Royall (1886), 117 U. S. 241, 29 L. ed. 868. But the recent decisions of the Supreme Court strongly emphasize a rule of restraint imposed upon itself and the lower federal courts in the exercise of these powers, and a like restraint in cases like the principal one where the petitioner is in the custody of federal authorities. Thus where the petitioner was in federal custody it was said: "The writ of habeas corpus is not intended to serve the office of a writ of error even after verdict, and, for still stronger reasons, it is not available to a defendant before trial, except in rare and exceptional cases as pointed out in Ex parte Royall, 117 U. S. 241, 29 L. ed. 868. This is an effort to nullify that rule and to depart from the regular course of criminal proceedings by securing from this court, in advance, a decision on an issue of law which the defendant can raise in the district court, with the right, if convicted, to a writ of error on any ruling adverse to his contention. That the orderly course of a trial must be pursued and the usual remedies exhausted, even where the petitioner attacks on habeas corpus the constitutionality of the statute under which he was indicted, was decided in Glasgow v. Moyer, 225 U. S. 420, 56 L. ed. 1147. That and other similar decisions have so definitely

EX PARTE LUCAS.

1901. Supreme Court of Missouri. 160 Mo. 218.

MARSHALL, J.—This is a proceeding by habeas corpus, to test the legality of the imprisonment of the petitioner by Samuel Chiles, marshal of Jackson county, under an information filed in the criminal court of Jackson county by the prosecuting attorney of that county, charging him with practicing the occupation of barber without having procured a certificate of authority so to do from the State Board of Examiners for barbers, contrary to the provisions of chapter 78, Revised Statutes 1899, being "An Act to establish a board of examiners and to regulate the occupation of a barber, in this State, and to prevent the spreading of contagious disease," approved May 5, 1899. Laws 1899, p. 44.

The petitioner has not yet been tried on that information, but pending the trial, he applied to one of the judges of this court, and obtained the writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner asserts that the Act of 1899 is unconstitutional and void, and therefore there is no law or authority warranting his arrest, detention or prosecution, and hence he is entitled to have his liberty restored to him by this great writ of right, which the constitution of this state (sec. 26, art. 2) declares shall never be suspended. The act of 1899 is claimed established the general principle as to leave no room for further discussion. Riggins v. United States, 199 U. S. 547, 50 L. ed. 303." Johnson v. Hoy (1913) 227 U. S. 245, 247, 57 L. ed. 497.

Likewise where petitioner is in state custody, "the rule has been firmly established by repeated decisions of this court that the power conferred on a federal court to issue a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the cause of the detention of any person asserting that he is being held in custody by the authority of a state court in violation of the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States, is not unqualified, but is to be exerted in the exercise of a sound discretion. The due and orderly administration of justice in a state court is not to be thus interfered with save in rare cases where exceptional circumstances of peculiar urgency are shown to exist." United States, ex rel. Kennedy v. Tyler (1925) 269 U. S. 17, 70 L. ed. 138. Three instances of "rare cases" are cited in the case just quoted from, and see Ex parte Royall, supra, for the doctrine of restrained use. But whether exceptional grounds have always been required see Minnesota v. Barber (1890) 136 U. S. 313, 34 L. ed. 455. For the general principles underlying the recent attitude of the Supreme Court see Knewel v. Egan (1925) 268 U. S. 442, 445-446, 69 L. ed. 1036. Compare, In Matter of Gregory (1911) 219 U. S. 210, 55 L. ed. 184, where it seems to have been assumed that in order to determine whether a court had jurisdiction of a statutory offense it was first necessary to determine whether the statute which purported to make the act of the accused an offense was valid.

Where petitioner seeks relief from state custody on the ground that it violates only the state constitution the federal courts have no power. Carfer v. Caldwell (1906) 200 U. S. 293, 50 L. ed. 488; Andrews v. Swartz (1895) 156 U. S. 272, 39 L. ed. 422. On the diversity of citizenship puzzle in this connection see 29 C. J. 130.

State courts have no power to discharge persons held in federal custody. Tarble's Case (1871) 13 Wall. (U. S.) 397, 20 L. ed. 597; Ableman v. Booth (1858) 21 How. (U. S.) 506, 16 L. ed. 169.

to be in conflict with section 53, article 4, section 1, article 6, section 3, article 10, section 4, article 2, section 30, article 2, section 43, article 4, section 5, article 9, section 28, article 4, the whole of article 3 of the constitution of Missouri, and with the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and with Section 2, Article 4, of the federal Constitution.

If the Act offends against so many provisions of the organic law of the United States and of the State of Missouri, the petitioner is suffering a grievous wrong by being arrested, cast into prison, compelled to stand trial and employ counsel to defend him, simply because he has offended against its provisions when the act itself is a greater offender against the law than he is against the act. * * *

In my judgment the right of the petitioner to raise the question by habeas corpus is settled by the cases of Ex parte Smith,[27] 135 Mo. 223, and Ex parte Neet, 157 Mo. 527.

[Burgess, Sherwood and Gant, J. J. concurred with Marshal, J. and this majority of the court passed upon the impugned statute, held it valid, and decided to remand the prisoner for trial. Robinson, Bruce and Valliant, J. J., concurred in remanding the prisoner for reasons given in the following separate opinion by Valliant, J. A long separate opinion by Sherwood, J. in opposition to the opinion of Valliant, J. is omitted.]

Valliant, J.—The conclusion reached by the majority of the court is that the prisoner be remanded for trial, and in that conclusion I concur, but for the following reasons only:

The original purpose of the writ of habeas corpus, as its office was described and defined under the act of 31 Charles II, in which form, substantially, it has come down to us, was to give effect to that provision of the thirty-ninth section of the Great Charter of King John, which declared that no individual in the realm should be deprived of his liberty unless his right to the same had been declared forfeited "by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." Although it was an ancient common law writ, and although the right to personal liberty was clearly enough defined in the Great Charter, yet such was the opposition of the kings to the enforcement of the right and their influence with the crown judges, the remedy was often denied and the right disregarded. Blackstone says: "And yet early in the reign of Charles I, the court of King's bench, relying on some arbitrary precedents (and those perhaps misunderstood) determined that they could not upon an habeas corpus either bail or deliver a prisoner, though committed without any cause assigned, in case he was committed by special command of the King, or by the lords of the privy council. * * * These pitiful evasions gave rise to the statute of 16 Car. 1, c. 10, sec. 8, whereby it is enacted that, if any person be committed by the king himself in person, or by his privy council, or by any of the members thereof, he shall have granted unto him, without any delay upon any pretense whatsoever, a writ of habeas corpus," etc. Then after pointing out the new shifts and devices that were resorted to by the crown judges to render the writ impotent, the great law-writer adds: "But whoever will attentively consider English history, may observe, that the flagrant abuse of any power, by the crown or its ministers, has always been productive of a struggle, which either discovers the exercise of power [to be] contrary to law, or (if legal) restrains it for the future. This was the case in the present instance (the Jenks case). The oppression of an obscure individual gave birth to the famous habeas corpus act, 31 Car. 2, c. 2," etc. Blackstone's Com., bk. 3, *pp. 134-5.

[27] The reason assigned in the cited case is: "And if it be true, as must be true, that an unconstitutional law is no law, then its constitutionality is open to attack at any stage of the proceedings and even after conviction and judgment; and this upon the ground that no crime is shown and therefore the trial court had no jurisdiction; because its criminal jurisdiction extends only to such matters as the law declares to be criminal, and if there is no law making such declaration, or, what is tantamount thereto, if that law is unconstitutional, then the court which tries a party for such an assumed offense, transcends its jurisdiction and he is consequently entitled to his discharge, just the same as if the nonjurisdiction of such court should, in any other manner, be made apparent." Sherwood, J., p. 229.

Reference to the origin and purpose of this writ is here made to recall to our minds that its office was to afford a man who was imprisoned otherwise than on the judgment of a court, a hearing before a competent court or judge, to the end that the legality of his commitment might be inquired into, and if unlawful that he might be discharged from custody even though the king himself had ordered his imprisonment. Although the conditions that surround us to-day have materially changed from those that our ancestors contended with at that period of English history, yet in essential principle there is no difference in the office of the writ of habeas corpus now from what it was then. We have now no kings or privy councils, but we have men in executive authority who sometimes do imprison people without legal right, and who sometimes from overzeal and sometimes from bad motives are induced to use their power to the oppression of the citizen and would confine him in silence and without judicial inquiry, if they were not subject to the writ of habeas corpus. Therefore the writ is not only preserved in our system of jurisprudence, but ranks perhaps as the most important in influence, as it certainly is the most famous in history, of all writs known to the English common law.

But where a man is taken into custody under a warrant from a court competent to try him for the offense charged and competent to decide whether or not the act charged is an offense against the law and the court is proceeding in due course with the case, or where it has proceeded to judgment and has adjudged the accused guilty and pronounced the sentence of the law upon him, it can not be said in the language of Magna Charta that he is deprived of his liberty without having been adjudged to have forfeited it "by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land," and therefore the writ of habeas corpus has no place in his case.

If the prisoner is held in custody under process awaiting trial or under commitment awaiting the action of the grand jury, and bail has been refused him, the habeas corpus act [of Missouri] expressly provides that he may be brought before a court or judge under this writ and admitted to bail to await his trial, or the action of the grand jury, if it is a bailable case. R. S. 1899, secs. 3568-3581.

But except for the purpose of admitting to bail, the writ of habeas corpus was not designed and should not be issued to interfere with the due procedure in a court of competent jurisdiction. This is the doctrine announced by this court in its earlier decisions and is the only doctrine consistent with the original purpose of the writ and with the spirit of the habeas corpus act in our statutes and under our state judiciary system, although reason exists for a different view under the federal judiciary system. * * *

Under the judiciary system of this state, any one tried and condemned as for a crime may have the proceedings in his trial reviewed on appeal or writ of error, in which he may have relief not only against the errors and irregularities, if any, of the trial court, but if he raises the question of the constitutionality of the statute under which he was convicted he may have the judgment of the highest court in the state on that question. And if the point he desires reviewed goes to the jurisdiction of the trial court, the record may be brought here on certiorari and quashed. If therefore under our system any one is left to pine in prison because of error or irregularity in his trial, or invalidity of the law under which he was convicted, or lack of jurisdiction in the court that condemned him, it is only because he has omitted to avail himself of one of the several remedies the law affords him. There is absolutely no occasion in such case to invoke the remedy by habeas corpus, and it would be a misuse of that writ to so extend it. * * *

Although it is said that an unconstitutional law is no law at all, and therefore a conviction under such a law is void, yet whilst that is true in a certain sense, it is inaccurate if by this it is intended to say that the judgment is coram non judice. If the court had authority to pronounce the judgment provided the law was constitutional, it had jurisdiction to decide whether or not it was constitutional, and if it decided erroneously the error did not go to the jurisdiction of the court.[28] In a decision of the United States

Supreme Court, cited in State ex rel. v. Dobson, supra, [135 Mo. 1] Chief Justice Marshall said: "The question whether an offense was or was not committed, that is, whether the indictment did or did not show that an offense had been committed, was a question which that court was competent to decide. If its judgment was erroneous * * * still it is a judgment, and until reversed can not be disregarded." Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. 193, 1. c. 203, 206.

It is in failing to observe the distinction there indicated that has misled some courts in this country to giving sanction to the use if [of] this writ in setting at naught the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction or interfering with its due process to discharge a prisoner upon the ground that the legislative act under which the prisoner was condemned or is being held for trial is, in the opinion of the magistrate granting the writ, unconstitutional.

A text-writer of ability, formerly Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, commenting on this point says: "Those who have pretended to treat the subject, as some have, by merely collecting such general expressions, have tended to confuse rather than demonstrate and make plain. They make no distinction between errors of law and errors which are jurisdictional. * * * It is evident that these distinctions must be observed, or else an intelligent treatment of the subject is not made." 2 Bailey on Jurisdiction, note to sec. 409. * * *

The learned judge (Sherwood, J.) who wrote the opinion in Ex parte Smith, referred to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, and to the text of Church on Habeas Corpus, wherein are collected references to decisions in other states following the Supreme Court of the United States in the Siebold case. But a reading of the opinion in that case shows that although it is founded in reason as applicable to

v. Biddle (1925) 5 Fed. (2d) 608, 610.

"But after judgment and commitment in a criminal action by an inferior court having jurisdiction of the offense charged, we think that habeas corpus is not the proper mode of procedure to bring the cause into this court [state court of last resort] for review upon alleged errors of law * * *. If the validity of a statute is brought in question in an inferior court on the trial of a cause, that question must finally be determined in the same mode as other legal questions arising on the trial of causes in such court—that is, by proceedings in error or appeal" * * *. Ex parte Fisher (1877) 6 Nebr. 309-311.

"But the argument is, that the ordinance was passed without authority of law, and was null and void. Whether it was or not, was a legitimate subject of inquiry by the [police] magistrate in the same manner as any other question which might be presented for his adjudication. And being determined by him, adverse to the position of the prisoner, his remedy was by appeal, or writ of error, and not by habeas corpus. It is not a case where a court has acted without having jurisdiction. On the contrary, the most that can be claimed is, that the magistrate erred in deciding that the ordinance was in force [valid], and that the city had the power and authority to provide for the punishment of the offense. * * * The petitioner has a perfect, well-defined, and complete remedy, in the regular and usual method of appeal." Platt v. Harrison (1858) 6 Iowa 79, 81, 71 Am. Dec. 389.

the federal judiciary, the doctrine announced is in discord with our state judiciary system. The Supreme Court of the United States was there defining its own authority, not under the habeas corpus, as an original writ, but as using the writ in its capacity of an appellate and supervisory court. Because in the case before it there was no appeal from and no writ of error to the U. S. Circuit Court by which the judgment under which the prisoner had been convicted could be reviewed, and no other method prescribed by law by which the validity of the act of Congress under which the conviction was had could be tested in the Supreme Court, that court said it would, under its appellate jurisdiction, review the judgment to that extent on habeas corpus. * * *

EX PARTE LOCKHART.

1923. Criminal Court of Appeals of Oklahoma. 25 Okla. Cr. 429.

Doyle, J. This is a petition for writ of habeas corpus for the discharge of James Lockhart, from the penitentiary at McAlester, where it is alleged that he is unlawfully and illegally restrained of his liberty by the warden, J. H. Townsend; that the cause of said restraint is a commitment issued by the district court of Canadian county, James I. Phelps, judge, on a charge of setting up a distillery for the purpose of manufacturing corn liquor, which judgment was rendered upon a plea of guilty, entered by defendant on the 2d day of June, 1923, wherein he was sentenced to be confined in the penitentiary at McAlester for the term of one year, and that he pay the costs; and alleging that said imprisonment is illegal because the act approved February 5, 1923, c. 1, Sess. Laws 1923, making it a felony to set up a distillery for the purpose of manufacturing distilled spirits was held unconstitutional and void, as determined by the decision of this court [Sept. 22, 1923] in the case of In re D. E. Smith, 218 Pac. 708, not yet [officially] reported.

The Attorney General concedes that the writ should issue, and that the petitioner is entitled to be discharged.

In the case of Ex parte Smith, supra, the statute on which this prosecution is based was held unconstitutional[29] and void.

It follows that petitioner is unlawfully imprisoned and restrained of his liberty by the respondent, and that he is entitled to be discharged from the imprisonment of which he complains. He is, therefore, by the judgment of this court, discharged therefrom.

NOTE

Where a person is held by state officers for trial in a state court on a charge of violating a state statute and applies to a state court or state judge for a writ of habeas corpus claiming as the ground for its issuance that the statute conflicts with the state or the national Constitution, it is held in many states that the writ should issue and the questioned validity be determined and the accused discharged without trial if the statute is found to be unconstitutional. [30] Compare, In re Jarvis (1903) 66 Kans. 329, 71 Pac. 576 (expressly confining the decision to instances where the time for appeal had lapsed but not requiring any special excuse for neglect to appeal) and Manning v. Biddle (1926) 14 Fed. (2d) 518 (a person undergoing prison sentence was discharged upon habeas corpus because there was no other remedy, although the defect was that the trial court had construed the indictment to charge an offense where in the judgment of the court of appeals it clearly did not, and the latter admitted that the error was such as the accused might have had corrected upon writ of error.)

Suppose a corporation has been convicted and sentenced to pay a fine for violation of a state statute which the state court of last resort has several times held valid and the corporation takes no appeal. Subsequently but before the fine is paid the Supreme Court of the United States, in other litigation holds the statute invalid. May the corporation obtain an injunction to restrain collection of the fine? See International Harvester Co. v. Commonwealth (1916) 170 Ky. 41, 46, 185 S. W. 102. If the fine has been paid can the corporation recover it?

A statute purported to exempt a kind of property from taxation. An assessor attempted to assess T's property of that kind for the year 1919 and on appeal to a court T got judgment that the property was exempt. From this judgment there was no appeal. In 1921 in litigation between others the state court of last resort held the statute invalid because in conflict with the state constitution. In assessing taxes for the next year the assessor undertook to assess T's property. He appealed to a court setting up that the former judgment he had obtained against the assessor was res judicata. Should the court so hold? Or should the court hold the former judgment void? Could the state collect back taxes for the year 1919? See the analogous case of Security Savings Bank v. Connell (1924) 198 Iowa 564, 200 N. W. 8.

In the last cited Kansas case the petition was filed after the trial court had denied a motion to quash and had ruled that the challenged statute was valid. The Supreme Court said:— "Under these circumstances the proceeding here is virtually an appeal from an order denying a motion to quash pending the trial. The writ of habeas corpus is not designed to perform any such function. The petitioner should first exhaust his ordinary remedies. Although the [trial] court has held the statute to be constitutional on a motion to quash, the ruling is not final, and it will not be assumed that ultimately an unwarranted judgment will be pronounced."

A person imprisoned after judgment of conviction in a state tribunal on a charge of violating a state statute is not entitled to writ of habeas corpus from a state court or judge to determine the constitutionality of the statute. Ex parte Bizzell (1895) 112 Ala. 210, 21 So. 371; People ex rel. Miller v. District Court (1905) 33 Colo. 328, 80 Pac. 888; People ex rel. Atty-Gen. v. District Court (1899) 26 Colo. 380, 58 Pac. 591 (even to determine the constitutionality of a statute which was the source of jurisdiction which the trial court purported to exercise); Blackstone v. Nelson (1921) 151 Ga. 706, 108 S. E. 114 (especially where the issue was raised at trial and ruled against and no exception taken); People v. Jonas (1898) 173 Ill. 316, 50 N. E. 1051; Platt v. Harrison (1858) 6 Iowa 79, 71 Am. Dec. 389; Koepke v. Hill (1901) 157 Ind. 172, 60 N. E. 1039, 87 Am. St. 161; In re Underwood (1875) 30 Mich. 502; In re Maguire (1897) 114 Mich. 80, 72 N. W. 15; In re Allen (1915) 91 Ohio St. 315, 110 N. E. 535; Ex parte Fisher (1877) 6 Nebr. 309; Ex parte Hammar (1925) 134 Wash. 51, 234 Pac. 1018. Some courts base this result upon specific state statutory restriction of the writ. State v. Dunn (1912) 159 N. Car. 470, 74 S. E. 1014. But in Servonitz v. State (1907) 133 Wis. 231, 233, 113 N. W. 277, 126 Am. St. 955, holding that the court should issue the writ in the case here supposed, it is said that if the Wisconsin habeas corpus act properly construed purported to prevent, that act would be invalid as an attempt to deprive the court of its "common-law power."

But by the following decisions he is allowed after judgment to raise that issue by habeas corpus: Harper v. Galloway (1909) 58 Fla. 255, 51 So. 226, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 794, 19 Ann. Cas. 235; Pounds v. Darling (1918) 75 Fla. 125, 77 So. 666; (3) Liberis v. Harper (1925) 89 Fla. 477, 104 So. 853; Herrick v. Smith (1854) 1 Gray (Mass.) 1, 49; Commonwealth v. Huntley (1892) 156 Mass. 236, 30 N. E. 1127, 15 L. R. A. 839 (Supreme Court has power but "this mode of raising questions in criminal cases is open to some objection"); Ex parte Karnstrom (1923) 297 Mo. 384, 249 S. W. 595; Taft v. Shaw (1920) 284 Mo. 531, 225 S. W. 457 ("This rule has been finally settled in this state. * * * If a law or ordinance is invalid the trial court is without jurisdiction for the prosecution of the alleged violation of law. There can be no violation of something which does not exist, and an unconstitutional law or ordinance is as if it had never existed"); People ex rel. Nechameus v. Warden of City Prison (1895) 144 N. Y. 529, 39 N. E. 686 (allowed without comment); In re Unger (1908) 22 Okla. 755; Wangsness v. McAlpine (1924) 47 S. Dak. 472, 199 N. W. 478.

Is any light shed on this subject by such expressions as "an unconstitutional statute is not law", "void judgment" or "want of jurisdiction"? Do these expressions even rationalize the result? See the struggle for light in the editorial note in 39 L. R. A. 449. Is the question whether the writ should issue from a higher court before trial merely a question of the expediency and "justice" to the accused of a segregation and more immediate final decision of the issue of validity? And whether the writ should be allowed after judgment of conviction, should that turn upon the relative merits of review by appeal or writ of error as compared with review by writ of habeas corpus? In such case does saying that the writ is issued in exercise of original jurisdiction make it so? Is it in essence a mode of appeal? Further there is the question, where the issue has not been raised at the trial or the time for review by appeal or writ of error has elapsed, whether such neglects should bar relief?

"If the courts should say that constitutional rights are too important to be cut off by wrong decisions, and that decisions which deny such rights will therefore be held void, even on collateral attack, because of the serious consequences involved, it would merely express the actual attitude of the courts; but they do not say this." Editorial note 39 L. R. A. 449, 454.

"The effect of granting writs in cases of this kind would be to allow defendants in all convictions under ordinances or statutes the validity of which might be questioned to come directly to this court [state supreme court] by a proceeding in habeas corpus instead of appealing or prosecuting writs of error, as the law [habeas corpus statute of Illinois] contemplates." People v. Jonas (1898) 173 Ill. 316, 320, 50 N. E. 1051.

"Why should the liberty of a citizen be taken from him and he be put to the expense and ignominy of a criminal prosecution upon a complaint having no warrant of law to support it? A void law is no law and a prosecution under it is a prosecution without the authority of law." Chipman, P. J., in Ex parte Zany (1912) 20 Cal. App. 360, 371, 129 Pac. 295.

"To hold that one who is being deprived of his liberty for a long term of years by virtue of a sentence beyond the jurisdiction of the court which rendered it has deprived himself of his right to relief by writ of habeas corpus because through ignorance, poverty, or neglect he failed to challenge that judgment by writ of error until it was too late is to rob the writ of the very purpose of its existence, the purpose to afford speedy and inexpensive relief from unlawful imprisonment to those otherwise remediless. * * * And here is the true distinction between the cases in which the writ of habeas corpus may and those in which it may not issue. If the judgment or sentence challenged is without the jurisdiction of the court and void, the writ may issue. If it is erroneous, but within the jurisdiction of the court which rendered it, the writ may not issue." Sanborn, Cir. J. in Stevens v. McClaughry (1913) 207 Fed. 18, 28-29, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 390 (holding, where the trial court had given a sentence of 5 years on one count for stealing some articles and a further 5 years on another count for stealing other articles, all articles being stolen in one continuous theft, that the sentence as to the second period of 5 years was beyond the jurisdiction since in its (Court of Appeals) understanding only a single sentence could be inflicted in such case and that the prisoner having served the first 5 years should be discharged). Quaere, was this an error as to jurisdiction?

For various uses and some abuses of the writ, see Charles B. Elder, What shall be done with the Writ of Habeas Corpus? (1912) 7 Ill. Law Rev. 1-14.

WELLER v. PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

1925. Supreme Court of the United States. 268 U. S. 319.

Error to a judgment of the Court of Special Sessions of the City of New York adjudging the plaintiff in error guilty of reselling theater tickets without a license, entered after successive affirmances by the Supreme Court, Appellate Division, and the Court of Appeals.

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the Court.

Chapter 590, New York Laws 1922, added eight sections, 167-174, to the General Business Law of the State. * * * Section 168 directs: "No person, firm or corporation shall resell or engage in the business of reselling any tickets of admission or any other evidence of the right of entry to a theatre, place of amusement or entertainment, or other places where public exhibitions, games, contests or performances are held without having first procured a license therefor from the comptroller." And § 173 declares every violation of the inhibition shall be a misdemeanor.

By an information in the Court of Special Sessions, New York City, the District Attorney accused plaintiff in error of engaging in the business of reselling theatre tickets without the license required by law. The evidence showed he was engaged in that business, and it was conceded he had never taken out a license or complied with Chapter 590. His defense rested upon the claim that the statute is repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment. The trial court adjudged him guilty and imposed a fine of twenty-five dollars. This was affirmed by the Appellate Division and by the Court of Appeals. 207 App. Div. 337; 237 N. Y. 316. In an extended opinion the latter court upheld the challenged enactment, but said nothing of the possibility of sustaining the license provisions if those relating to resale prices were invalid.

Counsel for plaintiff in error now insists that the two provisions are inseparable; that those which undertake to establish resale prices are clearly invalid; and, consequently, the whole Act must fall. On the contrary, counsel for the people maintain that the power of the State to require such licenses is clear and that we need not determine the validity of the price restrictions.

It is not and, we think, it cannot seriously be urged that the State lacked power to require licenses of those engaging in the business of reselling theatre tickets. The conviction and sentence were for failure to observe that requirement. In the absence of an authoritative announcement of another view by some court of the state we shall hold this provision severable and valid. Brazee v. Michigan, 241 U. S. 340. The statute itself declares (§ 174): "In case it be judicially determined that any section of this article is unconstitutional or otherwise invalid, such determination shall not affect the validity or effect of the remaining provisions of the article." If § 172, which restricts resale prices were eliminated, a workable plan would still remain. See Dorchy v. Kansas, 264 U. S. 286.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.[31]

"It is elementary that the same statute may be in part constitutional and in part unconstitutional, and if the parts are wholly independent of each other, that which is constitutional may stand while that which is unconstitutional will be rejected. And in the case before us there is no question as to the validity of this act, except sections twenty-seven to thirty-seven, inclusive, which relate to the subject which has been under discussion; and as to them we think the rule laid down by Chief Justice Shaw in Warren v. Charlestown, 2 Gray, 84, is applicable, that if the different parts 'are so mutually connected with and dependent on each other, as conditions, considerations or compensations for each other, as to warrant a belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and that, if all could not be carried into effect, the legislature would not pass the residue independently, and some parts are unconstitutional, all the provisions which are thus dependent, conditional or connected, must fall with them.' Or, as the point is put by Mr. Justice Matthews in Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270, 304: 'It is undoubtedly true that there may be cases where one part of a statute may be enforced as constitutional, and another be declared inoperative and void, because unconstitutional; but these are cases where the parts are so distinctly separable that each can stand alone, and where the court is able to see and to declare, that the intention of the legislature was that the part pronounced valid should be enforceable, even though the other part should fail. To hold otherwise would be to substitute, for the law intended by the legislature, one they may never have been willing by itself to enact.'" Fuller, C. J., in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. (1895) 158 U. S. 601, 635-636, 39 L. ed. 1108.

"In this state, we have gone far in subdividing statutes, and sustaining them so far as valid (Dollar Co. v. Canadian C. & F. Co., 220 N. Y. 270, 278, and cases there cited; People v. Beakes Dairy Co., 222 N. Y. 416, 432; People ex rel. Penn Gas Co. v. Saxe, 229 N. Y. 446). The tendency is, I think, a wholesome one. Severance does not depend upon the separation of the good from the bad by paragraphs or sentences in the text of the enactment (Loeb v. Columbia Township Trustees, 179 U. S. 472). The principle of division is not a principle of form. It is a principle of function. The question is in every case whether the legislature, if partial invalidity has been foreseen, would have wished the statute to be enforced with the invalid part exscinded, or rejected altogether. The answer must be reached pragmatically, by the exercise of good sense and sound judgment, by considering how the statutory rule will function if the knife is laid to the branch instead of at the roots." Cardozo, J., in People ex rel. Alpha Portland Cement Co. v. Knapp (1920) 230 N. Y. 48, 60, 129 N. E. 202.

A statute prohibiting "any person, corporation or association of persons" to do a stated act may be held valid in its application to corporations although it is invalid as to natural persons. Berea College v. Kentucky (1908) 211 U. S. 45, 53 L. ed. 81. A national statute which states that it applies both to acts done in states and the same kind of acts done in territories was held valid as to the latter though invalid as to the former. El Paso & N. E. R. Co. v. Gutierrez (1909) 215 U. S. 87, 54 L. ed. 106. Compare Butts v. Merchants & Miners Transp. Co. (1913) 230 U. S. 126, 57 L. ed. 1422.

Whether an express declaration in a statute that its valid parts are intended to stand separately notwithstanding some are found invalid changes the result see the notes in (1927) 40 Harv. L. Rev. 626-630, (1927) 25 Mich. L. Rev. 523-527.

The Supreme Court of the United States in considering a section of a Kansas statute, a large part of which it had in a former decision held invalid said:—"Whether § 19 is so interwoven with the system held invalid that the section cannot stand alone, is a question of interpretation and of legislative intent. Compare Butts v. Merchants Transportation Co., 230 U. S. 126. Section 28 of the act, [a separability provision] (which resembles that discussed in Hill v. Wallace, 259 U. S. 44, 70, 71) provides a rule of construction which may sometimes aid in determining that intent. But it is an aid merely; not an inexorable command.

"The task of determining the intention of the state legislature in this respect, like the usual function of interpreting a state statute, rests primarily upon the state court. Its decision as to the severability of a provision is conclusive upon this court. Gatewood v. North Carolina, 203 U. S. 531, 543; Guinn v. United States, 238 U. S. 347, 366; Schneider Granite Co. v. Gast Realty Co., 245 U. S. 288, 290. In cases coming from the lower federal courts, such questions of severability, if there is no controlling state decision, must be determined by this court. Compare Myers v. Anderson, 238 U. S. 368, 381; Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Garrett, 231 U. S. 298, 311. In cases coming from the state courts, this court, in the absence of a controlling state decision, may, in passing upon the claim under the federal law, decide, also, the question of severability. But it is not obliged to do so. The situation may be such as to make it appropriate to leave the determination of the question to the state court. We think that course should be followed in this case. * * * In order that the state court may pass upon this question, its judgment in this case * * * should be vacated." Brandeis, J., Dorchy v. Kansas (1924) 264 U. S. 286, 290-291, 68 L. ed. 686.

CHAPTER II.

THE NATIONAL STATE AND ITS GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATION.

25

Section 1.—General Concepts.

CHISHOLM, EXECUTOR v. GEORGIA.

1793. Supreme Court of the United States. 2 Dall. 419.

[This was an original action brought in the Supreme Court against the State of Georgia by "Alexander Chisholm, a ~~citizen of~~ the State of South Carolina, and executor of Robert Farquar, deceased, of the same State."][1]

"Wilson, Justice. This is a case of uncommon magnitude. One of the parties to it is a STATE; certainly respectable, claiming to be sovereign. The question to be determined is, whether ~~this State~~, so respectable, and whose claim soars so high, is amenable to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States? This question, important in itself, will depend on others, more important still; and, may, perhaps, be ultimately resolved into one, no less radical than this—"do the people of the United States form a NATION?" * * *

To the Constitution of the United States the term SOVEREIGN, is totally unknown. There is but one place where it could have been used with propriety. But, even in that place it would not, perhaps, have comported with the delicacy of those, who ordained and established that Constitution. They might have announced themselves "SOVEREIGN" people of the United States: But serenely conscious of the fact, they avoided the ostentatious declaration. * * *

By a State I mean, a complete body of free persons united together for their common benefit, to enjoy peaceably what is their own, and to do justice to others. It is an artificial person. It has its affairs and its interests: It has its rules: It has its rights: And it has its obligations. It may acquire property distinct from that of its members: It may incur debts to be discharged out of the public stock, not out of the private fortunes of individuals. It may be bound by contracts; and for damages arising from the breach of those contracts. In all our contemplations, however, concerning this feigned and artificial person, we should never forget, that, in truth and nature, those, who think and speak, and act, are men. * * *

[1] No facts are reported by Dallas. The above is taken from a pamphlet report of the case, containing the opinions in full in accord with the report in Dallas, which was printed in Boston in 1793 at the order of the senate of the State of Massachusetts, and is certified as true by Samuel Bayard, Clerk of the United States Supreme Court under date of April 12, 1793. Additional supposed facts are given from contemporary newspaper reports in 1 Warren, Supreme Court in United States History (1922) 93, and foot-note.

As a Judge of this Court, I know, and can decide upon the knowledge, that the citizens of Georgia, when they acted upon the large scale of the Union, as a part of the "People of the United States," did not surrender the Supreme or sovereign Power to that State; but, as to the purposes of the Union, retained it to themselves. As to the purposes of the Union, therefore, Georgia is NOT a sovereign State. If the judicial decision of this case forms one of those purposes; the allegation, that Georgia is a sovereign State, is unsupported by the fact. * * *

With the strictest propriety, therefore, classical and political, our national scene opens with the most magnificent object, which the nation could present. "The PEOPLE of the United States" are the first personages introduced. Who were those people? They were the citizens of thirteen States, each of which had a separate Constitution and Government, and all of which were connected together by articles of confederation. To the purposes of public strength and felicity, that confederacy was totally inadequate. A requisition on the several States terminated its Legislative authority: Executive or Judicial authority it had none. In order, therefore, to form a more perfect union, to establish justice, to ensure domestic tranquility, to provide for common defence, and to secure the blessings of liberty, those people, among whom were the people of Georgia, ordained and established the present Constitution. By that Constitution Legislative power is vested, Executive power is vested, Judicial power is vested.

The question now opens fairly to our view, could the people of those States, among whom were those of Georgia, bind those States, and Georgia among the others, by the Legislative, Executive and Judicial power so vested? If the principles, on which I have founded myself are just and true; this question must unavoidably receive an affirmative answer. If those States were the work of those people; those people, and, that I may apply the case closely, the people of Georgia, in particular, could alter, as they pleased, their former work: To any given degree, they could diminish as well as enlarge it. Any or all of the former State-powers they could extinguish or transfer. The inference, which necessarily results, is, that the Constitution ordained and established by those people; and, still closely to apply the case, in particular by the people of Georgia, could vest jurisdiction or judicial power over those States and over the State of Georgia in particular.

The next question under this head, is—Has the Constitution done so? Did those people mean to exercise this, their undoubted power? These questions may be resolved, either by fair and conclusive deductions, or by direct and explicit declarations. In order, ultimately, to discover, whether the people of the United States intended to bind those States by the Judicial power vested by the national Constitution, a previous enquiry will naturally be: Did those people intend to bind those states by the Legislative power vested by that Constitution? The articles of confederation, it is well known, did not operate upon individual citizens; but operated only upon states. This defect was remedied by the national Constitution, which, as all allow, has an operation on individual citizens. But if an opinion, which some seem to entertain, be just: the defect remedied, on one side, was balanced by a defect introduced on the other: For they seem to think, that the present Constitution operates only on individual citizens, and not on States. This opinion, however, appears to be altogether unfounded. * * *

Note

Did the people of the United States intend to bind the several States by the Executive power of the national Government? The affirmative answer to the former question directs, unavoidably, an affirmative answer to this. * * * Nothing could be more natural than to intend that this Legislative power should be enforced by powers Executive and Judicial. * * *

Whoever considers, in a combined and comprehensive view, the general texture of the Constitution, will be satisfied, that the people of the United States intended to form themselves into a nation for national purposes. They instituted, for such purposes, a national Government, complete in all its parts, with powers Legislative, Executive and Judiciary; and, in all those powers, extending over the whole nation. Is it congruous, that, with regard to such purposes, any man or body of men, any person natural or artificial, should be permitted to claim successfully an entire exemption from the jurisdiction of the national Government? Would not such claims, crowned with success, be repugnant to our very existence as a nation? When so many trains of deduction, coming from different quarters, converge and unite, at last, in the same point; we may safely conclude, as the legitimate result of this Constitution, that the State of Georgia is amenable to the jurisdiction of this Court.

But, in my opinion, this doctrine rests not upon the legitimate result of fair and conclusive deduction from the Constitution: It is confirmed, beyond all doubt, by the direct and explicit declaration of the Constitution itself. "The judicial power of the United States shall extend, to controversies between two States." Two States are supposed to have a controversy between them: This controversy is supposed to be brought before those vested with the judicial power of the United States: Can the most consummate degree of professional ingenuity devise a mode by which this "controversy between two States" can be brought before a Court of law; and yet neither of those States be a Defendant? "The judicial power of the United States shall extend to controversies, between a state and citizens of another State." * * * Could this strict and appropriated [sic] language, describe, with more precise accuracy, the cause now depending before the tribunal? * * *

JAY, CHIEF JUSTICE. The question we are now to decide has been accurately stated, viz. Is a State suable by individual citizens of another State?

It is said, that Georgia refuses to appear and answer to the Plaintiff in this action, because she is a sovereign State, and therefore not liable to such actions. In order to ascertain the merits of this objection, let us enquire, 1st. In what sense Georgia is a sovereign State. 2d. Whether suability is incompatible with such sovereignty. 3d. Whether the Constitution (to which Georgia is a party) authorises such an action against her.

1st. * * * The Revolution, or rather the Declaration of Independence, found the people already united for general purposes, and at the same time providing for their more domestic concerns by State conventions, and other temporary arrangements. From the crown of Great Britain, the sovereignty of their country passed to the people of it; * * * on whatever principles this opinion rested, it did not give way to the other, and thirteen sovereignties were considered as emerged from the principles of the Revolution, combined with local convenience and considerations; the people nevertheless continued to consider themselves, in a national point of view, as one people; and they continued without interruption to manage their national concerns accordingly; afterwards, in the hurry of the war, and in the warmth of mutual confidence, they made a confederation of the States, the basis of a general Government. Experience disappointed the expectations they had formed from it; and then the people, in their collective and national capacity, established the present Constitution. It is remarkable that in establishing it, the people exercised their own rights, and their own proper sovereignty, and conscious of the plentitude of it, they declared with becoming dignity, "We the people of the United States," "do ordain and establish this Constitution." Here we see the people acting as sovereigns of the whole country; and in the language of sovereignty, establishing a Constitution by which it was their will, that the State Governments should be bound, and to which the State Constitutions should be made to conform. Every State Constitution is a compact made by and between the citizens of a State to govern themselves in a certain manner; and the Constitution of the United States is likewise a compact made by the people of the United States to govern themselves as to general objects, in a certain manner. By this great compact however, many prerogatives were transferred to the national Government, such as those of making war and peace, contracting alliances, coining money, &c. &c.

If then it be true, that the sovereignty of the nation is in the people of the nation, and the residuary sovereignty of each State, in the people of each State, it may be useful to compare these sovereignties, with those in Europe, that we may thence be enabled to judge, whether all the prerogatives which are allowed to the latter, are so essential to the former. * * *

2d. The second object of enquiry now presents itself, viz. whether suability is compatible with State sovereignty. * * * It is agreed, that one free citizen may sue another; the obvious dictates of justice, and the purposes of society demanding it. It is agreed, that one free citizen may sue any number on whom process can be conveniently executed; nay, in certain cases one citizen may sue forty thousand; for where a corporation is sued, all the members of it are actually sued, though not personally, sued. In this city [Philadelphia] there are forty odd thousand free citizens, all of whom may be collectively sued by any individual citizen. In the State of Delaware, there are fifty odd thousand free citizens, and what reason can be assigned why a free citizen who has demands against them should not prosecute them? Can the difference between forty odd thousand, and fifty odd thousand make any distinction as to right? * * *

Prior to the date of the Constitution, the people had not any national tribunal to which they could resort for justice; the distribution of justice was then confined to State judicatories, in whose institution and organization the people of the other States had no participation, and over whom they had not the least controul. There was then no general Court of appellate jurisdiction, by whom the errors of State Courts, affecting either the nation at large or the citizens of any other State, could be revised and corrected. * * *

Let us now turn to the Constitution. The people therein declare, that their design in establishing it, comprehended six objects. 1st. To form a more perfect union. 2d. To establish justice. * * *

It may be asked, what is the precise sense and latitude in which the words "to establish justice," as here used, are to be understood? The answer to this question will result from the provisions made in the Constitution on this head. They are specified in the 2d. section of the 3d. article, where is ordained, that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to ten descriptions of cases, * * *. 7th. To controversies between two or more States; because domestic tranquility requires, that the contentions of States should be peaceably terminated by a common judicatory; and, because, in a free country justice ought not to depend on the will of either of the litigants. 8th. To controversies between a State and citizens of another State; because in case a State (that is all the citizens of it) has demands against some citizens of another State, it is better that she should prosecute their demands in a national Court, than in a Court of the State to which those citizens belong; the danger of irritation and criminations arising from apprehensions and suspicions of partiality, being thereby obviated. Because, in cases where some citizens of one State have demands against all the citizens of another State, the cause of liberty and the rights of men forbid, that the latter should be the sole Judges of the justice due to the latter; and true Republican Government requires that free and equal citizens should have free, fair, and equal justice.

[Justices BLAIR and CUSHING delivered concurring opinions. Justice IREDELL dissented. He thought the court should not take jurisdiction because of what he considered a lack of legislation prescribing procedure in such a case, that the constitutional question was not before the court but that almost obiter he might say that the rule of the "old law" that a "sovereign" cannot be sued without its consent should be considered as abrogated by "nothing but express words, or an insurmountable implication" neither of which he thought were found in the Constitution. It seems that Justice JOHNSON did not sit.]

The following order was made:—BY THE COURT. It is ordered, that the Plaintiff in this cause do file his declaration on or before the first day of March next.

Ordered, that certified copies of the said declaration be served on the Governor and Attorney General of the State of Georgia, on or before the first day of June next.

Ordered, that unless the said State shall either in due form appear, or shew cause to the contrary in this Court, by the first day of next Term, judgment by default shall be entered against the said State.[2]

[2] The decision was widely commented upon in the press of the day with some strong approbation but more marked disapprobation. "While this opposition to the court's decision was to some extent based on divergencies of political theories as to state sovereignty, the real source of the attack on the Chisholm Case was the very concrete fear of the 'numerous prosecutions that will immediately issue from the various claims of refugees, Tories, etc., that will introduce such a series of litigation as will throw every state in the Union into the greatest confusion.' In the crucial condition of the finances of most of the states at that time, only disaster was to be expected if suits could be successfully maintained by holders of state issues of paper and other credits, or by Loyalist refugees to recover property confiscated or sequestered by the States; and that this was no theoretical danger was shown by the immediate institution of such suits against the states in [of?] South Carolina, Georgia, Virginia and

"Sovereignty itself is, of course, not subject to law, for it is the author and source of law; but in our system, while sovereign powers are delegated to the agencies of government, sovereignty itself remains with the people, by whom and for whom all government exists and acts." Matthews, J., in Yick Wo v. Hopkins (1886) 118 U. S. 356, 370, 30 L. ed. 220.

"While undoubtedly the United States as a nation has all the powers which inhere in any nation, Congress is not authorized in all things to act for the nation, and too little effect has been given to the Tenth Article of the amendments to the Constitution, that 'the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people.' The powers the people have given to the general government are named in the Constitution, and all not there named, either expressly or by implication, are reserved to the people and can be exercised only by them, or upon further grant from them." Brewer, J., concurring in United States ex rel. Turner v. Williams (1904) 194 U. S. 279, 295-296, 48 L. ed. 979.

"But before proceeding further, it is proper we should say, that eminent judges of the Supreme Court of the United States have asserted that a state, so far as not restrained by the constitution of the United States, has the same 'unlimited jurisdiction over all persons and things within its territorial limits as any foreign nation;' New York v. Miln, 11 Peters 102; License Cases, 5 How. 504; and that we admit the doctrine for the purposes of this case, in the application which they gave it, viz., that the state, in its sovereign capacity, possesses this power; not that the legislature, under our state constitution, possesses it. The doctrine asserted is, that the state, in its sovereign capacity, possesses such power, which, by a constitution, she is capable of conferring, if she pleases, upon her legislature; not that she has conferred it." Beebe v. State (1855) 6 Ind. 501, 509, 63 Am. Dec. 391.

Massachusetts. * * * After the decision rendered by the Court and the default entered at the February Term of 1793, judgment for the plaintiff was entered and a writ of inquiry of damages awarded at the February Term in 1794. The writ, however, was never sued out or executed." 1 Warren, supra, 99-100.

The following year a resolution proposing what became the Eleventh Amendment passed both houses of Congress. By January 8, 1798, it had been ratified by the necessary number of states. It was construed as terminating all suits of the kind then pending as well as preventing future ones. Hollingsworth v. Virginia (1798) 3 Dall. (U. S.) 378, 1 L. ed. 644. Consider how suits against State officers have partially undermined the Amendment.

"The people of the United States resident within any state are subject to two governments: one state, and the other national; but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses, the other does not. They are established for different purposes, and have separate jurisdictions. Together they make one whole, and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad. True, it may sometimes happen that a person is amenable to both jurisdictions for one and the same act. Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a state, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance, and that of the state by the breach of peace, in the assault. So, too, if one passes counterfeited coin of the United States within a state, it may be an offence against the United States and the state: the United States, because it discredits the coin; and the state, because of the fraud upon him to whom it is passed. This does not, however, necessarily imply that the two governments possess powers in common, or bring them into conflict with each other. * * *

"The government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the states or the people." Waite, C. J., in United States v. Cruikshank (1875) 92 U. S. 542, 550, 551, 23 L. ed. 588.

"The people of the United States constitute one nation, under one government, and this government, within the scope of the powers with which it is invested, is supreme. On the other hand, the people of each state compose a state, having its own government, and endowed with all the functions essential to separate and independent existence. The states disunited might continue to exist. Without the states in union there could be no such political body as the United States.

"Both the states and the United States existed before the Constitution. The people, through that instrument, established a more perfect union by substituting a national government, acting, with ample power, directly upon the citizens, instead of the Confederate government, which acted with powers, greatly restricted, only upon the states. But in many articles of the Constitution the necessary existence of the states, and, within their proper spheres, the independent authority of the states, is distinctly recognized. To them nearly the whole charge of interior regulation is committed or left; to them and to the people all powers not expressly delegated to the national government are reserved. The general condition was well stated by Mr. Madison in the Federalist, thus: 'The federal and state governments are in fact but different agents and trustees of the people, constituted with different powers and designated for different purposes.'" Chase, C. J., in Lane County v. Oregon (1868) 7 Wall. (U. S.) 71, 76, 19 L. ed. 101.

"Under the Articles of Confederation each state retained its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right not expressly delegated to the United States. Under the Constitution, though the powers of the states were much restricted, still, all powers not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people. * * * Not only, therefore, can there be no loss of separate and independent autonomy to the states, through their union under the Constitution, but it may be not unreasonably said that the preservation of the states, and the maintenance of their governments, are as much within the design and care of the Constitution as the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the national government." Chase, C. J., in Texas v. White (1868) 7 Wall. (U. S.) 700, 725, 19 L. ed. 227.

"That the United States form, for many, and for most important purposes, a single nation, has not yet been denied. In war, we are one people. In making peace, we are one people. In all commercial regulations, we are one and the same people. In many other respects, the American people are one; and the government which is alone capable of controlling and managing their interests in all these respects, is the government of the Union. It is their government, and in that character they have no other. America has chosen to be, in many respects, and to many purposes, a nation; and for all these purposes, her government is complete; to all these objects, it is competent. The people have declared, that in the exercise of all powers given for these objects, it is supreme. It can, then, in effecting these objects, legitimately control all individuals or governments within the American territory. The constitution and laws of a state, so far as they are repugnant to the constitution and laws of the United States, are absolutely void. These states are constituent parts of the United States. They are members of one great empire—for some purposes sovereign, for some purposes subordinate." Marshall, C. J., in Cohens v. Virginia (1821) 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 264, 413-414, 5 L. ed. 257.

Section 2.—National Fundamental Legislation.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION CASES.

1920. Supreme Court of the United States. 253 U. S. 350.

The seven cases here given one name for convenient reference involved ~~the validity~~ of the Eighteenth Amendment and of certain general features of the National ~~Prohibition Act~~ designed for its enforcement. [They were all su~~its to enjoin enforcement~~ of the Volstead Act brought ~~against~~ officers of the United States, suit No. 29 by the State of Rhode Island, No. 30 by the State of New Jersey and Nos. 696, 752, 788, 794, 837 by various individuals and corporations.]

Mr. Rice, for the State of Rhode Island, in No. 29, Original, confined his argument to the validity of the Amendment. Various objections were stated, the one chiefly elaborated being that the Amendment is an invasion of the sovereignty of the complaining state and her people, not contemplated by the amending clause of the Constitution. The amending power, it was contended, is not a substantive power but a precautionary safeguard inserted incidentally to insure the ends set forth in that instrument against errors and oversights committed in its formation. Amendments, as the term indeed implies, are to be limited to the correction of such errors.

The doctrine that any and every change may be introduced in guise of amendment is a novelty subversive of fundamental principles. It would bring about a constitutional revolution, converting the sovereignty of the people into a sovereignty of officials. It would permit the boundary between federal and state authority, established by the Constitution, to be shifted at will, * * *.

In the case of this so-called amendment, the representatives of the people of the United States have attempted, not to amend the Constitution of the United States, but to amend the constitution of every state in the union. If the amending function is construed as coextensive with absolute sovereignty, then the basis of our political system is no longer the right of the people of a state to make and alter their constitution, for their political institutions are at the mercy of others and may be changed against their will. * * *

Mr. Levy Mayer and Mr. William Marshall Bullitt for the appellant in No. 752:

The power of "amendment" contained in Art. V does not authorize the invasion of the sovereign powers expressly reserved to the states and the people by the Ninth and Tenth Amendments, except with the consent of all the states. If it be argued that the expression of one exception in Art. V negatives the possibility of others to be implied, the answer is to be found in the contrary principle of construction applied by this court to Art. I, § 7, in Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall. 378, that the existence of one exception to a power does not make the power unlimited in all other respects, but that there may be other qualifications or exceptions not expressed literally.

If amendment under Art. V were unlimited, three-fourths of the legislatures would have it in their power to establish a state religion and prohibit free exercise of other religious beliefs; to quarter a standing army in the houses of citizens; to do away with trial by jury and republican form of government; to repeal the provision for a president; and to abolish this court and with it the whole judicial power vested by the Constitution. * * *

Mr. Root for the appellant in No. 788:

I. The substantive and operative part of the so-called Eighteenth Amendment is contained in its first section. This provision does not relate to the powers or organization of government, as does an ordinary constitutional provision. On the contrary, it is itself an exercise of the legislative power of government, and a direct act of legislation regulating the conduct of life of the individual. The first question before the court is, therefore, whether Article V of the Constitution authorizes any amendment which in substance and effect is merely a police regulation or statute.

There is plainly a distinction in this respect between the so-called amendment as adopted and as it would be if it had conferred power upon Congress to prohibit the use of intoxicating liquors. An amendment in the latter form would, it is true, be precisely as irrepealable as the one here in question, but the conduct of individual life thereunder would at all times be within the control of representatives of the majority of the people. Congress would then have the power to prohibit intoxicants or not, completely or qualifiedly, as it from time to time deemed best; and if the majority of the people then desired prohibition, Congress could respond to their wish; and if, on the other hand, the majority thereafter became persuaded that extreme prohibition was no longer necessary, in that respect also Congress could effectuate the will of the people. In every free government the direct regulation of the lives of the people by legislation should at all times be in the hands of the majority, however the powers of government may be distributed and allocated. * * *

Article V of the Constitution should not be construed to confer unlimited legislative power upon the amending authorities. * * *

It does not advance the discussion to urge that the people can adopt any amendment to the Constitution they see fit. No doubt an amendment of any sort could be adopted by the same means as were employed in the adoption of the Constitution itself. In that manner alone do or can the people themselves act. But the amending authorities provided for in Article V of the Constitution, as clearly appears from the debates in the Constitutional Convention, are only agents of the people and not the people themselves. They must, therefore, act within the authority conferred in Article V, and that authority does not embrace the right under color of amendment to adopt mere sumptuary laws which are not constitutional amendments in truth or essence. The people could by appropriate proceedings amend the Constitution so as to impair such vital rights as freedom of religion, but it is inconceivable that any such unlimited power has been delegated to the amending agents, who may represent but a minority of the people. The census discloses that there are three-fourths of the states of the Union whose total population amounts to less than forty-five per cent. of the people of the United States, and two-thirds of a quorum of both houses of Congress may, therefore, likewise represent only a minority of the population.

Ratification by state legislatures does not as matter of fact provide an opportunity for the people to express their will regarding the proposed Eighteenth Amendment as the calling of conventions might have done. Thus, for example, the Missouri legislature ratified it, notwithstanding an express provision of the Missouri constitution (Art. II, § 3) forbidding them so to do, and in Ohio ratification by the legislature was subsequently rejected by the people at the polls, while in other states the people have been denied all right to have the question of ratification referred to them for approval. * * *

The so-called Eighteenth Amendment directly invades the police powers of the states and directly encroaches upon their right of local self-government. If this amendment be valid, then any amendment which directly impairs the police powers of the states and absolutely withdraws from them their right to local self-government in any important particular, heretofore indisputably a matter of internal concern, must likewise be valid. In other words, if the so-called Eighteenth Amendment be lawful, then the states are not in truth indestructible. It must be manifest that the precedent necessarily erected by a holding that the Eighteenth Amendment is constitutional, would authorize the complete subversion of our dual and federal system of government. It is submitted that the authority conferred in Article V to amend the Constitution carries no power to destroy its federal principle in a most fundamental aspect.

Mr. Justice Van Devanter [after quoting the text of the amendment clause of the Constitution, Article V, and the Eighteenth Amendment] announced the conclusions of the court.

We here are concerned with seven cases involving the validity of that Amendment and of certain general features of the National Prohibition Law, known as the Volstead Act, c. 83, 41 Stat. 305, which was adopted to enforce the Amendment. The relief sought in each case is an injunction against the execution of that act. Two of the cases—Nos. 29 and 30, Original,—were brought in this court, and the others in district courts. Nos. 696, 752, 788 and 837 are here on appeals from decrees refusing injunctions, and No. 794 from a decree granting an injunction. The cases have been elaborately argued at the bar and in printed briefs; and the arguments have been attentively considered, with the result that we reach and announce the following conclusions on the questions involved:

1. The adoption by both houses of Congress, each by a two-thirds vote, of a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution sufficiently shows that the proposal was deemed necessary by all who voted for it. An express declaration that they regarded it as necessary is not essential. None of the resolutions whereby prior amendments were proposed contained such a declaration.

2. The two-thirds vote in each house which is required in proposing an amendment is a vote of two-thirds of the members present—assuming the presence of a quorum—and not a vote of two-thirds of the entire membership, present and absent. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Kansas, 248 U. S. 276.

3. The referendum provisions of state constitutions and statutes cannot be applied, consistently with the Constitution of the United States, in the ratification or rejection of amendments to it. Hawke v. Smith, ante, 221.

4. The prohibition of the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation and exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, as embodied in the Eighteenth Amendment, is within the power to amend reserved by Article V of the Constitution.

5. That Amendment, by lawful proposal and ratification, has become a part of the Constitution, and must be respected and given effect the same as other provisions of that instrument.

6. The first section of the Amendment—the one embodying the prohibition—is operative throughout the entire territorial limits of the United States, binds all legislative bodies, courts, public officers and individuals within those limits, and of its own force invalidates every legislative act—whether by Congress, by a state legislature, or by a territorial assembly—which authorizes or sanctions what the section prohibits. * * *[1]

Giving effect to these conclusions, we dispose of the cases as follows:

In Nos. 29 and 30, Original, the bills are dismissed.
In No. 794 the decree [granting injunction] is reversed.
In Nos. 696, 752, 788 and 837 the decrees [refusing to grant injunctions] are affirmed.

HAWKE v. SMITH, SECRETARY OF STATE OF OHIO (NO. 1).

27

1920. Supreme Court of the United States. 253 U. S. 221.

MR. JUSTICE DAY delivered the opinion of the court.

Plaintiff in error (plaintiff below) filed a petition for an injunction in the Court of Common Pleas of Franklin County, Ohio, seeking to enjoin the Secretary of State of Ohio from spending the public money in preparing and printing forms of ballot for submission of a referendum to the electors of that state on the question of the ratification which the general assembly had made of the proposed Eighteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. A demurrer to the petition was sustained in the Court of Common Pleas. Its judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals of Franklin County, which judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Ohio, and the case was brought here. * * *

The senate and house of representatives of the State of Ohio adopted a resolution ratifying the proposed Amendment by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, and ordered that certified copies of the joint resolution of ratification be forwarded by the governor to the secretary of state at Washington and to the presiding officer of each house of Congress. This resolution was adopted on January 7, 1919; on January 27, 1919, the governor of Ohio complied with the resolution. On January 29, 1919, the secretary of state of the United States proclaimed the ratification of the Amendment, naming thirty-six states as having ratified the same, among them the State of Ohio.

[1] Conclusions 7 to 11 dealing with interpretation of the Amendment and holding valid the Volstead Act passed by Congress to enforce the Amendment are omitted. White, C. J., delivered a separate concurring opinion but not explanatory of the reasons for conclusions 1 to 6. McReynolds, J., confined his concurrence to the judgments. McKenna, J., dissented as to one of the omitted conclusions, but concurred in those above printed, remarking, "The court declares conclusions only, without giving any reasons for them. The instance may be wise—establishing a precedent now, hereafter wisely to be imitated. It will undoubtedly decrease the literature of the court if it does not increase lucidity." Clarke, J., concurred in the above six conclusions and dissented from three of the omitted ones. It has been left to periodical writers to supply reasons. See W. F. Dodd, Amending the Federal Constitution, (1921) 30 Yale Law Jour. 321-354; D. O. McGovney, Is the Eighteenth Amendment Void Because of its Contents? (1920) 20 Col. Law Rev. 499-518 (published prior to the above decision). Note the discussion of sovereignty and the distinction between sovereignty and governmental organs, in the latter essay. Do the grounds assigned for decision in Hawke v. Smith, Dillon v. Gloss, and Leser v. Garnett supply reasons for the conclusions announced in the Prohibition Cases?

The question for our consideration is: Whether the provision of the Ohio constitution, adopted at the general election, November, 1918, extending the referendum to the ratification by the general assembly of proposed amendments to the federal Constitution is in conflict with Article V of the Constitution of the United States. The Amendment of 1918 provides: "The people also reserve to themselves the legislative power of the referendum on the action of the general assembly ratifying any proposed amendment to the Constitution to the United States." [Article V of the federal Constitution is here quoted.]

The Constitution of the United States was ordained by the people, and, when duly ratified, it became the Constitution of the people of the United States. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 402. The states surrendered to the general government the powers specifically conferred upon the Nation, and the Constitution and the laws of the United States are the supreme law of the land.

The framers of the Constitution realized that it might in the progress of time and the development of new conditions require changes, and they intended to provide an orderly manner in which these could be accomplished; to that end they adopted the Fifth Article.

This article makes provision for the proposal of amendments either by two-thirds of both houses of Congress, or on application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the states; thus securing deliberation and consideration before any change can be proposed. The proposed change can only become effective by the ratification of the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, or by conventions in a like number of states. The method of ratification is left to the choice of Congress. Both methods of ratification, by legislatures or conventions, call for action by deliberative assemblages representative of the people, which it was assumed would voice the will of the people.

The Fifth Article is a grant of authority by the people to Congress. The determination of the method of ratification is the exercise of a national power specifically granted by the Constitution; that power is conferred upon Congress, and is limited to two methods, by action of the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, or conventions in a like number of states. Dodge v. Woolsey, 18

How. 331, 348. The framers of the Constitution might have adopted a different method. Ratification might have been left to a vote of the people, or to some authority of government other than that selected. The language of the article is plain, and admits of no doubt in its interpretation. It is not the function of courts or legislative bodies, national or state, to alter the method which the Constitution has fixed.

All of the amendments to the Constitution have been submitted with a requirement for legislative ratification; by this method all of them have been adopted.

The only question really for determination is: What did the framers of the Constitution mean in requiring ratification by "Legislatures"? ✓ ? That was not a term of uncertain meaning when incorporated into the Constitution. What it meant when adopted it still means for the purpose of interpretation. A Legislature was then the representative body which made the laws of the people. The term is often used in the Constitution with this evident meaning. Article I, § 2, prescribes the qualifications of electors of congressmen as those "requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature." Article I, § 3, provided that senators shall be chosen in each state by the legislature thereof, and this was the method of choosing senators until the adoption of the Seventeenth Amendment which made provision for the election of senators by vote of the people, the electors to have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature. That Congress and the states understood that this election by the people was entirely distinct from legislative action is shown by the provision of the amendment giving the legislature of any state the power to authorize the executive to make temporary appointments until the people shall fill the vacancies by election. It was never suggested, so far as we are aware, that the purpose of making the office of senator elective by the people could be accomplished by a referendum vote. The necessity of the amendment to accomplish the purpose of popular election is shown in the adoption of the amendment. In Article IV the United States is required to protect every state against domestic violence upon application of the legislature, or of the executive when the legislature cannot be convened. Article VI requires the members of the several legislatures to be bound by oath, or affirmation, to support the Constitution of the United States. By Article I, § 8, Congress is given exclusive jurisdiction over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be. Article IV, § 3, provides that no new states shall be carved out of old states without the consent of the legislatures of the states concerned.

There can be no question that the framers of the Constitution clearly understood and carefully used the terms in which that instrument referred to the action of the legislatures of the states. When they intended that direct action by the people should be had they were no less accurate in the use of apt phraseology to carry out such purpose. The members of the house of representatives were required to be chosen by the people of the several states. Article I, § 2.

The Constitution of Ohio in its present form, although making provision for a referendum, vests the legislative power primarily in a general assembly consisting of a senate and house of representatives. Article II, § 1, provides:

"The legislative power of the state shall be vested in a general assembly consisting of a senate and house of representatives, but the people shall reserve to themselves the power to propose to the general assembly laws and amendments to the constitution, and to adopt or reject the same at the polls on a referendum vote as hereinafter provided."

The argument to support the power of the State to require the approval by the people of the state of the ratification of amendments to the federal Constitution through the medium of a referendum rests upon the proposition that the federal Constitution requires ratification by the legislative action of the states through the medium provided at the time of the proposed approval of an amendment. This argument is fallacious in this—ratification by a state of a constitutional amendment is not an act of legislation within the proper sense of the word. It is but the expression of the assent of the state to a proposed amendment.

At an early day this court settled that the submission of a constitutional amendment did not require the action of the president. The question arose over the adoption of the Eleventh Amendment. Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall. 378. In that case it was contended that the amendment had not been proposed in the manner provided in the Constitution as an inspection of the original roll showed that it had never been submitted to the president for his approval in accordance with Article I, § 7, of the Constitution. The attorney general answered that the case of amendments is a substantive act, unconnected with the ordinary business of legislation, and not within the policy or terms of the Constitution investing the president with a qualified negative on the acts and resolutions of Congress. In a foot-note to this argument of the attorney general, Justice Chase said: "There can, surely, be no necessity to answer that argument. The negative of the president applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation: He has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the constitution." The court by a unanimous judgment held that the amendment was constitutionally adopted.

It is true that the power to legislate in the enactment of the laws of a state is derived from the people of the state. But the power to ratify a proposed amendment to the federal Constitution has its source in the federal Constitution. The act of ratification by the state derives its authority from the federal Constitution to which the state and its people have alike assented.

This view of the provision for amendment is confirmed in the history of its adoption found in 2 Watson on the Constitution, 1301 et seq. Any other view might lead to endless confusion in the manner of ratification of federal amendments. The choice of means of ratification was wisely withheld from conflicting action in the several states. * * *

It follows that the court erred in holding that the state had authority to require the submission of the ratification to a referendum under the state constitution, and its judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Reversed.

DILLON v. GLOSS, DEPUTY COLLECTOR OF UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE.

28

1921. Supreme Court of the United States. 256 U. S. 368.

MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER delivered the opinion of the court. This is an appeal from an order denying a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. 262 Fed. Rep. 563. The petitioner was in custody under § 26 of Title II of the National Prohibition Act, c. 85, 41 Stat. 305, on a charge of transporting intoxicating liquor in violation of § 3 of that title, and by his petition sought to be discharged on several grounds, all but two of which were abandoned after the decision in National Prohibition Cases, 253 U. S. 350. The remaining grounds are, first, that the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, to enforce which Title II of the act was adopted, is invalid because the congressional resolution, 40 Stat. 1050, proposing the Amendment, declared that it should be inoperative unless ratified within seven years; and, secondly, that, in any event, the provisions of the act which the petitioner was charged with violating, and under which he was arrested, had not gone into effect at the time of the asserted violation nor at the time of the arrest.

The power to amend the Constitution and the mode of exerting it are dealt with in Article V. * * *

It will be seen that this article says nothing about the time within which ratification may be had—neither that it shall be unlimited nor that it shall be fixed by Congress. What then is the reasonable inference or implication? Is it that ratification may be had at any time, as within a few years, a century or even a longer period; or that it must be had within some reasonable period which Congress is left free to define? Neither the debates in the federal convention which framed the Constitution nor those in the state conventions which ratified it shed any light on the question.

The proposal for the Eighteenth Amendment is the first in which a definite period for ratification was fixed. Theretofore twenty-one amendments had been proposed by Congress and seventeen of these had been ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states,—some within a single year after their proposal and all within four years. Each of the remaining four had been ratified in some of the states, but not in a sufficient number. Eighty years after the partial ratification of one an effort was made to complete its ratification and the legislature of Ohio passed a joint resolution to that end, after which the effort was abandoned. Two, after ratification in one less than the required number of states, had lain dormant for a century. The other, proposed March 2, 1861, declared: "No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any state, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said state." Its principal purpose was to protect slavery and at the time of its proposal and partial ratification it was a subject of absorbing interest, but after the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment it was generally forgotten. Whether an amendment proposed without fixing any time for ratification, and which after favorable action in less than the required number of states had lain dormant for many years, could be resurrected and its ratification completed had been mooted on several occasions, but was still an open question.

These were the circumstances in the light of which Congress in proposing the Eighteenth Amendment fixed seven years as the period for ratification. Whether this could be done was questioned at the time and debated at length, but the prevailing view in both houses was that some limitation was intended and that seven years was a reasonable period.

That the Constitution contains no express provision on the subject is not in itself controlling; for with the Constitution, as with a statute or other written instrument, what is reasonably implied is as much a part of it as what is expressed. An examination of Article V discloses that it was intended to invest Congress with a wide range of power in proposing amendments. Passing a provision long since expired,[2] it subjects this power to only two restrictions: One that the proposal shall have the approval of two-thirds of both houses, and the other excluding any amendment which will deprive any state, without its consent, of its equal suffrage in the senate.[3] A further mode of proposal—as yet never invoked—is provided, which is, that on the application of two-thirds of the states, Congress shall call a convention for the purpose. When proposed in either mode amendments to be effective must be ratified by the legislatures, or by conventions, in three-fourths of the states, "as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress." Thus the people of the United States, by whom the Constitution was ordained and established, have made it a condition to amending that instrument that the amendment be submitted to representative assemblies in the several states and be ratified in three-fourths of them. The plain meaning of this is (a) that all amendments must have the sanction of the people of the United States, the original fountain of power, acting through representative assemblies, and (b) that ratification by these assemblies in three-fourths of the states shall be taken as a decisive expression of the people's will and be binding on all.[4]

We do not find anything in the Article which suggests that an amendment once proposed is open to ratification for all time, or that ratification in some of the states may be separated from that in others by many years and yet be effective. We do find that which strongly suggests the contrary. First, proposal and ratification are not treated as unrelated acts but as succeeding steps in a single endeavor, the natural inference being that they are not to be widely separated in time. Secondly, it is only when there is deemed to be a necessity therefor that amendments are to be proposed, the reasonable implication being that when proposed they are to be considered and disposed of presently. Thirdly, as ratification is but the expression of the approbation of the people and is to be effective when had in three-fourths of the states, there is a fair implication that it must be sufficiently contemporaneous in that number of states to reflect the will of the people in all sections at relatively the same period, which of course ratification scattered through a long series of years would not do. These considerations and the general purport and spirit of the Article lead to the conclusion expressed by Judge Jameson[5] "that an alteration of the Constitution proposed today has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of today, and that, if not ratified early while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived, and not again to be voted upon, unless a second time proposed by Congress." That this is the better conclusion becomes even more manifest when what is comprehended in the other view is considered; for, according to it, four amendments proposed long ago—two in 1789, one in 1810 and one in 1861—are still pending and in a situation where their ratification in some of the states many years since by representatives of generations now largely forgotten may be effectively supplemented in enough more states to make three-fourths by representatives of the present or some future generation. To that view few would be able to subscribe, and in our opinion it is quite untenable. We conclude that the fair inference or implication from Article V is that the ratification must be within some reasonable time after the proposal.

[2] Article V, as before shown, contained a provision that "No amendment which shall be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article." One of the clauses named covered the migration and importation of slaves and the other deals with direct taxes. [This and the next three footnotes are Justice Van Devanter's.]

[3] When the federal convention adopted Article V a motion to include another restriction forbidding any amendment whereby a state, without its consent, would "be affected in its internal police" was decisively voted down. The vote was: yeas 3—Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware; nays 8—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia. Elliot's Debates, vol. 5, pp. 551, 552.

Yes ✓

✓ Of the power of Congress, keeping within reasonable limits, to fix a definite period for the ratification we entertain no doubt. As a rule the Constitution speaks in general terms, leaving Congress to deal with subsidiary matters of detail as the public interests and changing conditions may require; and Article V is no exception to the rule. Whether a definite period for ratification shall be fixed so that all may know what it is and speculation on what is a reasonable time may be avoided, is, in our opinion, a matter of detail which Congress may determine as an incident of its power to designate the mode of ratification. It is not questioned that seven years, the period fixed in this instance, was reasonable, if power existed to fix a definite time; nor could it well be questioned considering the periods within which prior amendments were ratified.

The provisions of the act which the petitioner was charged with violating and under which he was arrested (Title II, §§ 3, 26) were by the terms of the act (Title III, § 21) to be in force from and after the date when the Eighteenth Amendment should go into effect, and the latter by its own terms was to go into effect one year after being ratified. Its ratification, of which we take judicial notice, was consummated January 16, 1919. That the Secretary of State did not proclaim its ratification until January 29, 1919, is not material, for the date of its consummation, and not that on which it is proclaimed, controls. It follows that the provisions of the act with which the petitioner is concerned went into effect January 16, 1920. His alleged offense and his arrest were on the following day; so his claim that those provisions had not gone into effect at the time is not well grounded.

Final order affirmed.

LESER v. GARNETT.

1922. Supreme Court of United States. 258 U. S. 130.

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the opinion of the court.

On October 12, 1920, Cecilia Streett Waters and Mary D. Randolph, citizens of Maryland, applied for and were granted registration as qualified voters in Baltimore City. To have their names stricken from the list Oscar Leser and others brought this suit in the court of Common Pleas. The only ground of disqualification alleged was that the applicants for registration were women, whereas the constitution of Maryland limits the suffrage to men. Ratification of the proposed Amendment to the federal Constitution, now known as the Nineteenth, 41 Stat. 362, had been proclaimed on August 26, 1920, 41 Stat. 1823, pursuant to Rev. Stat., § 205. The legislature of Maryland had refused to ratify it. The petitioners contended, on several grounds, that the Amendment had not become part of the federal Constitution. * * *

The first contention is that the power of amendment conferred by the federal Constitution and sought to be exercised does not extend to this Amendment, because of its character. The argument is that so great an addition to the electorate, if made without the state's consent, destroys its autonomy as a political body. This Amendment is in character and phraseology precisely similar to the Fifteenth. For each the same method of adoption was pursued. One cannot be valid and the other invalid. That the Fifteenth is valid, although rejected by six states including Maryland, has been recognized and acted on for half a century. See United States v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370; Guinn v. United States, 238 U. S. 347; Myers v. Anderson, 238 U. S. 368. The suggestion that the Fifteenth was incorporated in the Constitution, not in accordance with law, but practically as a war measure which has been validated by acquiescence, cannot be entertained.

The second contention is that in the constitutions of several of the thirty-six states named in the proclamation of the secretary of state there are provisions which render inoperative the alleged ratifications by their legislatures. The argument is that by reason of these specific provisions the legislatures were without power to ratify. But the function of a state legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment to the federal Constitution, like the function of Congress in proposing the amendment, is a federal function derived from the federal Constitution; and it transcends any limitations sought to be imposed by the people of a state. Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U. S. 221; Hawke v. Smith, No. 2, 253 U. S. 231; National Prohibition Cases, 253 U. S. 350, 386.

The remaining contention is that the ratifying resolutions of Tennessee and of West Virginia are inoperative, because adopted in violation of the rules of legislative procedure prevailing in the respective states. The question raised may have been rendered immaterial by the fact that since the proclamation the legislatures of two other states—Connecticut and Vermont—have adopted resolutions of ratification. But a broader answer should be given to the contention. The proclamation by the secretary certified that from official documents on file in the Department of State it appeared that the proposed Amendment was ratified by the legislatures of thirty-six states, and that it "has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States." As the legislatures of Tennessee and of West Virginia had power to adopt the resolutions of ratification, official notice to the secretary, duly authenticated, that they had done so was conclusive upon him, and, being certified to by his proclamation, is conclusive upon the courts. The rule declared in Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 669-673, is applicable here. See also Harwood v. Wentworth, 162 U. S. 547, 562.

Affirmed.

Section 3.—Sole and Dual Government.

EL PASO & NORTHEASTERN RY. CO. v. GUTIERREZ, ADMINISTRATRIX.

1909. Supreme Court of the United States. 215 U. S. 87.

[Action for damages for death of plaintiff's intestate alleged to have been caused by the wrongful act of the defendant railway company while the intestate was engaged in its service in the Territory of New Mexico. The issue below was whether the plaintiff's rights were governed by a statute of the Territory or by an Act of Congress, the so-called Employers' Liability Act of June 11, 1906, c. 3073, 34 Stat. 232. The defendant's chief contention was that the Employers' Liability Act was unconstitutional. It relied upon the Employers' Liability Cases (1908) 207 U. S. 463 where the Supreme Court had so held. The case was tried under the latter statute with verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. After intermediate appeals a writ of error was prosecuted to the Supreme Court.]

Mr. Justice Day. * * * In view of the plenary power of Congress under the Constitution over the Territories of the United States, subject only to certain limitations and prohibitions not necessary to notice now, there can be no doubt that an act of Congress undertaking to regulate commerce in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States would necessarily supersede the territorial law regulating the same subject.

Is the Federal Employers' Liability Act of June 11, 1906, unconstitutional so far as it relates to common carriers engaged in trade or commerce in the Territories of the United States? It has been suggested that this question is foreclosed by a decision of this court in the Employers' Liability Cases,[1] 207 U. S. 463. In that case this court held that, conceding the power of Congress to regulate the relations of employer and employe engaged in interstate commerce, the act of June 11, 1906, c. 3073, 34 Stat. 232, was unconstitutional in this, that in its provisions regulating interstate commerce Congress exceeded its constitutional authority in undertaking to make employers responsible, not only to employes when engaged in interstate commerce, but to any of its employes, whether engaged in interstate commerce or in commerce wholly within a State.[2] That the unconstitutionality of the act, so far as it relates to the District of Columbia and the Territories, was not determined is evident from a consideration of the opinion of the court in the case. In answering the suggestion that the words "any employe" in the statute should be so read as to mean only employes engaged in interstate commerce, Mr. Justice White, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"But this would require us to write into the statute words of limitation and restriction not found in it. But if we could bring ourselves to modify the statute by writing in the words suggested the result would be to restrict the operation of the act as to the District of Columbia and the Territories. We say this because immediately preceding the provision of the act concerning carriers engaged in commerce between the States and Territories is a clause making it applicable to 'every common carrier engaged in trade or commerce in the District of Columbia or in any Territory of the United States.' It follows, therefore, that common carriers in such Territories, even although not engaged in interstate commerce, are by the act made liable to 'any' of their employes, as therein defined. The legislative power of Congress over the District of Columbia and the Territories being plenary and not depending upon the interstate commerce clause, it results that the provision as to the District of Columbia and the Territories, if standing alone, could not be questioned. Thus it would come to pass, if we could bring ourselves to modify the statute by writing in the words suggested; that is, by causing the act to read 'any employe when engaged in interstate commerce,' we would restrict the act as to the District of Columbia and the Territories, and thus destroy it in an important particular. To write into the act the qualifying words, therefore, would be but adding to its provisions in order to save it in one aspect, and thereby to destroy it in another; that is, to destroy in order to save and to save in order to destroy." 207 U. S. 500.

[1] In one of those cases the employee when hurt was working for the railroad in the State of Nevada (Brooks v. Southern Pac. Co., 148 Fed. 986, 996) and in the other, in the State of Tennessee (Howard v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 148 Fed. 997).

[2] In Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Behrens (1914) 233 U. S. 473, 477, 58 L. ed. 1051, it is said that the Act of 1906 was pronounced invalid in the Employers' Liability Cases because it attempted to regulate the liability of every carrier in interstate commerce for any injury to any employee "even though his employment had no connection whatever with interstate commerce."

A perusal of this portion of the opinion makes it evident that it was not intended to hold the act unconstitutional in so far as it related to the District of Columbia and the Territories, for it is there suggested that to interpolate in the act the qualifying words contended for would destroy the act in respect to the District of Columbia and the Territories by limiting its operation in a field where Congress had plenary power, and did not depend for its authority upon the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. The act in question is set forth in full in a note to Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U. S. 463, 490. We are concerned in the present case with its first section only. This section reads:

"That every common carrier engaged in trade or commerce in the District of Columbia, or in any Territory of the United States, or between the several States, or between any Territory and another, or between any Territory or Territories and any State or States, or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, shall be liable to any of its employes, or, in the case of his death, to his personal representative for the benefit of his widow and children, if any; if none, then for his parents; if none, then for his next of kin dependent upon him, for all damages which may result from the negligence of any of its officers, agents or employes, or by reason of any defect or any insufficiency due to its negligence in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, ways or works."

A perusal of this section makes it evident that Congress is here dealing, first, with trade or commerce in the District of Columbia and the Territories; and, second, with interstate commerce, commerce with foreign nations, and between the Territories and the States. As we have already indicated, its power to deal with trade or commerce in the District of Columbia and the Territories does not depend upon the authority of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. Upon the other hand, the regulation sought to be enacted as to commerce between the States and with foreign nations depends upon the authority of Congress granted to it by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations. As to the latter class, Congress was dealing with a liability ordinarily governed by state statutes, or controlled by the common law as administered in the several states. The federal power of regulation [of commerce] within the states is limited to the right of Congress to control transactions of interstate commerce; it has no authority to regulate commerce wholly of a domestic character. It was because Congress had exceeded its authority in attempting to regulate the second class of commerce named in the statute that this court was constrained to hold the act unconstitutional. The act undertook to fix the liability as to "any employe," whether engaged in interstate commerce or not, and, in the terms of the act, had so interwoven and blended the regulation of liability within the authority of Congress with that which was not that the whole act was held invalid in this respect.

Coming to consider the statute in the light of the accepted rules of construction, we are of opinion that the provisions with reference to interstate commerce, which were declared unconstitutional for the reasons stated, are entirely separable from and in nowise dependent upon the provisions of the act regulating commerce within the District of Columbia and the Territories. * * *

[3] To meet the defect in the Act of 1906 pointed out in the first Employers' Liability Cases (1908) 207 U. S. 463, 52 L. ed. 297, Congress enacted a second Employers' Liability Act, April 22, 1908, 35 Stat. 65, ch. 149. In respect to employers engaged in interstate commerce the second statute is restricted to apply to the legal relations between such employers and such of their employees as are at the time of injury themselves engaged in interstate commerce. This act was held valid in Second Employers' Liability Cases (1912) 223 U. S. 1, 56 L. ed. 327. In a transportation of goods from a point in one state to a point in another state, one of the clearest examples of interstate commerce, all of the persons directly engaged do all their acts of transportation in one of the states or in the other. They are acting within states but are subject to the legislative power of Congress so far as their acts constitute interstate commerce. The same carrier has other employees not engaged in such transportation or in any other act of interstate commerce but wholly in intrastate commerce or in acts that are not commerce at all (examples, employed in re-arranging machinery in railroad machine shop, Shanks v. 1879. Supreme Court of the United States. 101 U. S. 129.

Error to the Supreme Court of Dakota Territory.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court.

By section 4 of the act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Dakota, no one session of the legislative assembly shall exceed forty days (12 Stat. 239), and in 1869 Congress declared that the sessions of all territorial legislative assemblies should be biennial. 15 id. 300. The members of the legislative assembly of Dakota met on the 5th of December, 1870, and continued in regular session on all days, except Sundays, until Jan. 13, 1871, when they adjourned without day. The day of adjournment was called on the journals the fortieth day of the session, although there had been but thirty-five days of actual session for the transaction of business. On the 18th of April, 1871, the members of the legislature elected the preceding fall again assembled at the call of the acting governor of the Territory. After organizing themselves as a legislative assembly and proceeding to legislate for the Territory, they passed, among other acts, one entitled "An Act to enable organized counties and townships to vote aid to any railroad, and to provide for the payment of the same." Under this act the voters of Yankton ware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Yurkonis (1915) 238 U. S. 439, 59 L. ed. 1397, or employees constructing a tunnel, Raymond v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1917) 243 U. S. 43, 61 L. ed. 583).

The character of the legal relations determined by these statutes, as between the persons embraced, is shown by the statement of Moody, J.:—"The common law allowed no recovery against the employer for the neglect of a fellow-servant engaged in a common employment; by the statute the employer is held responsible for the negligence of any of its officers, agents or employes, even though the guilty person is a fellow-servant of him who is injured or killed. The common law denied to one who by his negligence had contributed to his own injury the right to a remedy for the neglect of another which had been a concurring cause; by the statute the negligent sufferer may recover if his negligence be slight, and that of the employer gross in comparison, though the contributing negligence must be taken into account in reduction of the damages. The common law, as adjudged by this court, permitted the employe to enter into a contract renouncing his right to damages in case he incurred injuries in the course of his employment; the statute forbids such a contract. Thus four doctrines of the common law restrictive of the employes' rights are supplanted by others more favorable to him." Employers' Liability Cases (1908) 207 U. S. 463, 536-537, 52 L. ed. 297. Can Congress validly regulate likewise the legal relations of hotel keepers and their employees, in hotels located in Territories? In states? If a Territorial legislature should do so, where would you look to determine whether the statute was within its power? If a state legislature should do so, where would you look? What are the respective sources of the local autonomy of the inhabitants of a city, of a Territory, of a state?

Would an act of Congress be valid which specified the sole grounds for divorce between persons residing in those portions of the national territory called Territories? In those called states?

County, on the 2d of September, 1871, voted to donate the Dakota Southern Railroad Company $200,000 in the bonds of the county. All the proceedings under which this vote was taken were conducted strictly according to the requirements of the law.

On the twenty-seventh day of May, 1872, the following act of Congress was approved and went into effect. 17 id. 162. [This act expressly "disapproved and annulled" the above Territorial statute, but provided that the annulling act should not invalidate votes of aid or subscriptions to the Dakota Southern Railroad Company, the organization of which it expressly declared valid, with a proviso that the company should issue paid-up certificates of stock to the counties equal in par value to the amount of their subscriptions.].

After the passage of this act, the bonds voted were delivered by the county commissioners to the railroad company, and stock in the company for an equal amount was issued to the county. The First National Bank of Brunswick, Maine, the bona fide holder and owner pl. of ten of these bonds, amounting in the aggregate to $10,000, brought this suit against the county to recover three instalments of interest. The defence was that there was no law authorizing the issue of the bonds, and, as a consequence, that the county was not bound for the payment of either principal or interest. Upon the trial of the cause, the facts were found substantially as already stated, and a judgment was rendered by the District Court of the ct. Territory in favor of the county. This judgment was afterwards affirmed by the Supreme Court, and thereupon the bank brought the case here by writ of error.

We do not consider it necessary to decide whether the governor of Dakota had authority to call an extra session of the legislative assembly, nor whether a law passed at such a session or after the limited term of forty days had expired would be valid, because, as we think, the act of May 27, 1872, is equivalent to a direct grant of power by Congress to the county to issue the bonds in dispute. It is certainly now too late to doubt the power of Congress to govern the Territories. There have been some differences of opinion as to the particular clause of the Constitution from which the power is derived, but that it exists has always been conceded. * * * All territory within the jurisdiction of the United States not included in any state must necessarily be governed by or under the authority of Congress. The Territories are but political subdivisions of the outlying dominion of the United States. Their relation to the general government is much the same as that which counties bear to the respective states, and Congress may legislate for them as a state does for its municipal organizations. The organic law of a Territory takes the place of a constitution as the fundamental law of the local government.[4] It is obligatory on and binds the territorial authorities; but Congress is supreme, and for the purposes of this department of its governmental authority has all the powers of the people of the United States, except such as have been expressly or by implication reserved in the prohibitions of the Constitution.

In the organic act of Dakota there was not an express reservation of power in Congress to amend the act of the territorial legislature, nor was it necessary. Such a power is an incident of sovereignty, and continues until granted away. Congress may not only abrogate laws of the territorial legislatures, but it may itself legislate directly for the local government. It may make a void act of the territorial legislature valid, and a valid act void. In other words, it has full and complete legislative authority over the people of the Territories and all the departments of the territorial governments. It may do for the Territories what the people, under the Constitution of the United States, may do for the states.

Turning, then, to the particular act of Congress now under consideration, we find that the attention of that body was in some way brought to the fact that the legislative assembly of Dakota had, on the 21st of April, 1871, passed an act to enable organized counties and townships to vote aid to railroads. In addition to this, it was known that the Dakota Southern Railroad Company had been organized as a corporation under certain acts of the territorial legislative assembly, and that votes had been taken under the aid act in some of the counties and townships granting aid to or authorizing subscriptions of stock in this corporation. It is clear that Congress disapproved the policy of the aid act, and was unwilling to have it go into general operation; but to the extent it could be made available for the construction and completion of the main stem of the Dakota Southern Railroad the contrary is distinctly manifested. The act as a whole was "disapproved and annulled," but in substance re-enacted by Congress "for the purpose of validating any vote of aid or subscription" to that company, but "for no other purpose whatever." A careful examination of the statute leaves no doubt in our minds on this subject. To make it sure that the organization of the company was complete, the "Dakota Southern Railroad Company, as organized under and in conformity to the acts of the legislative assembly of said Territory," was "recognized and declared to be a legal and valid corporation." It is then in terms enacted that the provisions of the aid act, "so far as the same authorize, and for the purpose of validating any vote of aid and subscriptions to said company, for the construction, completion and equipment of the main stem of said railroad, * * * are hereby declared to be and remain in full force." And again: "that said Dakota Southern Railroad Company shall issue to the respective counties and townships voting aid to said railroad, paid-up certificates of stock in the same in amounts equal to the sums voted by the respective counties and townships." In the light of these distinct and positive declarations and enactments of Congress, it is impossible to bring our minds to any other conclusion than that, when the bonds now in controversy were put out, there existed full and complete legislative authority to bind the people of the county for their payment. No complaint is made of any irregularity in the proceedings under the law. The question in the case is one of power only. As we think, the vote of the people of the county was "validated" by Congress, and express authority given to issue the bonds for the purposes originally intended. The only change which Congress saw fit to make was to require the company to give stock in return for the donation as voted.

(9 Stat. 323, c. 177, § 4. It declared, § 6, that the legislative power of the Territory should "extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States," but that no law should be passed interfering with the primary disposal of the soil; that no tax should be imposed upon the property of the United States; that the property of non-residents should not be taxed higher than the property of residents; and that all the laws passed by the Assembly should be submitted to Congress, and if disapproved should be null and of no effect. METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY v. DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

1889. United States Supreme Court. 132 U. S. 1.

[On writ of error to review a judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in a suit brought by the District against the railway company to recover sums of money spent by the District in making certain repairs to streets which it was the duty of the railway company to make under its charter from Congress. The railway company pleaded the statute of limitations. Defendant demurred. The trial court over-ruled this demurrer and gave judgment on a verdict for the plaintiff.]

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

This general review of the form of government which prevailed in the District of Columbia and city of Washington prior to 1871 is sufficient to show that it was strictly municipal in its character; and that the government of the United States, except so far as the protection of its own public buildings and property was concerned, took no part in the local government, any more than any state government interferes with the municipal administration of its cities. The officers of the departments, even the President himself, exercised no local authority in city affairs. It is true, in consequence of the large property interests of the United States in Washington, in the public parks and buildings, the government always made some contribution to the finances of the city; but the residue was raised by taxing the inhabitants of the city and District, just as the inhabitants of all municipal bodies are taxed.

In 1871 an important modification was made in the form of the District government; a legislature was established, with all the apparatus of a distinct government. * * * A governor and legislature were created; also a board of public works; the latter to consist of the governor as its president, and four other persons, to be appointed by the President and Senate. * * *

This constitution lasted until June 20th, 1874, when an act was passed entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes." 18 Stat. 116, ch. 337. By this act the government established by the act of 1871 was abolished, and the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, was authorized to appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, to exercise the power and authority then vested in the governor and board of public works, except as afterwards limited by the act. By a subsequent act, approved June 11th, 1878, 20 Stat. 102, c. 180, it was enacted that the District of Columbia should "remain and continue a municipal corporation," as provided in § 2 of the Revised Statutes relating to said District, and the appointment of commissioners was provided for, to have and to exercise similar powers given to the commissioners appointed under the act of 1874. All rights of action and suits for and against the District were expressly preserved in statu quo.

Under these different changes the administration of the affairs of the District of Columbia and city of Washington has gone on in much the same way, except a change in the depositaries of power, and in the extent and number of powers conferred upon them. Legislative powers have now ceased, and the municipal government is confined to mere administration. The identity of corporate existence is continued, and all actions and suits for and against the District are preserved unaffected by the changes that have occurred.

In view of these laws, the counsel of the plaintiff contend that the government of the District of Columbia is a department of the United States government, and that the corporation is a mere name, and not a person in the sense of the law, distinct from the government itself. We cannot assent to this view. It is contrary to the express language of the statutes. That language is that the District shall "remain and continue a municipal corporation," with all rights of action and suits for and against it. If it were a department of the government, how could it be sued? Can the Treasury Department be sued? or any other department? We are of opinion that the corporate capacity and corporate liabilities of the District of Columbia remain as before, and that its character as a mere municipal corporation has not been changed. The mode of appointing its officers does not abrogate its character as a municipal body politic. We do not suppose that it is necessary to a municipal government, or to municipal responsibility, that the officers should be elected by the people. Local self-government is undoubtedly desirable where there are not forcible reasons against its exercise. But it is not required by any inexorable principle. All municipal governments are but agencies of the superior power of the state or government by which they are constituted, and are invested with only such subordinate powers of local legislation and control as the superior legislature sees fit to confer upon them. The form of those agencies and the mode of appointing officials to execute them are matters of legislative discretion. * * *

One argument of the plaintiff's counsel in this connection is, that the District of Columbia is a separate state or sovereignty according to the definition of writers on public law, being a distinct political society. This position is assented to by Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for this court, in the case of Hepburn v. Ellzey, 2 Cranch, 445, 452, where the question was whether a citizen of the District could sue in the circuit courts of the United States as a citizen of a state. The court did not deny that the District of Columbia is a state in the sense of being a distinct political community; but held that, the word "State" in the Constitution, where it extends the judicial power to cases between citizens of the several "States," refers to the States of the Union. It is undoubtedly true that the District of Columbia, is a separate political community in a certain sense, and in that sense may be called a state; but the sovereign power of this qualified state is not lodged in the corporation of the District of Columbia, but in the government of the United States. Its supreme legislative body is Congress. The subordinate legislative powers of a municipal character which have been or may be lodged in the city corporations, or in the District corporation, do not make those bodies sovereign. Crimes committed in the District are not crimes against the District, but against the United States. Therefore, whilst the District may, in a sense, be called a state, it is such in a very qualified sense. No more than this was meant by Chief Justice Taney, when, in the Bank of Alexandria v. Dyer, 14 Pet. 141, 146, he spoke of the District of Columbia as being formed, by the acts of Congress, into one separate political community, and of the two counties composing it (Washington and Alexandria) as resembling different counties in the same State; by reason whereof it was held that parties residing in one county could not be said to be "beyond the seas," or in a different jurisdiction, in reference to the other county, though the two counties were subject to different laws.

We are clearly of opinion that the plaintiff is a municipal corporation, having a right to sue and be sued, and subject to the ordinary rules that govern the law of procedure between private persons. * * *

It is scarcely necessary to discuss further the question of the applicability of the statute of limitations to a purely municipal corporation when it is embraced within the general terms of the law. It was expressly decided to be applicable in the cases of Kennebunkport v. Smith, 22 Maine, 445; Cincinnati v. First Presbyterian Church, 8 Ohio, 298; Cincinnati v. Evans, 5 Ohio St. 594; St. Charles County v. Powell, 22 Missouri, 525; Armstrong v. Dalton, 4 Devereux, (Law,) 568; and other cases cited in the notes to Wood on Limitations, § 53; and to 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 668, 3d ed. Judge Dillon, in the section last cited, accurately says: "The doctrine is well understood, that to the sovereign power the maxim, 'nullum tempus occurrit regi,' applies, and that the United States and the several states are not, without express words, bound by statutes of limitation. Although municipal corporations are considered as public agencies, exercising, in behalf of the state, public duties, there are many cases which hold that such corporations are not exempt from the operation of limitation statutes, but that such statutes, at least as respects all real and personal actions, run in favor of and against these corporations in the same manner and to the same extent as against natural persons."* * *

The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant on the demurrer to the pleas of the statute of limitations; and it is so ordered.[5]

[5] "Finally it is earnestly contended that the act is void because it subjects the residents of the District to taxation without representation. Residents of the District lack the suffrage and have politically no voice in the expenditure of the money raised by taxation. Money so raised is paid into the Treasury of the United States, where it is held not as a separate fund for the District, but subject to the disposal of Congress, like other revenues raised by Federal taxation. The objection that the tax is void because of these facts is fundamental and

COYLE v. SMITH, SECRETARY OF STATE OF STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

1911. Supreme Court of the United States. 221 U. S. 559.

[An Act of Congress of June 16, 1903, entitled, "An act to enable the people of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory to form a constitution and state government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original states" required that the capital of said State of Oklahoma should be temporarily located at Guthrie and should not be moved prior to 1913, and that in the interval the state should not appropriate any public money to erect buildings for capital purposes. The act also required that a constitutional convention held in the state should "by ordinance irrevocable, accept the terms and conditions of the act." A convention did so. In 1910 the legislature of the state passed a statute removing the capital from Guthrie to Oklahoma City and made appropriation for the erection of capital buildings. Another statute gave the Supreme Court of Oklahoma original jurisdiction of a taxpayer's bill to test the validity of the capital-removal statute. To review the judgment of that court sustaining the statute this writ of error was sued out.]

Mr. Justice Lurton delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

The power to locate its own seat of government and to determine when and how it shall be changed from one place to another, and to appropriate its own public funds for that purpose, are essentially and peculiarly state powers. That one of the original thirteen states could now be shorn of such powers by an act of Congress comprehensive. It is not limited in application to the tax on intangibles, but goes to the validity of all taxation of residents of the District. If sound, it would seem to apply not only to taxes levied upon residents of the District for the support of the government of the District, but also to those taxes which are levied upon them for the support generally of the government of the United States. It is sufficient to say that the objection is not sound. There is no constitutional provision which so limits the power of Congress that taxes can be imposed only upon those who have political representation. And the cases are many in which laws levying taxes for the support of the government of the District have been enforced during the period in which its residents have been without the right of suffrage." Brandeis, J., in Heald v. District of Columbia (1922) 259 U. S. 114, 124, 66 L. ed. 852, and see Marshall, C. J., in Loughborough v. Blake (1820) 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 317, 324, 5 L. ed. 98.

"Now, as a general proposition, it is clear that as a result of the relation which Porto Rico occupies to the United States all the local law of that island has its ultimate sanction in the lawful exercise by Congress of its legislative authority. So also, as Congress has provided that the local law, 'not inconsistent or in conflict with the statutory laws of the United States,' shall remain in force 'until altered, amended, or repealed by the legislative authority hereinafter provided for Porto Rico or by act of Congress of the United States,' it must follow that the local law of real property prevailing in the island is controlling until changed, as provided by Congress, * * * all the local law of Porto Rico is within the legislative control of Congress." White, J., in Romeu v. Todd (1907) 206 U. S. 358, 368-369, 370, 51 L. ed. 1093.

would not be for a moment entertained. The question then comes to this: Can a state be placed upon a plane of inequality with its sister states in the union if the Congress chooses to impose conditions which so operate, at the time of its admission? The argument is, that while Congress may not deprive a state of any power which it possesses, it may, as a condition to the admission of a new state, constitutionally restrict its authority, to the extent at least, of suspending its powers for a definite time in respect to the location of its seat of government. This contention is predicated upon the constitutional power of admitting new states to this union, and the constitutional duty of guaranteeing to "every state in this union a republican form of government." The position of counsel for the appellants is substantially this: That the power of Congress to admit new states and to determine whether or not its fundamental law is republican in form, are political powers, and as such, uncontrollable by the courts. That Congress may in the exercise of such power impose terms and conditions upon the admission of the proposed new state, which, if accepted, will be obligatory, although they operate to deprive the state of powers which it would otherwise possess, and, therefore, not admitted upon "an equal footing with the original states."

The power of Congress in respect to the admission of new states is found in the third section of the fourth Article of the Constitution. That provision is that, "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." The only expressed restriction upon this power is that no new state shall be formed within the jurisdiction of any other state, nor by the junction of two or more states, or parts of states, without the consent of such states, as well as of the Congress.

But what is this power? It is not to admit political organizations which are less or greater, or different in dignity or power, from those political entities which constitute the Union. It is, as strongly put by counsel, a "power to admit states."

The definition of "a state" is found in the powers possessed by the original states which adopted the Constitution, a definition emphasized by the terms employed in all subsequent acts of Congress admitting new states into the Union. The first two states admitted into the Union were the States of Vermont and Kentucky, one as of March 4, 1791, and the other as of June 1, 1792. No terms or conditions were exacted from either. Each act declares that the state is admitted "as a new and entire member of the United States of America." 1 Stat. 189, 191. Emphatic and significant as is the phrase admitted as "an entire member," even stronger was the declaration upon the admission in 1796 of Tennessee, as the third new state, it being declared to be "one of the United States of America," "on an equal footing with the original states in all respects whatsoever," phraseology which has ever since been substantially followed in admission acts, concluding with the Oklahoma act, which declares that Oklahoma shall be admitted "on an equal footing with the original states."

The power is to admit "new States into this Union."

"This Union" was and is a union of states, equal in power, dignity and authority, each competent to exert that residuum of sovereignty not delegated to the United States by the Constitution itself. To maintain otherwise would be to say that the union, through the power of Congress to admit new states, might come to be a union of States unequal in power, as including states whose powers were restricted only by the Constitution, with others whose powers had been further restricted by an act of Congress accepted as a condition of admission. Thus it would result, first, that the powers of Congress would not be defined by the Constitution alone, but in respect to new states, enlarged or restricted by the conditions imposed upon new states by its own legislation admitting them into the union; and, second, that such new states might not exercise all of the powers which had not been delegated by the Constitution, but only such as had not been further bargained away as conditions of admission. * * *

We come now to the question as to whether there is anything in the decisions of this court which sanctions the claims that Congress may by the imposition of conditions in an enabling act deprive a new state of any of those attributes essential to its equality in dignity and power with other states. In considering the decisions of this court bearing upon the question, we must distinguish, first, between provisions which are fulfilled by the admission of the state; second, between compacts or affirmative legislation intended to operate in futuro, which are within the scope of the conceded powers of Congress over the subject; and third, compacts or affirmative legislation which operates to restrict the powers of such new states in respect of matters which would otherwise be exclusively within the sphere of state power.

As to requirements in such enabling acts as relate only to the contents of the constitution for the proposed new state, little need to be said. The constitutional provision concerning the admission of new states is not a mandate, but a power to be exercised with discretion. From this alone it would follow that Congress may require, under penalty of denying admission, that the organic laws of a new state at the time of admission shall be such as to meet its approval. A constitution thus supervised by Congress would, after all, be a constitution of a state, and as such subject to alteration and amendment by the state after admission. Its force would be that of a state constitution, and not that of an act of Congress.

It may well happen that Congress should embrace in an enactment introducing a new state into the union legislation intended as a regulation of commerce among the states, .or with Indian tribes situated within the limits of such new state, or regulations touching the sole care and disposition of the public lands or reservations therein, which might be upheld as legislation within the sphere of the plain power of Congress. But in every such case such legislation would derive its force not from any agréement or compact with the proposed new state, nor by reason of its acceptance of such enactment as a term of admission, but solely because the power of Congress extended to the subject, and, therefore, would not operate to restrict the state's legislative power in respect of any matter which was not plainly within the regulating power of Congress. Williamette Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 125 U. S. 1, 9. Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, supra [3 How. 212].

No such question is presented here. The legislation in the Oklahoma enabling act relating to the location of the capital of the state, if construed as forbidding a removal by the state after its admission as a state, is referable to no power granted to Congress over the subject, and if it is to be upheld at all, it must be implied from the power to admit new states. If power to impose such a restriction upon the general and undelegated power of a state be conceded as implied from the power to admit a new state, where is the line to be drawn against restrictions imposed upon new states. The insistence finds no support in the decisions of this court. * * *

Has Oklahoma been admitted upon an equal footing with the original states? If she has, she by virtue of her jurisdictional sovereignty as such a state may determine for her own people the proper location of the local seat of government. She is not equal in power to them if she cannot. * * *[6]

The constitutional equality of the states is essential to the harmonious operation of the scheme upon which the republic was organized. When that equality disappears we may remain a free people, but the Union will not be the Union of the Constitution.

[6] As a matter both of concepts and of expressions, what is meant in this paragraph by "she," "her jurisdictional sovereignty," "state," and "her own people"? Does the case hold that the residents of Oklahoma have the same scope of local autonomy as have the residents of New York, any attempt of Congress to establish differences being inoperative? Do the residents of a Territory necessarily gain or lose in the extent of their control of local affairs by "admission into the Union"? In what respect does their political condition change upon "admission"? What is the "Union"? How does it differ from the "United States"? In how many and what senses is the expression "United States" used in the Constitution? Chief Justice Marshall pointed out one very common usage, "Does this term designate the whole, or any particular portion of the American empire? * * * It is the name given to our great republic which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania." Loughborough v. Blake (1820) 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 317, 319, 5 L. ed. 98.

KOHL et al. v. UNITED STATES.

1875. Supreme Court of the United States. 91 U. S. 367.

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

This was a proceeding instituted by the United States to appropriate a parcel of land in the city of Cincinnati as a site for a post-office and other public uses.

The plaintiffs in error owned a perpetual leasehold estate in a portion of the property sought to be appropriated. They moved to dismiss the proceeding on the ground of want of jurisdiction; which motion was overruled. * * * Judgment was rendered in favor of the United States. * * *

Mr. Justice Strong delivered the opinion of the court.

It has not been seriously contended during the argument that the United States government is without power to appropriate lands or other property within the states for its own uses, and to enable it to perform its proper functions. Such an authority is essential to its independent existence and perpetuity. These cannot be preserved if the obstinacy of a private person, or if any other authority, can prevent the acquisition of the means or instruments by which alone governmental functions can be performed. The powers vested by the Constitution in the general government demand for their exercise the acquisition of lands in all the states. These are needed for forts, armories, and arsenals, for navy-yards and light-houses, for custom-houses, post-offices, and court-houses, and for other public uses. If the right to acquire property for such uses may be made a barren right by the unwillingness of property-holders to sell, or by the action of a state prohibiting a sale to the federal government, the constitutional grants of power may be rendered nugatory, and the government is dependent for its practical existence upon the will of a state, or even upon that of a private citizen. This cannot be. No one doubts the existence in the state governments of the right of eminent domain,—a right distinct from and paramount to the right of ultimate ownership. It grows out of the necessities of their being, not out of the tenure by which lands are held. It may be exercised, though the lands are not held by grant from the government, either mediately or immediately, and independent of the consideration whether they would escheat to the government in case of a failure of heirs. The right is the offspring of political necessity; and it is inseparable from sovereignty, unless denied to it by its fundamental law. Vattel, c. 20, 34; Bynk., lib. 2, c. 15; Kent's Com. 338-340; Cooley on Const. Lim. 584 et seq. But it is no more necessary for the exercise of the powers of a state government than it is for the exercise of the conceded powers of the federal government. That government is as sovereign within its sphere as the states are within theirs. True, its sphere is limited. Certain subjects only are committed to it; but its power over those subjects is as full and complete as is the power of the states over the subjects to which their sovereignty extends. The power is not changed by its transfer to another holder.

But, if the right of eminent domain exists in the federal government, it is a right which may be exercised within the states, so far as is necessary to the enjoyment of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution. In Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. 523, Chief Justice Taney described in plain language the complex nature of our government, and the existence of two distinct and separate sovereignties within the same territorial space, each of them restricted in its powers, and each, within its sphere of action prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, independent of the other. Neither is under the necessity of applying to the other for permission to exercise its lawful powers. Within its own sphere, it may employ all the agencies for exerting them which are appropriate or necessary, and which are not forbidden by the law of its being. When the power to establish post-offices and to create courts within the states was conferred upon the federal government, included in it was authority to obtain sites for such offices and for court-houses, and to obtain them by such means as were known and appropriate. The right of eminent domain was one of those means well known when the Constitution was adopted, and employed to obtain lands for public uses. Its existence, therefore, in the grantee of that power, ought not to be questioned. The Constitution itself contains an implied recognition of it beyond what may justly be implied from the express grants. The fifth amendment contains a provision that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. What is that but an implied assertion, that, on making just compensation, it may be taken? * * *

It is true, this power of the federal government has not heretofore been exercised adversely; but the non-user of a power does not disprove its existence. In some instances, the states, by virtue of their own right of eminent domain, have condemned lands for the use of the general government, and such condemnations have been sustained by their courts, without, however, denying the right of the United States to act independently of the states. Such was the ruling in Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal. 229, where lands were condemned by a proceeding in a state court and under a state law for a United States fortification. A similar decision was made in Burt v. The Merchants' Ins. Co., 106 Mass. 356, where land was taken under a state law as a site for a post-office and subtreasury building. Neither of these cases denies the right of the federal government to have lands in the states condemned for its uses under its own power and by its own actions. The question was, whether the state could take lands for any other public use than that of the state. In Trombley v. Humphrey, 23 Mich. 471, a different doctrine was asserted, founded, we think, upon better reason. The proper view of the right of eminent domain seems to be, that it is a right belonging to a sovereignty to take private property for its own public uses, and not for those of another. Beyond that, there exists no necessity; which alone is the foundation of the right. If the United States have the power, it must be complete in itself. It can neither be enlarged nor diminished by a state. Nor can any state prescribe the manner in which it must be exercised. The consent of a state can never be a condition precedent to its enjoyment. Such consent is needed only, if at all, for the transfer of jurisdiction and of the right of exclusive legislation after the land shall have been acquired.

It may, therefore, fairly be concluded that the proceeding in the case we have in hand was a proceeding by the United States government in its own right, and by virtue of its own eminent domain. The act of Congress of March 2, 1872, 17 Stat. 39, gave authority to the Secretary of the Treasurer to purchase a central and suitable site in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, for the erection of a building for the accommodation of the United States courts, custom-house, United States depository, post-office, internal-revenue and pension offices, at a cost not exceeding $300,000; and a proviso to the act declared that no money should be expended in the purchase until the State of Ohio should cede its jurisdiction over the site, and relinquish to the United States the right to tax the property. The authority here given was to purchase. If that were all, it might be doubted whether the right of eminent domain was intended to be invoked. It is true, the words "to purchase" might be construed as including the power to acquire by condemnation; for, technically, purchase includes all modes of acquisition other than that of descent. But generally, in statutes as in common use, the word is employed in a sense not technical, only as meaning acquisition by contract between the parties, without governmental interference. That Congress intended more than this is evident, however, in view of the subsequent and amendatory act passed June 10, 1872, which made an appropriation "for the purchase at private sale or by condemnation of the ground for a site" for the building.

These provisions, connected as they are, manifest a clear intention to confer upon the Secretary of the Treasury power to acquire the grounds needed by the exercise of the national right of eminent domain, or by private purchase, at his discretion. Why speak of condemnation at all, if Congress had not in view an exercise of the right of eminent domain, and did not intend to confer upon the secretary the right to invoke it?

But it is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs in error that the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction of the proceeding. There is nothing in the acts of 1872, it is true, that directs the process by which the contemplated condemnation should be effected, or which expressly authorizes a proceeding in the Circuit Court to secure it. Doubtless Congress might have provided a mode of taking the land, and determining the compensation to be made, which would have been exclusive of all other modes. They might have prescribed in what tribunal or by what agents the taking and the ascertainment of the just compensation should be accomplished. The mode might have been by a commission, or it might have been referred expressly to the Circuit Court; but this, we think, was not necessary. The investment of the Secretary of the Treasury with power to obtain the land by condemnation, without prescribing the mode of exercising the power, gave him also the power to obtain it by any means that were competent to adjudge a condemnation. The Judiciary Act of 1789 conferred upon the circuit courts of the ~~United States~~ jurisdiction of all suits at common law or in ~~equity~~, when the United States, or any officer thereof, suing under the authority of any act of Congress, are plaintiffs. If, then, a proceeding to take land for public uses by condemnation may be a suit at common law, jurisdiction of it is vested in the Circuit Court. That it is a "suit" admits of no question. * * *

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

JOHNSON v. STATE OF MARYLAND.

1920. Supreme Court of the United States. 254 U. S. 51.

This was a prosecution based on § 143 of Art. 56 of the Code of Public General Laws of Maryland, as amended by c. 85, Acts of 1918. The opinion states the case.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff in error was an employee of the Post Office Department of the United States and while driving a government motor truck in the transportation of mail over a post road from Mt. Airy, Maryland, to Washington, was arrested in Maryland, and was tried, convicted and fined for so driving without having obtained a license from the state. He saved his constitutional rights by motion to quash, by special pleas which were overruled upon demurrer and by motion in arrest of judgment. The facts were admitted and the naked question is whether the state has power to require such an employee to obtain a license by submitting to an examination concerning his competence and paying three dollars, before performing his official duty in obedience to superior command.

The cases upon the regulation of interstate commerce can not be relied upon as furnishing an answer. They deal with the conduct of private persons in matters in which the states as well as the general government have an interest and which would be wholly under the control of the states but for the supervening destination and the ultimate purpose of the acts. Here the question is whether the state can interrupt the acts of the general government itself. With regard to taxation, no matter how reasonable, or how universal and undiscriminating, the state's inability to interfere has been regarded as established since McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316. The decision in that case was not put upon any consideration of degree but upon the entire absence of power on the part of the states to touch, in that way at least, the instrumentalities of the United States; 4 Wheat. 429, 430; and that is the law today. Farmers & Mechanics Savings Bank v. Minnesota, 232 U. S. 516, 525, 526. A little later the scope of the proposition as then understood was indicated in Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 867. "Can a contractor for supplying a military post with provisions, be restrained from making purchases within any state, or from transporting the provisions to the place at which the troops were stationed? or could he be fined or taxed for doing so? We have not yet heard these questions answered in the affirmative." In more recent days the principle was applied when the governor of a soldiers' home was convicted for disregard of a state law concerning the use of oleomargarine, while furnishing it to the inmates of the home as part of their rations. It was said that the federal officer was not "subject to the jurisdiction of the State in regard to those very matters of administration which are thus approved by federal authority." Ohio v. Thomas, 173 U. S. 276, 283. It seems to us that the foregoing decisions establish the law governing this case.

Of course an employee of the United States does not secure a general immunity from state law while acting in the course of his employment. That was decided long ago by Mr. Justice Washington in United States v. Hart, Pet. C. C. 390. 5 Ops. Atty. Gen. 554. It very well may be that, when the United States has not spoken, the subjection to local law would extend to general rules that might effect incidentally the mode of carrying out the employment—as, for instance, a statute or ordinance regulating the mode of turning at the corners of streets. Commonwealth v. Closson, 229 Massachusetts, 329. This might stand on much the same footing as liability under the common law of a state to a person injured by the driver's negligence. But even the most unquestionable and most universally applicable of state laws, such as those concerning murder, will not be allowed to control the conduct of a marshal of the United States acting under and in pursuance of the laws of the United States. In re Neagle, 135 U. S. 1.

It seems to us that the immunity of the instruments of the United States from state control in the performance of their duties extends to a requirement that they desist from performance until they satisfy a state officer upon examination that they are competent for a necessary part of them and pay a fee for permission to go on. Such a requirement does not merely touch the Government servants remotely by a general rule of conduct; it lays hold of them in their specific attempt to obey orders and requires qualifications in addition to those that the Government has pronounced sufficient. It is the duty of the Department to employ persons competent for their work and that duty it must be presumed has been performed. Keim v. United States, 177 U. S. 290, 293.

Judgment reversed.[7]

Error to the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts; the case being thus: * * *

[7] "The most important agents of the federal government are its officers, but no one will contend that when a man becomes an officer of the government he ceases to be subject to the laws of the state. The principle we are discussing has its limitation, a limitation growing out of the necessity on which the principle itself is founded. That limitation is, that the agencies of the federal government are only exempted from state legislation, so far as that legislation may interfere with, or impair their efficiency in performing the functions by which they are designed to serve that government. Any other rule would convert a principle founded alone in the necessity of securing to the government of the United States the means of exercising its legitimate powers, into an unauthorized and unjustifiable invasion of the rights of the states. The salary of a federal officer may not be taxed; he may be exempted from any personal service which interferes with the discharge of his official duties, because those exemptions are essential to enable him to perform those duties. But he is subject to all the laws of the state which affect his family or social relations, or his property, and he is liable to punishment for crime, though that punishment be imprisonment or death." Miller, J., in National Bank v. Commonwealth (1869) 9 Wall. (U. S.) 353, 361-362, 19 L. ed. 701.

Congress by certain statutes passed in 1864, '5, '6, and '7, enacted that

> "There shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income of every person residing in the United States, * * * whether derived from any kind of property, rents, interest, dividends, or salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment or vocation, carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any other source whatever, a tax of 5 per centum on the amount so derived, over $1000."

Under these statutes, one Buffington, collector of the internal revenue of the United States for the district, assessed the sum of $61.50 upon the salary, in the years 1866 and 1867, of J. M. Day, as judge of the Court of Probate and Insolvency for the County of Barnstable, State of Massachusetts. The salary was fixed by law, and payable out of the treasury of the state. Day paid the tax under protest, and brought the action below to recover it. The case was submitted to the court below on an agreed statement of facts, upon which judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. * * *

MR. JUSTICE NELSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The case presented the question whether or not it is competent for congress, under the Constitution of the United States, to impose a tax upon the salary of a judicial officer of a state?

In Dobbins v. The Commissioner of Erie County, 16 Pet. 435, it was decided that it was not competent for the legislature of a state to levy a tax upon the salary or emoluments of an officer of the United States. The decision was placed mainly upon the ground that the officer was a means or instrumentality employed for carrying into effect some of the legitimate powers of the government, which could not be interfered with by taxation or otherwise by the states, and that the salary or compensation for the service of the officer was inseparably connected with the office; that if the officer, as such, was exempt, the salary assigned for his support or maintenance while holding the office was also, for like reasons, equally exempt.

The cases of McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 615, and Weston v. Charleston, 2 Pet. 449, were referred to as settling the principle that governed the case, namely, "that the state governments cannot lay a tax upon the constitutional means employed by the government of the Union to execute its constitutional powers."

The soundness of this principle is happily illustrated by the Chief Justice in McCulloch v. Maryland. "If the states," he observes, "may tax one instrument employed by the government in the execution of its powers, they may tax any and every other instrument. They may tax the mail; they may tax the mint; they may tax patent-rights; they may tax judicial process; they may tax all the means employed by the government to an excess which would defeat all the ends of government." "This," he observes, "was not intended by the American people. They did not design to make their government dependent on the states." p. 432. Again, "That the power of taxing it (the bank) by the states may be exercised so far as to destroy it, is too obvious to be denied." ib. p. 427. And, in Weston v. The City of Charleston, he observes: "If the right to impose the tax exists, it is a right which, in its nature, acknowledges no limits. It may be carried to any extent within the jurisdiction of the state or corporation which imposes it which the will of each state and corporation may prescribe." 2 Pet. 466.

It is conceded in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, that the power of taxation by the states was not abridged by the grant of a similar power to the government of the Union; that it was retained by the states, and that the power is to be concurrently exercised by the two governments; and also that there is no express constitutional prohibition upon the states against taxing the means or instrumentalities of the general government. But, it was held, and, we agree properly held, to be prohibited by necessary implication; otherwise, the states might impose taxation to an extent that would impair, if not wholly defeat, the operations of the federal authorities when acting in their appropriate sphere.

These views, we think, abundantly establish the soundness of the decision of the case of Dobbins v. The Commissioners of Erie, which determined that the states were prohibited, upon a proper construction of the Constitution, from taxing the salary or emoluments of an officer of the government of the United States. And we shall now proceed to show that upon the same construction of that instrument, and for like reasons, that government is prohibited from taxing the salary of the judicial officer of a state.

It is a familiar rule of construction of the Constitution of the Union, that the sovereign powers vested in the state governments by their respective constitutions, remained unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they were granted to the government of the United States. That the intention of the framers of the Constitution in this respect might not be misunderstood, this rule of interpretation is expressly declared in the tenth article of the amendments, namely: "The powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the States respectively, or, to the people." The government of the United States, therefore, can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication.

The general government, and the states, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other, within their respective spheres. The former in its appropriate sphere is supreme; but the states within the limits of their powers not granted, or, in the language of the tenth amendment, "reserved," are as independent of the general government as that government within its sphere is independent of the states. * * *

Upon looking into the Constitution it will be found that but a few of the articles in that instrument could be carried into practical effect without the existence of the states. * * * Such being the separate and independent condition of the states in our complex system, as recognized by the Constitution, and the existence of which is so indispensable, that, without them, the general government itself would disappear from the family of nations, it would seem to follow, as a reasonable, if not a necessary consequence, that the means and instrumentalities employed for carrying on the operations of their governments, for preserving their existence, and fulfilling the high and responsible duties assigned to them in the Constitution, should be left free and unimpaired, should not be liable to be crippled, much less defeated by the taxing power of another government, which power acknowledges no limits but the will of the legislative body imposing the tax. And, more especially, those means and instrumentalities which are the creation of their sovereign and reserved rights, one of which is the establishment of the judicial department, and the appointment of officers to administer their laws. Without this power, and the exercise of it, we risk nothing in saying that no one of the States under the form of government guaranteed by the Constitution could long preserve its existence. A despotic government might. * * *

The supremacy of the general government, therefore, so much relied on in the argument of the counsel for the plaintiff in error, in respect to the question before us, cannot be maintained. The two governments are upon an equality, and the question is whether the power "to lay and collect taxes" enables the general government to tax the salary of a judicial officer of the state, which officer is a means or instrumentality employed to carry into execution one of its most important functions, the administration of the laws, and which concerns the exercise of a right reserved to the states? * * *

It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the general government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the states, nor is there any prohibiting the states from taxing the means and instrumentalities of that government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication, and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation; as any government, whose means employed in conducting its operations, if subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government.

Judgment Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY, dissenting.

I dissent from the opinion of the court in this case, because, it seems to me that the general government has the same power of taxing the income of officers of the state governments as it has of taxing that of its own officers. It is the common government of all alike; and every citizen is presumed to trust his own government in the matter of taxation. No man ceases to be a citizen of the United States by being an officer under the state government. I cannot accede to the doctrine that the general government is to be regarded as in any sense foreign or antagonistic to the state governments, their officers, or people; nor can I agree that a presumption can be admitted that the general government will act in a manner hostile to the existence or functions of the state governments, which are constituent parts of the system or body politic forming the basis on which the general government is founded. The taxation by the state governments of the instruments employed by the general government in the exercise of its powers, is a very different thing. Such taxation involves an interference with the powers of a government in which other states and their citizens are equally interested with the state which imposes the taxation. In my judgment, the limitation of the power of taxation in the general government, which the present decision establishes, will be found very difficult of control. Where are we to stop in enumerating the functions of the state governments which will be interfered with by federal taxation? If a state incorporates a railroad to carry out its purposes of internal improvement, or a bank to aid its financial arrangements, reserving, perhaps, a percentage on the stock or profits, for the supply of its own treasury, will the bonds or stock of such an institution be free from federal taxation? How can we now tell what the effect of this decision will be? I cannot but regard it as founded on a fallacy, and that it will lead to mischievous consequences. I am as much opposed as any one can be to any interference by the general government with the just powers of the state governments. But no concession of any of the just powers of the general government can easily be recalled. I, therefore, consider it my duty to at least record my dissent when such concession appears to be made. An extended discussion of the subject would answer no useful purpose.[8]

TARBLE'S CASE.

1871. Supreme Court of the United States. 13 Wall. 397.

Error to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin.

This was a proceeding on habeas corpus for the discharge of one

---

[8] Further working out of the doctrine of this case is postponed to the Chapter on Taxation. Its holding has never been disturbed.

Edward Tarble, held in the custody of a recruiting officer of the United States as an enlisted soldier, on the alleged ground that he was a minor, under the age of eighteen years at the time of his enlistment, and that he enlisted without the consent of his father.

The writ was issued on the 10th of August, 1869, by a court commissioner of Dane County, Wisconsin, an officer authorized by the laws of that state to issue the writ of habeas corpus upon the petition of parties imprisoned or restrained of their liberty, or of persons on their behalf. * * *

The commissioner, after argument, held that the prisoner was illegally imprisoned and detained by Lieutenant Stone, and commanded that officer forthwith to discharge him from custody.

Afterwards, in September of the same year, that officer applied to the supreme court of the state for a certiorari, setting forth in his application the proceedings before the commissioner and his ruling thereon. * * *

Upon these proceedings the case was duly argued before the supreme court, and in April, 1870, that tribunal pronounced its judgment, affirming the order of the commissioner discharging the prisoner. This judgment was now before this court for examination on writ of error prosecuted by the United States. * * *.

Mr. Justice Field, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

It is in the consideration of this distinct and independent character of the government of the United States, from that of the government of the several states, that the solution of the question presented in this case, and in similar cases, must be found. There are within the territorial limits of each state two governments, restricted in their spheres of action, but independent of each other, and supreme within their respective spheres. Each has its separate departments; each has its distinct laws, and each has its own tribunals for their enforcement. Neither government can intrude within the jurisdiction, or authorize any interference therein by its judicial officers with the action of the other. The two governments in each state stand in their respective spheres of action in the same independent relation to each other, except in one particular, that they would if their authority embraced distinct territories. That particular consists in the supremacy of the authority of the United States when any conflict arises between the two governments. The Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance of it, are declared by the Constitution itself to be the supreme law of the land, and the judges of every state are bound thereby, "anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." Whenever, therefore, any conflict arises between the enactments of the two sovereignties, or in the enforcement of their asserted authorities, those of the national government must have supremacy until the validity of the different enactments and authorities can be finally determined by the tribunals of the United States. This temporary supremacy until judicial decision by the national tribunals, and the ultimate determination of the conflict by such decision, are essential to the preservation of order and peace, and the avoidance of forcible collision between the two governments. "The Constitution," as said by Mr. Chief Justice Taney, "was not framed merely to guard the states against danger from abroad, but chiefly to secure union and harmony at home; and to accomplish this end it was deemed necessary, when the Constitution was framed, that many of the rights of sovereignty which the states then possessed should be ceded to the general government; and that in the sphere of action assigned to it, it should be supreme and strong enough to execute its own laws by its own tribunals, without interruption from a state, or from state authorities." And the judicial power conferred extends to all cases arising under the Constitution, and thus embraces every legislative act of Congress, whether passed in pursuance of it, or in disregard of its provisions. The Constitution is under the view of the tribunals of the United States when any act of Congress is brought before them for consideration.

Now, among the powers assigned to the national government, is the power "to raise and support armies," and the power "to provide for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." The execution of these powers falls within the line of its duties; and its control over the subject is plenary and exclusive. It can determine, without question from any state authority, how the armies shall be raised, whether by voluntary enlistment or forced draft, the age at which the soldier shall be received, and the period for which he shall be taken, the compensation he shall be allowed, and the service to which he shall be assigned. And it can provide the rules for the government and regulation of the forces after they are raised, define what shall constitute military offences, and prescribe their punishment. No interference with the execution of this power of the national government in the formation, organization, and government of its armies by any state officials could be permitted without greatly impairing the efficiency, if it did not utterly destroy, this branch of the public service. * * * It is manifest that the powers of the national government could not be exercised with energy and efficiency at all times, if its acts could be interfered with and controlled for any period by officers or tribunals of another sovereignty.

It is true similar embarrassment might sometimes be occasioned, though in a less degree, by the exercise of the authority to issue the writ possessed by judicial officers of the United States, but the ability to provide a speedy remedy for any inconvenience following from this source would always exist with the national legislature.

State judges and state courts, authorized by laws of their states to issue writs of habeas corpus, have undoubtedly a right to issue the writ in any case where a party is alleged to be illegally confined within their limits, unless it appear upon his application that he is confined under the authority, or claim and color of the authority, of the United States, by an officer of that government. If such fact appear upon the application the writ should be refused. If it do not appear, the judge or court issuing the writ has a right to inquire into the cause of imprisonment, and ascertain by what authority the person is held within the limits of the state; and it is the duty of the marshal, or other officer having the custody of the prisoner, to give, by a proper return, information in this respect. His return should be sufficient, in its detail of facts, to show distinctly that the imprisonment is under the authority, or claim and color of the authority, of the United States, and to exclude the suspicion of imposition or oppression on his part. And the process or orders, under which the prisoner is held, should be produced with the return and submitted to inspection, in order that the court or judge issuing the writ may see that the prisoner is held by the officer, in good faith, under the authority, or claim and color of the authority, of the United States, and not under the mere pretence of having such authority.

This right to inquire by process of habeas corpus, and the duty of the officer to make a return, "grows necessarily," says Mr. Chief Justice Taney, "out of the complex character of our government and the existence of two distinct and separate sovereignties within the same territorial space, each of them restricted in its power, and each within its sphere of action, prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, independent of the other. But, after the return is made, and the state judge or court judicially apprised that the party is in custody under the authority of the United States, they can proceed no further. They then know that the prisoner is within the dominion and jurisdiction of another government, and that neither the writ of habeas corpus nor any other process issued under state authority can pass over the line of division between the two sovereignties. He is then within the dominion and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. If he has committed an offence against their laws, their tribunals alone can punish him. If he is wrongfully imprisoned, their judicial tribunals can release him and afford him redress." * * *

PONZI v. FESSENDEN.

[For violation of a federal statute Ponzi had been convicted in the United States District Court and sentenced to five years' imprisonment in a Massachusetts penitentiary. Before his term expired the Superior Court of Massachusetts issued a writ of habeas corpus directing the warden to bring Ponzi before that court to answer to an indictment for violation of state law. The warden made return that he held Ponzi in pursuance of process of the United States and prayed that the writ be dismissed. The Attorney General of the United States then directed the warden to comply with the writ. He did so. Ponzi refused to plead. A plea of not guilty was entered. Thereupon Ponzi applied to a United States District Court for habeas corpus. His petition was denied. He appealed to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals which certified a question to the Supreme Court, in effect whether in this manner the state court could acquire jurisdiction over Ponzi to try him.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE TAFT delivered the opinion of the court.

We live in the jurisdiction of two sovereignties, each having its own system of courts to declare and enforce its laws in common territory. It would be impossible for such courts to fulfil their respective functions without embarrassing conflict unless rules were adopted by them to avoid it. The people for whose benefit these two systems are maintained are deeply interested that each system shall be effective and unhindered in its vindication of its laws. The situation requires, therefore, not only definite rules fixing the powers of the courts in cases of jurisdiction over the same persons and things in actual litigation, but also a spirit of reciprocal comity and mutual assistance to promote due and orderly procedure.

One accused of crime has a right to a full and fair trial according to the law of the government whose sovereignty he is alleged to have offended, but he has no more than that. He should not be permitted to use the machinery of one sovereignty to obstruct his trial in the courts of the other, unless the necessary operation of such machinery prevents his having a fair trial. He may not complain if one sovereignty waives its strict right to exclusive custody of him for vindication of its laws in order that the other may also subject him to conviction of crime against it. In re Andrews, 236 Fed. 300; United States v. Marrin, 227 Fed. 314. Such a waiver is a matter that addresses itself solely to the discretion of the sovereignty making it and of its representatives with power to grant it.

One accused of crime, of course, can not be in two places at the same time. He is entitled to be present at every stage of the trial of himself in each jurisdiction with full opportunity for defense. Frank v. Mangum, 237 U. S. 309, 341; Lewis v. United States, 146 U. S. 370. If that is accorded him, he can not complain. The fact that he may have committed two crimes gives him no immunity from prosecution of either.

The chief rule which preserves our two systems of courts from actual conflict of jurisdiction is that the court which first takes the subject-matter of the litigation into its control, whether this be person or property, must be permitted to exhaust its remedy, to attain which it assumed control, before the other court shall attempt to take it for its purpose. The principle is stated by Mr. Justice Matthews in Covell v. Heyman, 111 U. S. 176, as follows:

"The forbearance which courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, administered under a single system, exercise towards each other, whereby conflicts are avoided, by avoiding interference with the process of each other, is a principle of comity, with perhaps no higher sanction than the utility which comes from concord; but between state courts and those of the United States, it is something more. It is a principle of right and of law, and therefore, of necessity. It leaves nothing to discretion or mere convenience. These courts do not belong to the same system, so far as their jurisdiction is concurrent; and although they co-exist in the same space, they are independent, and have no common superior. They exercise jurisdiction, it is true, within the same territory, but not in the same plane; and when one takes into its jurisdiction a specific thing, that res is as much withdrawn from the judicial power of the other, as if it had been carried physically into a different territorial sovereignty."

The Heyman Case concerned property, but the same principle applies to jurisdiction over persons as is shown by the great judgment of Chief Justice Taney in Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. 506, quoted from, and relied upon, in Covell v. Heyman.

In the case at bar, the Federal District Court first took custody of Ponzi. He pleaded guilty, was sentenced to imprisonment and was detained under United States authority to suffer the punishment imposed. Until the end of his term and his discharge, no state court could assume control of his body without the consent of the United States. Under statutes permitting it, he might have been taken under the writ of habeas corpus to give evidence in a federal court, or to be tried there if in the same district, § 753, Rev. Stats., or be removed by order of a federal court to be tried in another district, § 1014, Rev. Stats., without violating the order of commitment made by the sentencing court. Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch, 75, 98; Ex parte Lamar, 274 Fed. 160, 164. This is with the authority of the same sovereign which committed him.

There is no express authority authorizing the transfer of a federal prisoner to a state court for such purposes. Yet we have no doubt that it exists and is to be exercised with the consent of the attorney general. In that officer, the power and discretion to practice the comity in such matters between the federal and state courts is vested. The attorney general is the head of the Department of Justice. Rev. Stats., § 346. He is the hand of the president in taking care that the laws of the United States in protection of the interests of the United States in legal proceedings and in the prosecution of offences, be faithfully executed. [References to statutes conferring powers on the attorney general with regard to supervision and regulation of the custody of federal prisoners are omitted.]

But it is argued that when the prisoner is produced in the Superior Court, he is still in the custody and jurisdiction of the United States, and that the state court can not try one not within its jurisdiction. This is a refinement which if entertained would merely obstruct justice. The prisoner when produced in the Superior Court in compliance with its writ is personally present. He has full opportunity to make his defense exactly as if he were brought before the court by its own officer. State v. Wilson, 38 Conn. 126, 136. The trial court is given all the jurisdiction needed to try and hear him by the consent of the United States, which only insists on his being kept safely from escape or from danger under the eye and control of its officer. This arrangement of comity between the two governments works in no way to the prejudice of the prisoner or of either sovereignty.

The question must be answered in the affirmative.

Section 4.—Powers of Congress in the Dual Government Area.

M'CULLOCH v. THE STATE OF MARYLAND ET AL.

1819. Supreme Court of the United States. 4 Wheat. 316.

[Congress by act[1] of April 10, 1816 incorporated "the subscribers to the Bank of the United States" and pursuant to its charter the corporation established a branch bank in Baltimore which issued bank notes, accepted private deposits, discounted promissory notes and carried on all the usual transactions of a local bank operated for the profit of its shareholders. On February 11, 1818 the general assembly of Maryland enacted a statute to impose a tax on all banks or branches thereof in the State of Maryland not chartered by it. This was an action of debt brought on behalf of the state in the county court of Baltimore County against M'Culloch as cashier of the branch bank to recover a penalty for carrying on the branch without paying the tax. The case came to the Supreme Court on writ of error to the Court of Appeals of Maryland.]

[1] The act of Congress authorized a capital of $35,000,000, 350,000 shares of $100 each, 70,000 shares to be taken by the United States and 280,000 by private subscribers, the latter payable partly in gold and silver coin and partly in United States securities. The subscribers were incorporated for a period of 20 years. Twenty of the 25 directors were to be elected annually by the shareholders and 5 to be appointed from among the shareholders by the president of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the senate, the directors to elect the president of the bank. "No loan shall be made" to the government "to an amount exceeding $500,000." Shares of stock were declared freely transferable. It was made obligatory upon the directors to establish a branch

Webster and Pinkney, for the plaintiff in error.

Hopkinson, Jones, and Martin, for the defendant.

The Attorney-General was also heard for the plaintiff, by reason of the interest of the United States.

MARSHALL, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court.

In the case now to be determined, the defendant, a sovereign state, denies the obligation of a law enacted by the legislature of the union; and the plaintiff, on his part, contests the validity of an act which has been passed by the legislature of that state. The Constitution of our country, in its most interesting and vital parts, is to be considered; the conflicting powers of the government of the union and of its members, as marked in that Constitution, are to be discussed; and an opinion given, which may essentially influence the great operations of the government. No tribunal can approach such a question without a deep sense of its importance, and of the awful responsibility involved in its decision. But it must be decided peacefully, or remain a source of hostile legislation, perhaps of hostility of a still more serious nature; and if it is to be so decided, by this tribunal alone can the decision be made.

in any state in which 2,000 shares were subscribed for, upon application by the legislature of that state, but the directors were authorized to establish branches wherever they wished without any request. The bank might issue notes in denominations not less than $5, which should be receivable for all payments to the United States unless Congress should later otherwise direct. Statements of the financial condition of the bank were to be furnished to the head of the Treasury Department as often as he might require, and the latter might inspect the bank (not including customers' accounts). The only special provisions for use to be made of the bank in the fiscal affairs of the government were (1) that the "said corporation shall give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States or the territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charging commissions or claiming allowance on account of difference of exchange" and (2) that deposits of the money of the United States should be made in the bank and its branches unless the Secretary of the Treasury should direct otherwise, in which case he should report his action to the Congress. In consideration of the payment of $1,500,000 to the United States in three instalments, the act pledged the faith of the United States to establish no other bank during the chartered period. The government also specifically reserved a privilege of inspection by committees of Congress and by judicial proceedings to forfeit the charter for violations.

On the Supreme Court of the United States has the Constitution of our country devolved this important duty.

The first question made in the cause is, has Congress power to incorporate a bank?

It has been truly said, that this can scarcely be considered as an open question, entirely unprejudiced by the former proceedings of the nation respecting it. The principle now contested was introduced at a very early period of our history, has been recognized by many successive legislatures, and has been acted upon by the judicial department, in cases of peculiar delicacy, as a law of undoubted obligation.

It will not be denied, that a bold and daring usurpation might be resisted, after an acquiescence still longer and more complete than this. But it is conceived that a doubtful question, one on which human reason may pause, and the human judgment be suspended, in the decision of which the great principles of liberty are not concerned, but the respective powers of those who are equally the representatives of the people, are to be adjusted, if not put at rest by the practice of the government, ought to receive a considerable impression from that practice. An exposition of the Constitution, deliberately established by legislative acts, on the faith of which an immense property has been advanced, ought not to be lightly disregarded.

The power now contested was exercised by the first Congress elected under the present Constitution. The bill for incorporating the Bank of the United States did not steal upon an unsuspecting legislature, and pass unobserved. Its principle was completely understood, and was opposed with equal zeal and ability. After being resisted, first in the fair and open field of debate, and afterwards in the executive cabinet, with as much persevering talent as any measure has ever experienced, and being supported by arguments which convinced minds as pure and as intelligent as this country can boast, it became a law. The original act was permitted to expire; but a short experience of the embarrassments to which the refusal to revive it exposed the government, convinced those who were most prejudiced against the measure of its necessity, and induced the passage of the present law. It would require no ordinary share of intrepidity to assert, that a measure adopted under these circumstances, was a bold and plain usurpation, to which the Constitution gave no countenance.

These observations belong to the cause; but they are not made under the impression that, were the question entirely new, the law would be found irreconcilable with the Constitution.

In discussing this question, the counsel for the State of Maryland have deemed it of some importance, in the construction of the Constitution, to consider that instrument not as emanating from the people, but as the act of sovereign and independent states. The powers of the general government, it has been said, are delegated by the states, who alone are truly sovereign; and must be exercised in subordination to the states, who alone possess supreme dominion.

It would be difficult to sustain this proposition. The convention which framed the Constitution was, indeed, elected by the state legislatures. But the instrument, when it came from their hands, was a mere proposal, without obligation, or pretensions to it. It was reported to the then existing Congress of the United States, with a request that it might "be submitted to a convention of delegates, chosen in each state, by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its legislature, for their assent and ratification." This mode of proceeding was adopted; and by the convention, by Congress, and by the state legislatures, the instrument was submitted to the people. They acted upon it, in the only manner in which they can act safely, effectively, and wisely, on such a subject, by assembling in convention. It is true, they assembled in their several states; and where else should they have assembled? No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the states, and of compounding the American people into one common mass. Of consequence, when they act, they act in their states. But the measures they adopt do not, on that account, cease to be the measures of the people themselves, or become the measures of the state governments.

From these conventions the Constitution derives its whole authority. The government proceeds directly from the people; is "ordained and established" in the name of the people; and is declared to be ordained, "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and to their posterity." The assent of the states, in their sovereign capacity, is implied in calling a convention, and thus submitting that instrument to the people. But the people were at perfect liberty to accept or reject it; and their act was final. It required not the affirmance, and could not be negatived, by the state governments. The Constitution, when thus adopted, was of complete obligation, and bound the state sovereignties.

It has been said, that the people had already surrendered all their powers to the state sovereignties, and had nothing more to give. But, surely, the question whether they may resume and modify the powers granted to government, does not remain to be settled in this country. Much more might the legitimacy of the general government be doubted, had it been created by the states. The powers delegated to the state sovereignties were to be exercised by themselves, not by a distinct and independent sovereignty, created by themselves. To the formation of a league, such as was the Confederation, the state sovereignties were certainly competent. But when, "in order to form a more perfect union," it was deemed necessary to change this alliance into an effective government, possessing great and sovereign powers, and acting directly on the people, the necessity of referring it to the people, and of deriving its powers directly from them, was felt and acknowledged by all.

The government of the Union, then (whatever may be the influence of this fact on the case), is emphatically and truly a government of the people. In form and in substance it emanates from them, its powers are granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them, and for their benefit.

This government is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers. The principle, that it can exercise only the powers granted to it, would seem too apparent to have required to be enforced by all those arguments which its enlightened friends, while it was depending before the people, found it necessary to urge. That principle is now universally admitted. But the question respecting the extent of the powers actually granted, is perpetually arising, and will probably continue to arise, as long as our system shall exist.

In discussing these questions, the conflicting powers of the general and state governments must be brought into view, and the supremacy of their respective laws, when they are in opposition, must be settled.

If any one proposition could command the universal assent of mankind, we might expect it would be this: that the government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action. This would seem to result necessarily from its nature. It is the government of all; its powers are delegated by all; it represents all, and acts for all. Though any one state may be willing to control its operations, no state is willing to allow others to control them. The nation, on those subjects on which it can act, must necessarily bind its component parts. But this question is not left to mere reason: the people have, in express terms, decided it, by saying, "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof," "shall be the supreme law of the land," and by requiring that the members of the state legislatures, and the officers of the executive and judicial departments of the states, shall take the oath of fidelity to it.

The government of the United States, then, though limited in its powers, is supreme; and its laws, when made in pursuance of the Constitution, form the supreme law of the land, "anything in the Constitution or laws of any State, to the contrary notwithstanding."

Among the enumerated powers, we do not find that of establishing a bank or creating a corporation. But there is no phrase in the instrument which, like the Articles of Confederation, excludes incidental or implied powers; and which requires that everything granted shall be expressly and minutely described. Even the 10th Amendment, which was framed for the purpose of quieting the excessive jealousies which had been excited, omits the word "expressly," and declares only that the powers "not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people;" thus leaving the question, whether the particular power which may become the subject of contest, has been delegated to the one government, or prohibited to the other, to depend on a fair construction of the whole instrument. The men who drew and adopted this amendment, had experienced the embarrassments resulting from the insertion of this word in the Articles of Confederation, and probably omitted it to avoid those embarrassments. A constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires, that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves. That this idea was entertained by the framers of the American Constitution, is not only to be inferred from the nature of the instrument, but from the language. Why else were some of the limitations, found in the 9th section of the 1st article, introduced? It is also, in some degree, warranted by their having omitted to use any restrictive term which might prevent its receiving a fair and just interpretation. In considering this question, then, we must never forget, that it is a constitution we are expounding.

Although, among the enumerated powers of government, we do not find the word "bank," or "incorporation," we find the great powers to lay and collect taxes; to borrow money; to regulate commerce; to declare and conduct a war; and to raise and support armies and navies. The sword and the purse, all the external relations, and no inconsiderable portion of the industry of the nation, are intrusted to its government. It can never be pretended that these vast powers draw after them others of inferior importance, merely because they are inferior. Such an idea can never be advanced. But it may, with great reason, be contended, that a government, intrusted with such ample powers, on the due execution of which the happiness and prosperity of the nation so vitally depends, must also be intrusted with ample means for their execution. The power being given, it is the interest of the nation to facilitate its execution. It can never be their interest, and cannot be presumed to have been their intention, to clog and embarrass its execution by withholding the most appropriate means. Throughout this vast republic, from the St. Croix to the Gulf of Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, revenue is to be collected and expended, armies are to be marched and supported. The exigencies of the nation may require, that the treasure raised in the North should be transported to the South, that raised in the East conveyed to the West, or that this order should be reversed. Is that construction of the Constitution to be preferred which would render these operations difficult, hazardous, and expensive? Can we adopt that construction (unless the words imperiously require it) which would impute to the framers of that instrument, when granting these powers for the public good, the intention of impeding their exercise by withholding a choice of means? If, indeed, such be the mandate of the Constitution, we have only to obey; but that instrument does not profess to enumerate the means by which the powers it confers may be executed; nor does it prohibit the creation of a corporation, if the existence of such a being be essential to the beneficial exercise of those powers. It is, then, the subject of fair inquiry, how far such means may be employed.

How is this?

It is not denied, that the powers given to the government imply the ordinary means of execution. That, for example, of raising revenue, and applying it to national purposes, is admitted to imply the power of conveying money from place to place, as the exigencies of the nation may require, and of employing the usual means of conveyance. But it is denied that the government has its choice of means; or, that it may employ the most convenient means, if, to employ them, it be necessary to erect a corporation.

On what foundation does this argument rest? On this alone: The power of creating a corporation, is one appertaining to sovereignty, and is not expressly conferred on Congress. This is true. But all legislative powers appertain to sovereignty. The original power of giving the law on any subject whatever, is a sovereign power; and if the government of the union is restrained from creating a corporation, as a means for performing its functions, on the single reason that the creation of a corporation is an act of sovereignty: if the sufficiency of this reason be acknowledged, there would be some difficulty in sustaining the authority of Congress to pass other laws for the accomplishment of the same objects.

The government which has a right to do an act, and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means; and those who contend that it may not select any appropriate means, that one particular mode of effecting the object is excepted, take upon themselves the burden of establishing that exception.

The creation of a corporation, it is said, appertains to sovereignty. This is admitted. But to what portion of sovereignty does it appertain? Does it belong to one more than to another? In America, the powers of sovereignty are divided between the government of the union, and those of the states. They are each sovereign, with respect to the objects committed to it, and neither sovereign with respect to the objects committed to the other. We cannot comprehend that train of reasoning which would maintain, that the extent of power granted by the people is to be ascertained, not by the nature and terms of the grant, but by its date. Some state constitutions were formed before, some since that of the United States. We cannot believe that their relation to each other is in any degree dependent upon this circumstance. Their respective powers must, we think, be precisely the same as if they had been formed at the same time. Had they been formed at the same time, and had the people conferred on the general government the power contained in the Constitution, and on the states the whole residuum of power, would it have been asserted that the government of the Union was not sovereign with respect to those objects which were intrusted to it, in relation to which its laws were declared to be supreme? If this could not have been asserted, we cannot well comprehend the process of reasoning which maintains, that a power appertaining to sovereignty cannot be connected with that vast portion of it which is granted to the general government, so far as it is calculated to subserve the legitimate objects of that government. The power of creating a corporation, though appertaining to sovereignty, is not, like the power of making war, or levying taxes, or of regulating commerce, a great substantive and independent power, which cannot be implied as incidental to other powers, or used as a means of executing them. It is never the end for which other powers are exercised, but a means by which other objects are accomplished. No contributions are made to charity for the sake of an incorporation, but a corporation is created to administer the charity; no seminary of learning is instituted in order to be incorporated, but the corporate character is conferred to subserve the purposes of education. No city was ever built with the sole object of being incorporated, but is incorporated as affording the best means of being well governed. The power of creating a corporation is never used for its own sake, but for the purpose of effecting something else. No sufficient reason is, therefore, perceived, why it may not pass as incidental to those powers which are expressly given, if it be a direct mode of executing them.

But the Constitution of the United States has not left the right of Congress to employ the necessary means, for the execution of the powers conferred on the government, to general reasoning. To its enumeration of powers is added that of making "all laws which shall be necessary and proper, for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution, in the government of the United States, or in any department [or officer] thereof."

The counsel for the State of Maryland have urged various arguments, to prove that this clause, though in terms a grant of power, is not so in effect; but is really restrictive of the general right, which might otherwise be implied, of selecting means for executing the enumerated powers.

In support of this proposition, they have found it necessary to contend, that this clause was inserted for the purpose of conferring on Congress the power of making laws. That, without it, doubts might be entertained, whether Congress could exercise its powers in the form of legislation.

But could this be the object for which it was inserted? A government is created by the people, having legislative, executive, and judicial powers. Its legislative powers are vested in a Congress, which is to consist of a Senate and House of Representatives. Each house may determine the rule of its proceedings; and it is declared that every bill which shall have passed both houses, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the president of the United States. The 7th section describes the course of proceedings, by which a bill shall become a law; and, then, the 8th section enumerates the powers of Congress. Could it be necessary to say, that a legislature should exercise legislative powers, in the shape of legislation? After allowing each house to prescribe its own course of proceeding, after describing the manner in which a bill should become a law, would it have entered into the mind of a single member of the convention, that an express power to make laws was necessary to enable the legislature to make them? That a legislature, endowed with legislative powers, can legislate, is a proposition too self-evident to have been questioned.

But the argument on which most reliance is placed, is drawn from the peculiar language of this clause. Congress is not empowered by it to make all laws, which may have relation to the powers conferred on the government, but such only as may be "necessary and proper" for carrying them into execution. The word "necessary" is considered as controlling the whole sentence, and as limiting the right to pass laws for the execution of the granted powers, to such as are indispensable, and without which the power would be nugatory. That it excludes the choice of means, and leaves to Congress, in each case, that only which is most direct and simple.

Is it true, that this is the sense in which the word "necessary" is always used? Does it always import an absolute physical necessity, so strong, that one thing, to which another may be termed necessary, cannot exist without that other? We think it does not. If reference be had to its use, in the common affairs of the world, or in approved authors, we find that it frequently imports no more than that one thing is convenient, or useful, or essential to another. To employ the means necessary to an end, is generally understood as employing any means calculated to produce the end, and not as being confined to those single means, without which the end would be entirely unattainable. Such is the character of human language, that no word conveys to the mind, in all situations, one single definite idea; and nothing is more common than to use words in a figurative sense. Almost all compositions contain words, which, taken in their rigorous sense, would convey a meaning different from that which is obviously intended. It is essential to just construction, that many words which import something excessive, should be understood in a more mitigated sense—in that sense which common usage justifies. The word "necessary" is of this description. It has not a fixed character peculiar to itself. It admits of all degrees of comparison; and is often connected with other words, which increase or diminish the impression the mind receives of the urgency it imports. A thing may be necessary, very necessary, absolutely or indispensably necessary. To no mind would the same idea be conveyed, by these several phrases. This comment on the word is well illustrated, by the passage cited at the Bar, from the 10th section of the 1st article of the Constitution. It is, we think, impossible to compare the sentence which prohibits a state from laying "imposts, or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws," with that which authorizes Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers of the general government, without feeling a conviction that the convention understood itself to change materially the meaning of the word "necessary" by prefixing the word "absolutely." This word, then, like others, is used in various senses; and, in its construction, the subject, the context, the intention of the person using them, are all to be taken into view.

Let this be done in the case under consideration. The subject is the execution of those great powers on which the welfare of a nation essentially depends. It must have been the intention of those who gave these powers, to insure, as far as human prudence could insure, their beneficial execution. This could not be done by confining the choice of means to such narrow limits as not to leave it in the power of Congress to adopt any which might be appropriate, and which were conducive to the end. This provision is made in a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs. To have prescribed the means by which government should, in all future time, execute its powers, would have been to change, entirely, the character of the instrument, and give it the properties of a legal code. It would have been an unwise attempt to provide, by immutable rules, for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly, and which can be best provided for as they occur. To have declared that the best means shall not be used, but those alone without which the power given would be nugatory, would have been to deprive the legislature of the capacity to avail itself of experience, to exercise its reason, and to accommodate its legislation to circumstances. If we apply this principle of construction to any of the powers of the government, we shall find it so pernicious in its operation that we shall be compelled to discard it. The powers vested in Congress may certainly be carried into execution, without prescribing an oath of office. The power to exact this security for the faithful performance of duty, is not given, nor is it indispensably necessary. The different departments may be established; taxes may be imposed and collected; armies and navies may be raised and maintained; and money may be borrowed, without requiring an oath of office. It might be argued, with as much plausibility as other incidental powers have been assailed, that the convention was not unmindful of this subject. The oath which might be exacted—that of fidelity to the Constitution—is prescribed, and no other can be required. Yet, he would be charged with insanity who should contend, that the legislature might not superadd to the oath directed by the Constitution, such other oath of office as its wisdom might suggest.

So, with respect to the whole penal code of the United States. Whence arises the power to punish in cases not prescribed by the Constitution? All admit that the government may, legitimately, punish any violation of its laws; and yet, this is not among the enumerated powers of Congress. The right to enforce the observance of law, by punishing its infraction, might be denied with the more plausibility, because it is expressly given in some cases. Congress is empowered "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States," and "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations." The several powers of Congress may exist, in a very imperfect state to be sure, but they may exist and be carried into execution, although no punishment should be inflicted in cases where the right to punish is not expressly given.

Take, for example, the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads." This power is executed by the single act of making the establishment. But from this has been inferred the power and duty of carrying the mail along the post-road, from one post-office to another. And, from this implied power, has again been inferred the right to punish those who steal letters from the post-office, or rob the mail. It may be said, with some plausibility, that the right to carry the mail, and to punish those who rob it, is not indispensably necessary to the establishment of a post-office and post-road. This right is, indeed, essential to the beneficial exercise of the power, but not indispensably necessary to its existence. So, of the punishment of the crimes of stealing or falsifying a record or process of a court of the United States, or of perjury in such court. To punish these offences is certainly conducive to the due administration of justice. But courts may exist, and may decide the causes brought before them, though such crimes escape punishment.

The baneful influence of this narrow construction on all the operations of the government, and the absolute impracticability of maintaining it without rendering the government incompetent to its great objects, might be illustrated by numerous examples drawn from the Constitution, and from our laws. The good sense of the public has pronounced, without hesitation, that the power of punishment appertains to sovereignty, and may be exercised whenever the sovereign has a right to act, as incidental to his constitutional powers. It is a means for carrying into execution all sovereign powers, and may be used, although not indispensably necessary. It is a right incidental to the power, and conducive to its beneficial exercise.

If this limited construction of the word "necessary" must be abandoned in order to punish, whence is derived the rule which would reinstate it, when the government would carry its powers into execution by means not vindictive in their nature? If the word "necessary" means "needful," "requisite," "essential," "conducive to," in order to let in the power of punishment for the infraction of law, why is it not equally comprehensive when required to authorize the use of means which facilitate the execution of the powers of government without the infliction of punishment?

In ascertaining the sense in which the word "necessary" is used in this clause of the Constitution, we may derive some aid from that with which it is associated. Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution" the powers of the government. If the word "necessary" was used in that strict and rigorous sense for which the counsel for the State of Maryland contend, it would be an extraordinary departure from the usual course of the human mind, as exhibited in composition, to add a word, the only possible effect of which is to qualify that strict and rigorous meaning; to present to the mind the idea of some choice of means of legislation not straitened and compressed within the narrow limits for which gentlemen contend.

But the argument which most conclusively demonstrates the error of the construction contended for by the counsel for the State of Maryland, is founded on the intention of the convention, as manifested in the whole clause. To waste time and argument in proving that, without it, Congress might carry its powers into execution, would be not much less idle than to hold a lighted taper to the sun.

As little can it be required to prove, that in the absence of this clause, Congress would have some choice of means. That it might employ those which, in its judgment, would most advantageously effect the object to be accomplished. That any means adapted to the end, any means which tended directly to the execution of the constitutional powers of the government, were in themselves constitutional. This clause, as construed by the State of Maryland, would abridge and almost annihilate this useful and necessary right of the legislature to select its means. That this could not be intended, is, we should think, had it not been already controverted, too apparent for controversy. We think so for the following reasons:—

1. The clause is placed among the powers of Congress, not among the limitations on those powers.

2. Its terms purport to enlarge, not to diminish the powers vested in the government. It purports to be an additional power, not a restriction on those already granted. No reason has been or can be assigned, for thus concealing an intention to narrow the discretion of the national legislature, under words which purport to enlarge it. The framers of the Constitution wished its adoption, and well knew that it would be endangered by its strength, not by its weakness. Had they been capable of using language which would convey to the eye one idea, and after deep reflection, impress on the mind another, they would rather have disguised the grant of power, than its limitation. If then, their intention had been, by this clause, to restrain the free use of means which might otherwise have been implied, that intention would have been inserted in another place, and would have been expressed in terms resembling these: "In carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all others," &c., "no laws shall be passed but such as are necessary and proper." Had the intention been to make this clause restrictive, it would unquestionably have been so in form as well as in effect.

The result of the most careful and attentive consideration bestowed upon this clause is, that if it does not enlarge, it cannot be construed to restrain the powers of Congress, or to impair the right of the legislature to exercise its best judgment in the selection of measures, to carry into execution the constitutional powers of the government. If no other motive for its insertion can be suggested, a sufficient one is found in the desire to remove all doubts respecting the right to legislate on that vast mass of incidental powers which must be involved in the Constitution, if that instrument be not a splendid bawble.

We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

That a corporation must be considered as a means not less usual, not of higher dignity, not more requiring a particular specification than other means, has been sufficiently proved. If we look to the origin of corporations, to the manner in which they have been framed in that government, from which we have derived most of our legal principles and ideas, or to the uses to which they have been applied, we find no reason to suppose that a constitution, omitting, and wisely omitting, to enumerate all the means for carrying into execution the great powers vested in government, ought to have specified this. Had it been intended to grant this power as one which should be distinct and independent, to be exercised in any case whatever, it would have found a place among the enumerated powers of the government. But being considered merely as a means, to be employed only for the purpose of carrying into execution the given powers, there could be no motive for particularly mentioning it.

The propriety of this remark would seem to be generally acknowledged by the universal acquiescence in the construction which has been uniformly put on the 3d section of the 4th article of the Constitution. The power to "make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," is not more comprehensive, than the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers of the government. Yet all admit the constitutionality of a territorial government, which is a corporate body.

If a corporation may be employed indiscriminately with other means to carry into execution the powers of the government, no particular reason can be assigned for excluding the use of a bank, if required for its fiscal operations. To use one, must be within the discretion of Congress, if it be an appropriate mode of executing the powers of government. That it is a convenient, a useful, and essential instrument in the prosecution of its fiscal operations, is not now a subject of controversy. All those who have been concerned in the administration of our finances, have concurred in representing its importance and necessity; and so strongly have they been felt, that statesmen of the first class, whose previous opinions against it had been confirmed by every circumstance which can fix the human judgment, have yielded those opinions to the exigencies of the nation. Under the confederation, Congress justifying the measure by its necessity, transcended, perhaps, its powers to obtain the advantage of a bank; and our own legislation attests the universal conviction of the utility of this measure. The time has passed away when it can be necessary to enter into any discussion in order to prove the importance of this instrument, as a means to effect the legitimate objects of the government.

But were its necessity less apparent, none can deny its being an appropriate measure; and if it is, the degree of its necessity, as has been very justly observed, is to be discussed in another place. Should Congress, in the execution of its powers, adopt measures which are prohibited by the Constitution; or should Congress, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the government, it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say that such an Act was not the law of the land. But where the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects intrusted to the government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity, would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department, and to tread on legislative ground. This court disclaims all pretensions to such a power.

After this declaration, it can scarcely be necessary to say, that the existence of state banks can have no possible influence on the question. No trace is to be found in the Constitution of an intention to create a dependence of the government of the Union on those of the states, for the execution of the great powers assigned to it. Its means are adequate to its ends; and on those means alone was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends. To impose on it the necessity of resorting to means which it cannot control, which another government may furnish or withhold, would render its course precarious, the result of its measures uncertain, and create a dependence on other governments, which might disappoint its most important designs, and is incompatible with the language of the Constitution. But were it otherwise, the choice of means implies a right to choose a national bank in preference to state banks, and Congress alone can make the election.

After the most deliberate consideration, it is the unanimous and decided opinion of this court, that the Act to incorporate the Bank of the United States is a law made in pursuance of the Constitution, and is a part of the supreme law of the land.

The branches, proceeding from the same stock, and being conducive to the complete accomplishment of the object, are equally constitutional. It would have been unwise to locate them in the charter, and it would be unnecessarily inconvenient to employ the legislative power in making those subordinate arrangements. The great duties of the bank are prescribed; those duties require branches, and the bank itself may, we think, be safely trusted with the selection of places where those branches shall be fixed; reserving always to the government the right to require that a branch shall be located where it may be deemed necessary.

It being the opinion of the court that the act incorporating the bank is constitutional; and that the power of establishing a branch in the State of Maryland might be properly exercised by the bank itself, we proceed to inquire:—

2. Whether the State of Maryland may, without violating the Constitution, tax that branch? * * *

We are unanimously of opinion, that the law passed by the Legislature of Maryland, imposing a tax on the Bank of the United States, is unconstitutional and void. * * *

JACOB RUPPERT, A CORPORATION v. CAFFEY, UNITED STATES ATTORNEY FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK, ET AL.

1920. Supreme Court of the United States. 251 U. S. 264.

[Holding valid the act of Congress of Nov. 21, 1918, known as the War-Time Prohibition Act, which prohibited the manufacture from grains, cereals, fruit or other food product any beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes and the sale thereof, until the termination of demobilization; and so much of the Volstead Act (Act of Oct. 28, 1919) as declared that the words beer, wine, etc., in the above act should be construed to mean such beverages as contain one-half of one per cent. or more of alcohol by volume. (Note that the 18th Amendment did not become operative until January 16, 1920. Dillon v. Gloss, supra, p. 221, and that the Volstead Act except the interpretive clause just stated did not become effective until the latter date.)]

Mr. Justice Brandeis delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

But it is insisted that this legislation is nevertheless void as against the plaintiff, because Congress could not, even under its full war powers, prohibit the manufacture and sale of non-intoxicants. * * *

If the war power of Congress to effectively prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in order to promote the nation's efficiency in men, munitions and supplies is as full and complete as the police power of the states to effectively enforce such prohibition in order to promote the health, safety and morals of the community, it is clear that this provision of the Volstead Act is valid, and has rendered immaterial the question whether plaintiff's beer is intoxicating. For the legislation and decisions of the highest courts of nearly all the states establish that it is deemed impossible to effectively enforce either prohibitory laws or other laws merely regulating the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, if liability or inclusion within the law is made to depend upon the issuable fact whether or not a particular liquor made or sold as a beverage is intoxicating. * * * A test often used to determine whether a beverage is to be deemed intoxicating within the meaning of the liquor law is whether it contains one-half of one per cent. of alcohol by volume. A survey of the liquor laws of the states reveals that * * * in eighteen states it is the presence of as much as or more than one-half of one per cent. of alcohol; in six states, one per cent. of alcohol; in one state, the presence of the "alcoholic principle"; and in one state, two per cent. of alcohol.[2] * * *

Purity Extract Co. v. Lynch, 226 U. S. 192, determined that state legislation of this character is valid and set forth with clearness the constitutional ground upon which it rests: "When a state exerting its recognized authority undertakes to express what it is free to regard as a public evil, it may adopt such measures having reasonable relation to that end as it may deem necessary in order to make its action effective. It does not follow that because a transaction separately considered is innocuous it may not be included in a prohibition the scope of which is regarded as essential in the legislative judgment to accomplish a purpose within the admitted power of the Government." * * *

That the federal government would, in attempting to enforce a prohibitory law, be confronted with difficulties similar to those encountered by the states is obvious; and both this experience of the states and the need of the federal government of legislation defining intoxicating liquors as was done in the Volstead Act were clearly set forth in the reports of the House Committee on the Judiciary * * *. It is therefore clear both that Congress might reasonably have considered some legislative definition of intoxicating liquor to be essential to effective enforcement of prohibition and also that the definition provided by the Volstead Act was not an arbitrary one.

Plaintiff's argument is equivalent to saying that the war power of Congress to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors does not extend to the adoption of such means to this end as in its judgment are necessary to the effective administration of the law. The contention appears to be, that since the power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors is not expressly granted to Congress, but is a power implied under § 8 of Article I of the Constitution, which authorizes Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" powers expressly enumerated, the power to prohibit non-intoxicants would be merely an incident of the power to prohibit intoxicants; and that it cannot be held to exist, because one implied power may not be grafted upon another implied power. This argument is a mere matter of words. The police power of a state over the liquor traffic is not limited to the power to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors supported by a separate implied power to prohibit kindred non-intoxicating liquors so far as necessary to make the prohibition of intoxicants effective; it is a single broad power to make such laws, by way of prohibition, as may be required to effectively suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Likewise the implied war power over intoxicating liquors extends to the enactment of laws which will not merely prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors but will effectually prevent their sale. Furthermore, as stated in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., ante, 156, while discussing the implied power to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors: "When the United States exerts any of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, no valid objection can be based upon the fact that such exercise may be attended by the same incidents which attend the exercise by a state of its police power * * *."

[2] Numerous references by Justice Brandeis to state statutes and state judicial decisions in the margins of the official report are here omitted.

The distinction sought to be made by plaintiff between the scope or incidents of an express power and those of an implied power has no basis in reason or authority. Thus, the Constitution confers upon Congress the express power "to establish post offices and post roads" (Article I, § 8, clause 7). From this is implied the power to acquire land for post offices in the several states, Battle v. United States, 209 U. S. 36; and as an incident of this implied power to acquire land, the further power is implied to take it by right of eminent domain. Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S. 367. Likewise, the Constitution confers by clause 3 the express power "to regulate commerce * * * among the several States"; but there is implied for this purpose also the power to grant to individuals franchises to construct and operate railroads from state to state. California v. Pacific R. R. Co., 127 U. S. 1, 39. Incidental to this implied power to construct or authorize the construction of a railroad—is the further implied power to regulate the relations of the railroad with its employees, Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U. S. 1, 47; to require safety appliances upon cars, even when used in intrastate commerce, Southern Ry. Co. v. United States, 222 U. S. 20; and to regulate freight rates even to the extent of affecting intrastate rates, American Express Co. v. Caldwell, 244 U. S. 617. Whether it be for purposes of national defense, or for the purpose of establishing post offices and post roads or for the purpose of regulating commerce among the several states Congress has the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the duty so reposed in the federal government. While this is a government of enumerated powers it has full attributes of sovereignty within the limits of those powers. In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564. Some confusion of thought might perhaps have been avoided, if, instead of distinguishing between powers by the terms express and implied, the terms specific and general had been used. For the power conferred by clause 18 of § 8 "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" powers specifically enumerated is also an express power. Since Congress has power to increase war efficiency by prohibiting the liquor traffic, no reason appears why it should be denied the power to make its prohibition effective. * * *

Decree affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS, with whom concurred MR. JUSTICE DAY, and MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER, dissenting. * * *

The federal government has only those powers granted by the Constitution. The Eighteenth Amendment not having become effective, it has no general power to prohibit the manufacture or sale of liquors. But by positive grant Congress has been empowered: "To declare war," "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers"; and to these it is attempted to trace the asserted power to prohibit sale of complainant's beer. (See concerning implied powers, Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law, 105; Story on the Constitution, 4th ed., § 1243.)

The argument runs—This court has held in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., ante, 146, that under a power implied because necessary and proper to carry into execution the above named powers relating to war, in October, 1919, Congress could prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors. In order to make such a prohibition effective the sale of non-intoxicating beer must be forbidden. Wherefore, from the implied power to prohibit intoxicants the further power to prohibit this non-intoxicant must be implied.

The query at once arises: If all this be true, why may not the second implied power engender a third under which Congress may forbid the planting of barley or hops, the manufacture of bottles or kegs, etc., etc.? The mischievous consequences of such reasoning were long ago pointed out in Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 21, where, replying to a suggestion that under the expressly granted power to regulate commerce, Congress might control related matters, it was said:

"The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the states, with the power to regulate, not only manufactures, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not comtemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market?" * * *

Mr. Justice Clarke also dissents.

LEGAL TENDER CASES.

58.

KNOX v. LEE. PARKER v. DAVIS.

1872. Supreme Court of the United States. 12 Wall. 457.

These were two suits; the first a writ of error to the Circuit Court for the Western District of Texas, the second an appeal from a decree in equity in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.

[In the first case, Mrs. Lee sued Knox for conversion of a flock of sheep. The chief issue was the quantum of damages. The ordinary money in use in the United States at the time of the conversion was notes of the United States commonly known as "greenbacks" which had been declared legal tender by acts of Congress of February 25, 1862, July 11, 1862 and March 3, 1863. There was some testimony as to the value of the sheep "in specie," gold or silver. Upon an objection by the defendant the court excluded evidence offered to show that "greenbacks" were not worth their par in gold or silver. After so ruling the court voluntarily charged the jury to "recollect" that the amount they might give by their verdict would be payable in legal tender notes. Judgment was given against the defendant who now complained that the charge tended to lead the jury to give a larger verdict.

The second case arose on a bill in equity by Davis to compel specific performance of a contract by Parker to convey land to Davis upon payment of a sum of money stated in the contract. The contract had been made and the bill filed before any of the above acts were passed. Final judgment, however, was not rendered until 1867, after the passage of the acts, when the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts ordered the defendant to convey upon payment by Davis, into court, of an amount of "greenbacks" equivalent in face value to the contract price, instead of coin for which the defendant had insisted.]

Mr. Justice Strong delivered the opinion of the court.

The controlling questions in these cases are the following: Are the acts of Congress, known as the Legal Tender Acts, constitutional when applied to contracts made before their passage; and, secondly, are they valid as applicable to debts contracted since their enactment? These questions have been elaborately argued, and they have received from the court that consideration which their great importance demands. It would be difficult to overestimate the consequences which must follow our decision. They will affect the entire business of the country, and take hold of the possible continued existence of the government. If it be held by this court that Congress has no constitutional power, under any circumstances, or in any emergency, to make treasury notes a legal tender for the payment of all debts (a power confessedly possessed by every independent sovereignty other than the United States), the government is without those means of self-preservation which, all must admit, may, in certain contingencies, become indispensable, even if they were not when the acts of Congress now called in question were enacted. It is also clear that if we hold the acts invalid as applicable to debts incurred, or transactions which have taken place since their enactment, our decision must cause, throughout the country, great business derangement, widespread distress, and the rankest injustice. The debts which have been contracted since February 25th, 1862, constitute, doubtless, by far the greatest portion of the existing indebtedness of the country. They have been contracted in view of the acts of Congress declaring treasury notes a legal tender, and in reliance upon that declaration. Men have bought and sold, borrowed and lent, and assumed every variety of obligations contemplating that payment might be made with such notes. Indeed, legal tender treasury notes have become the universal measure of values. If now, by our decision, it be established that these debts and obligations can be discharged only by gold coin; if, contrary to the expectation of all parties to these contracts, legal tender notes are rendered unavailable, the government has become an instrument of the grossest injustice; all debtors are loaded with an obligation it was never contemplated they should assume; a large percentage is added to every debt, and such must become the demand for gold to satisfy contracts, that ruinous sacrifices, general distress, and bankruptcy may be expected. These consequences are too obvious to admit of question. And there is no well-founded distinction to be made between the constitutional validity of an act of Congress declaring treasury notes a legal tender for the payment of debts contracted after its passage and that of an act making them a legal tender for the discharge of all debts, as well those incurred before as those made after its enactment. There may be a difference in the effects produced by the acts, and in the hardship of their operation, but in both cases the fundamental question, that which tests the validity of the legislation, is, can Congress constitutionally give to treasury notes the character and qualities of money? Can such notes be constituted a legitimate circulating medium, having a defined legal value? If they can, then such notes must be available to fulfil all contracts (not expressly excepted) solvable in money, without reference to the time when the contracts were made. Hence it is not strange that those who hold the Legal Tender Acts unconstitutional when applied to contracts made before February, 1862, find themselves compelled also to hold that the acts are invalid as to debts created after that time, and to hold that both classes of debts alike can be discharged only by gold and silver coin.

The consequences of which we have spoken, serious as they are, must be accepted, if there is a clear incompatibility between the Constitution and the Legal Tender Acts. But we are unwilling to precipitate them upon the country unless such an incompatibility plainly appears. A decent respect for a co-ordinate branch of the government demands that the judiciary should presume, until the contrary is clearly shown, that there has been no transgression of power by Congress—all the members of which act under the obligation of an oath of fidelity to the Constitution. Such has always been the rule. * * * It is incumbent, therefore, upon those who affirm the unconstitutionality of an act of Congress to show clearly that it is in violation of the provisions of the Constitution. It is not sufficient for them that they succeed in raising a doubt.

Nor can it be questioned that, when investigating the nature and extent of the powers conferred by the Constitution upon Congress, it is indispensable to keep in view the objects for which those powers were granted. This is a universal rule of construction applied alike to statutes, wills, contracts, and constitutions. If the general purpose of the instrument is ascertained, the language of its provisions must be construed with reference to that purpose, and so as to subserve it. In no other way can the intent of the framers of the instrument be discovered. And there are more urgent reasons for looking to the ultimate purpose in examining the powers conferred by a constitution than there are in construing a statute, a will, or a contract. We do not expect to find in a constitution minute details. It is necessarily brief and comprehensive. It prescribes outlines, leaving the filling up to be deduced from the outlines. In Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheaton, 326, it was said, "The Constitution unavoidably deals in general language. It did not suit the purpose of the people in framing this great charter of our liberties to provide for minute specifications of its powers, or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution." * * * That would appear, then, to be a most unreasonable construction of the Constitution which denies to the government created by it, the right to employ freely every means, not prohibited, necessary for its preservation, and for the fulfilment of its acknowledged duties. Such a right, we hold, was given by the last clause of the eighth section of its first article. The means or instrumentalities referred to in that clause, and authorized, are not enumerated or defined. In the nature of things enumeration and specification were impossible. But they were left to the discretion of Congress, subject only to the restrictions that they be not prohibited, and be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the enumerated powers given to Congress, and all other powers vested in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

And here it is to be observed it is not indispensable to the existence of any power claimed for the federal government that it can be found specified in the words of the Constitution, or clearly and directly traceable to some one of the specified powers. Its existence may be deduced fairly from more than one of the substantive powers expressly defined, or from them all combined. It is allowable to group together any number of them and infer from them all that the power claimed has been conferred. Such a treatment of the Constitution is recognized by its own provisions. This is well illustrated in its language respecting the writ of habeas corpus. The power to suspend the privilege of that writ is not expressly given, nor can it be deduced from any one of the particularized grants of power. Yet it is provided that the privileges of the writ shall not be suspended except in certain defined contingencies. This is no express grant of power. It is a restriction. But it shows irresistibly that somewhere in the Constitution power to suspend the privilege of the writ was granted, either by some one or more of the specifications of power, or by them all combined. And, that important powers were understood by the people who adopted the Constitution to have been created by it, powers not enumerated, and not included incidentally in any one of those enumerated, is shown by the amendments. The first ten of these were suggested in the conventions of the states, and proposed at the first session of the first Congress, before any complaint was made of a disposition to assume doubtful powers. The preamble to the resolution submitting them for adoption recited that the "conventions of a number of the states had, at the time of their adopting the Constitution, expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added." This was the origin of the amendments, and they are significant. They tend plainly to show that, in the judgment of those who adopted the Constitution, there were powers created by it, neither expressly specified nor deducible from any one specified power, or ancillary to it alone, but which grew out of the aggregate of powers conferred upon the government, or out of the sovereignty instituted. Most of these amendments are denials of power which had not been expressly granted, and which cannot be said to have been necessary and proper for carrying into execution any other powers. Such, for example, is the prohibition of any laws respecting the establishment of religion, prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

And it is of importance to observe that Congress has often exercised, without question, powers that are not expressly given nor ancillary to any single enumerated power. Powers thus exercised are what are called by Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, resulting powers, arising from the aggregate powers of the government. He instances the right to sue and make contracts. Many others might be given. The oath required by law from officers of the government is one. So is building a capitol or a presidential mansion, and so also is the penal code. This last is worthy of brief notice. Congress is expressly authorized "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States, and to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and offences against the laws of nations." It is also empowered to declare the punishment of treason, and provision is made for impeachments. This is the extent of power to punish crime expressly conferred. It might be argued that the expression of these limited powers implies an exclusion of all other subjects of criminal legislation. Such is the argument in the present cases. It is said because Congress is authorized to coin money and regulate its value, it cannot declare anything other than gold and silver to be money, or make it a legal tender. Yet Congress, by the Act of April 30, 1790, entitled "An Act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," and the supplementary Act of March 3, 1825, defined and provided for the punishment of a large class of crimes other than those mentioned in the Constitution, and some of the punishments prescribed are manifestly not in aid of any single substantive power. No one doubts that this was rightly done, and the power thus exercised has been affirmed by this court in United States v. Marigold, 9 Howard, 560. This case shows that a power may exist as an aid to the execution of an express power, or an aggregate of such powers, though there is another express power given relating in part to the same subject but less extensive. * * *

Indeed, the whole history of the government and of Congressional legislation has exhibited the use of a very wide discretion, even in times of peace and in the absence of any trying emergency, in the selection of the necessary and proper means to carry into effect the great objects for which the government was framed, and this discretion has generally been unquestioned, or, if questioned, sanctioned by this court. This is true not only when an attempt has been made to execute a single power specifically given, but equally true when the means adopted have been appropriate to the execution, not of a single authority, but of all the powers created by the Constitution. Under the power to establish post-offices and post-roads Congress has provided for carrying the mails, punishing theft of letters and mail robberies, and even for transporting the mails to foreign countries. Under the power to regulate commerce, provision has been made by law for the improvement of harbors, the establishment of observatories, the erection of lighthouses, breakwaters, and buoys, the registry, enrolment, and construction of ships, and a code has been enacted for the government of seamen. Under the same power and other powers over the revenue and the currency of the country, for the convenience of the treasury and internal commerce, a corporation known as the United States Bank was early created. To its capital the government subscribed one-fifth of its stock. But the corporation was a private one, doing business for its own profit. Its incorporation was a constitutional exercise of Congressional power for no other reason than that it was deemed to be a convenient instrument or means for accomplishing one or more of the ends for which the government was established, or, in the language of the first article, already quoted, "necessary and proper" for carrying into execution some or all the powers vested in the government. Clearly this necessity, if any existed, was not a direct and obvious one. * * *

Before we can hold the Legal Tender Acts unconstitutional, we must be convinced they were not appropriate means, or means conducive to the execution of any or all of the powers of Congress, or of the government, not appropriate in any plain degree (for we are not judges of the degree of appropriateness), or we must hold that they were prohibited. This brings us to the inquiry whether they were, when enacted, appropriate instrumentalities for carrying into effect, or executing any of the known powers of Congress, or of any department of the government. Plainly to this inquiry, a consideration of the time when they were enacted, and of the circumstances in which the government then stood, is important. It is not to be denied that acts may be adapted to the exercise of lawful power, and appropriate to it, in seasons of exigency, which would be inappropriate at other times.

We do not propose to dilate at length upon the circumstances in which the country was placed, when Congress attempted to make treasury notes a legal tender. They are of too recent occurrence to justify enlarged description. Suffice it to say that a civil war was then raging which seriously threatened the overthrow of the government and the destruction of the Constitution itself. It demanded the equipment and support of large armies and navies, and the employment of money to an extent beyond the capacity of all ordinary sources of supply. Meanwhile the public treasury was nearly empty, and the credit of the government, if not stretched to its utmost tension, had become nearly exhausted. Moneyed institutions had advanced largely of their means, and more could not be expected of them. They had been compelled to suspend specie payments. Taxation was inadequate to pay even the interest on the debt already incurred, and it was impossible to await the income of additional taxes. The necessity was immediate and pressing. The army was unpaid. There was then due to the soldiers in the field nearly a score of millions of dollars. * * * It was at such a time and in such an emergency that the Legal Tender Acts were passed. Now, if it were certain that nothing else would have supplied the absolute necessities of the treasury, that nothing else would have enabled the government to maintain its armies and navy, that nothing else would have saved the government and the Constitution from destruction, while the Legal Tender Acts would, could any one be bold enough to assert that Congress transgressed its powers? Or if these enactments did work these results, can it be maintained now that they were not for a legitimate end, or "appropriate and adapted to that end," in the language of Chief Justice Marshall? That they did work such results is not to be doubted. Something revived the drooping faith of the people; something brought immediately to the government's aid the resources of the nation, and something enabled the successful prosecution of the war, and the preservation of the national life. What was it, if not the legal tender enactments?

But if it be conceded that some other means might have been chosen for the accomplishment of these legitimate and necessary ends, the concession does not weaken the argument. It is urged now, after the lapse of nine years, and when the emergency has passed, that treasury notes without the legal tender clause might have been issued, and that the necessities of the government might thus have been supplied. Hence it is inferred there was no necessity for giving to the notes issued the capability of paying private debts. At best this is mere conjecture. But admitting it to be true, what does it prove? Nothing more than that Congress had the choice of means for a legitimate end, each appropriate, and adapted to that end, though, perhaps, in different degrees. What then? Can this court say that it ought to have adopted one rather than the other? Is it our province to decide that the means selected were beyond the constitutional power of Congress, because we may think that other means to the same ends would have been more appropriate and equally efficient? * * *

The rules of construction heretofore adopted, do not demand that the relationship between the means and the end shall be direct and immediate. Illustrations of this may be found in several of the cases above cited. The charter of a bank of the United States, the priority given to debts due the government over private debts, and the exemption of federal loans from liability to state taxation, are only a few of the many which might be given. The case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wallace, 533, presents a suggestive illustration. There a tax of ten per cent on state bank notes in circulation was held constitutional, not merely because it was a means of raising revenue, but as an instrument to put out of existence such a circulation in competition with notes issued by the government. There, this court, speaking through the Chief Justice, avowed that it is the constitutional right of Congress to provide a currency for the whole country; that this might be done by coin, or United States notes, or notes of National banks; and that it cannot be questioned Congress may constitutionally secure the benefit of such a currency to the people by appropriate legislation. It was said there can be no question of the power of this government to emit bills of credit; to make them receivable in payment of debts to itself; to fit them for use by those who see fit to use them in all the transactions of commerce; to make them a currency uniform in value and description, and convenient and useful for circulation. Here the substantive power to tax was allowed to be employed for improving the currency. It is not easy to see why, if state bank notes can be taxed out of existence for the purposes of indirectly making United States notes more convenient and useful for commercial purposes, the same end may not be secured directly by making them a legal tender. * * *

To assert, then, that the clause enabling Congress to coin money and regulate its value tacitly implies a denial of all other power over the currency of the nation, is an attempt to introduce a new rule of construction against the solemn decisions of this court. So far from its containing a lurking prohibition, many have thought it was intended to confer upon Congress that general power over the currency which has always been an acknowledged attribute of sovereignty in every other civilized nation than our own, especially when considered in connection with the other clause which denies to the states the power to coin money, emit bills of credit, or make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts. We do not assert this now, but there are some considerations touching these clauses which tend to show that if any implications are to be deduced from them, they are of an enlarging rather than a restraining character. The Constitution was intended to frame a government as distinguished from a league or compact, a government supreme in some particulars over states and people. It was designed to provide the same currency, having a uniform legal value in all the states. It was for this reason the power to coin money and regulate its value was conferred upon the federal government, while the same power as well as the power to emit bills of credit was withdrawn from the states. The states can no longer declare what shall be money, or regulate its value. Whatever power there is over the currency is vested in Congress. If the power to declare what is money is not in Congress, it is annihilated. This may indeed have been intended. Some powers that usually belong to sovereignties were extinguished, but their extinguishment was not left to inference. In most cases, if not in all, when it was intended that governmental powers, commonly acknowledged as such, should cease to exist, both in the states and in the federal government, it was expressly denied to both, as well as to the United States as to the individual states. And generally, when one of such powers was expressly denied to the states only, it was for the purpose of rendering the federal power more complete and exclusive. Why, then, it may be asked, if the design was to prohibit to the new government, as well as to the states, that general power over the currency which the states had when the Constitution was framed, was such denial not expressly extended to the new government, as it was to the states? * * *

We do not, however, rest our assertion of the power of Congress to enact legal tender laws upon this grant. We assert only that the grant can, in no just sense, be regarded as containing an implied prohibition against their enactment, and that, if it raises any implications, they are of complete power over the currency, rather than restraining. * * *

But, without extending our remarks further, it will be seen that we hold the acts of Congress constitutional as applied to contracts made either before or after their passage. In so holding, we overrule so much of what was decided in Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wallace, 603, as ruled the acts unwarranted by the Constitution so far as they apply to contracts made before their enactment.[3] That case was decided by a divided court, and by a court having a less number of judges than the law then in existence provided this court shall have. These cases have been heard before a full court, and they have received our most careful consideration. * * *

[A concurring opinion by Bradley, J., and dissenting opinions by Chase, C. J., Clifford and Field, JJ., are omitted. Nelson, J., also dissented. Judgment in each case affirmed.

[3] Hepburn v. Griswold was decided in conference on November 27, 1869, by a vote of 5 to 3, the court then consisting of eight judges, but the judgment was not announced in court until February 7, 1870. Justice Grier, one of the majority, resigned February 1, 1870. An Act of April 10, 1869, which went into effect in December 1869 authorized the increase of the court to nine members. Justices Strong and Bradley, the new appointees, and the three who dissented in Hepburn v. Griswold constituted the majority (5 to 4) in the above cases. See reporter's note in 12 Wall. at p. 528. See ch. 31 of Warren's Supreme Court in United States History. For another instance in which a change in the personnel of the court changed the result on a question of constitutional law see Story, J., in Briscoe v. Bank of Commonwealth, 11 Pet. (U. S.) 257, at pp. 328-329, 9 L. ed. 709.

JUILLIARD v. GREENMAN.

1884. Supreme Court of the United States. 110 U. S. 421.

[Some of the notes issued by the United States under the wartime acts sustained in the Legal Tender Cases came into the treasury of the United States by redemption or otherwise. Sometime after January 1, 1879, they were reissued in pursuance of an act of May 31, 1878. Some of those reissued notes were tendered by defendant to plaintiff in payment of a debt and refused, raising the question whether in time of peace Congress constitutionally could continue the legal tender quality of these notes.]

Mr. Justice Gray delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

The power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States" is the power to raise money for the public use on a pledge of the public credit, and may be exercised to meet either present or anticipated expenses and liabilities of the government. It includes the power to issue, in return for the money borrowed, the obligations of the United States in any appropriate form, of stock, bonds, bills, or notes; and in whatever form they are issued, being instruments of the national government, they are exempt from taxation by the governments of the several states. Weston v. Charleston City Council, 2 Pet. 449; Banks v. Mayor, 7 Wall. 16; Bank v. Supervisors, 7 Wall. 26. Congress has authority to issue these obligations in a form adapted to circulation from hand to hand in the ordinary transactions of commerce and business. In order to promote and facilitate such circulation, to adapt them to use as currency, and to make them more current in the market, it may provide for their redemption in coin or bonds, and may make them receivable in payment of debts to the government. So much is settled beyond doubt, and was asserted or distinctly admitted by the judges who dissented from the decision in the Legal Tender Cases, as well as by those who concurred in that decision. Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, 548; Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wall. 616, 636; Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 543, 544, 560, 582, 610, 613, 637.

It is equally well settled that Congress has the power to incorporate national banks, with the capacity, for their own profit as well as for the use of the government in its money transactions, of issuing bills which under ordinary circumstances pass from hand to hand as money at their nominal value, and which, when so current, the law has always recognized as a good tender in payment of money debts, unless specifically objected to at the time of the tender. United States Bank v. Bank of Georgia, 10 Wheat. 333, 347; Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall. 447, 451. The power of Congress to charter a bank was maintained in M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat.

316, and in Osborn v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat. 738, chiefly upon the ground that it was an appropriate means for carrying on the money transactions of the government. But Chief Justice Marshall said: "The currency which it circulates, by means of its trade with individuals, is believed to make it a more fit instrument for the purposes of government than it could otherwise be; and if this be true, the capacity to carry on this trade is a faculty indispensable to the character and objects of the institution." 9 Wheat. 864. And Mr. Justice Johnson, who concurred with the rest of the court in upholding the power to incorporate a bank, gave the further reason that it tended to give effect to "that power over the currency of the country, which the framers of the Constitution evidently intended to give to Congress alone." Ib. 873.

The constitutional authority of Congress to provide a currency for the whole country is now firmly established. In Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, 548, Chief Justice Chase, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It cannot be doubted that under the Constitution the power to provide a circulation of coin is given to Congress. And it is settled by the uniform practice of the government, and by repeated decisions, that Congress may constitutionally authorize the emission of bills of credit." Congress, having undertaken to supply a national currency, consisting of coin, of treasury notes of the United States, and of the bills of national banks, is authorized to impose on all state banks, or national banks, or private bankers, paying out the notes of individuals or of state banks, a tax of ten per cent upon the amount of such notes so paid out. Veazie Bank v. Fenno, above cited; National Bank v. United States, 101 U. S. 1. The reason for this conclusion was stated by Chief Justice Chase, and repeated by the present Chief Justice, in these words: "Having thus, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers, undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it cannot be questioned that Congress may, constitutionally, secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation. To this end, Congress has denied the quality of legal tender to foreign coins, and has provided by law against the imposition of counterfeit and base coin on the community. To the same end, Congress may restrain, by suitable enactments, the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its own authority. Without this power, indeed, its attempts to secure a sound and uniform currency for the country must be futile." 8 Wall. 549; 101 U. S. 6.

By the Constitution of the United States, the several states are prohibited from coining money, emitting bills of credit, or making anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts. But no intention can be inferred from this to deny to Congress either of these powers. Most of the powers granted to Congress are described in the eighth section of the first article; the limitations intended to be set to its powers, so as to exclude certain things which might otherwise be taken to be included in the general grant, are defined in the ninth section; the tenth section is addressed to the states only. This section prohibits the states from doing some things which the United States are expressly prohibited from doing, as well as from doing some things which the United States are expressly authorized to do, and from doing some things which are neither expressly granted nor expressly denied to the United States. Congress and the states equally are expressly prohibited from passing any bill of attainder or ex post facto law, or granting any title of nobility. The states are forbidden, while the president and senate are expressly authorized, to make treaties. The states are forbidden, but Congress is expressly authorized, to coin money. The states are prohibited from emitting bills of credit; but Congress, which is neither expressly authorized nor expressly forbidden to do so, has, as we have already seen, been held to have the power of emitting bills of credit, and of making every provision for their circulation as currency, short of giving them the quality of legal tender for private debts—even by those who have denied its authority to give them this quality.

It appears to us to follow, as a logical and necessary consequence, that Congress has the power to issue the obligations of the United States in such form, and to impress upon them such qualities as currency for the purchase of merchandise and the payment of debts, as accord with the usage of sovereign governments. The power, as incident to the power of borrowing money and issuing bills or notes of the government for money borrowed, of impressing upon those bills or notes the quality of being a legal tender for the payment of private debts, was a power universally understood to belong to sovereignty, in Europe and America, at the time of the framing and adoption of the Constitution of the United States. The governments of Europe, acting through the monarch or the legislature, according to the distribution of powers under their respective constitutions, had and have as sovereign a power of issuing paper money as of stamping coin. * * * The power of issuing bills of credit, and making them, at the discretion of the legislature, a tender in payment of private debts, had long been exercised in this country by the several colonies and states; and during the Revolutionary War the states, upon the recommendation of the Congress of the Confederation, had made the bills issued by Congress a legal tender. See Craig v. Missouri, 4 Pet. 435, 453; Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet. 257, 313, 334-336; Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 557, 558, 622; Phillips on American Paper Currency, passim. The exercise of this power not being prohibited to Congress by the Constitution, it is included in the power expressly granted to borrow money on the credit of the United States.

This position is fortified by the fact that Congress is vested with the exclusive exercise of the analogous power of coining money and regulating the value of domestic and foreign coin, and also with the paramount power of regulating foreign and interstate commerce. Under the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to issue circulating notes for the money borrowed, its power to define the quality and force of those notes as currency is as broad as the like power over a metallic currency under the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. Under the two powers, taken together, Congress is authorized to establish a national currency, either in coin or in paper, and to make that currency lawful money for all purposes, as regards the national government or private individuals.

The power of making the notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts, being included in the power to borrow money and to provide a national currency, is not defeated or restricted by the fact that its exercise may affect the value of private contracts. If, upon a just and fair interpretation of the whole Constitution, a particular power or authority appears to be vested in Congress, it is no constitutional objection to its existence, or to its exercise, that the property or the contracts of individuals may be incidentally affected. The decisions of this court, already cited, afford several examples of this. * * *

So, under the power to coin money and to regulate its value, Congress may (as it did with regard to gold by the Act of June 28th, 1834, c. 95, and with regard to silver by the Act of February 28th, 1878, c. 20), issue coins of the same denominations as those already current by law, but of less intrinsic value than those, by reason of containing a less weight of the precious metals, and thereby enable debtors to discharge their debts by the payment of coins of the less real value. A contract to pay a certain sum in money, without any stipulation as to the kind of money in which it shall be paid, may always be satisfied by payment of that sum in any currency which is lawful money at the place and time at which payment is to be made. * * *

Congress, as the legislature of a sovereign nation, being expressly empowered by the Constitution, "to lay and collect taxes, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States," and "to borrow money on the credit of the United States," and "to coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin;" and being clearly authorized, as incidental to the exercise of those great powers, to emit bills of credit, to charter national banks, and to provide a national currency for the whole people, in the form of coin, treasury notes, and national bank bills: and the power to make the notes of the government a legal tender in payment of private debts being one of the powers belonging to sovereignty in other civilized nations, and not expressly withheld from Congress by the Constitution; we are irresistibly impelled to the conclusion that the impressing upon the treasury notes of the United States the quality of being a legal tender in payment of private debts is an appropriate means, conducive and plainly adapted to the execution of the undoubted powers of Congress, consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and therefore, within the meaning of that instrument, "necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by this Constitution in the government of the United States."

Such being our conclusion in matter of law, the question whether at any particular time, in war or in peace, the exigency is such, by reason of unusual and pressing demands on the resources of the government, or of the inadequacy of the supply of gold and silver coin to furnish the currency needed for the uses of the government and of the people, that it is, as matter of fact, wise and expedient to resort to this means, is a political question, to be determined by Congress when the question of exigency arises, and not a judicial question, to be afterwards passed upon by the courts.

[Field, J., delivered a dissenting opinion.]

CHILD LABOR TAX CASE.

BAILEY v. DREXEL FURNITURE COMPANY.

1922. Supreme Court of the United States. 259 U. S. 20.

Mr. Chief Justice Taft delivered the opinion of the court.

"This case presents the question of the constitutional validity of the Child Labor Tax Law. The plaintiff below, the Drexel Furniture Company, is engaged in the manufacture of furniture in the Western District of North Carolina. On September 20, 1921, it received a notice from Bailey, United States Collector of Internal Revenue for the district, that it had been assessed $6,312.79 for having during the taxable year 1919 employed and permitted to work in its factory a boy under fourteen years of age, thus incurring the tax of ten per cent. on its net profits for that year. The company paid the tax under protest, and after rejection of its claim for a refund, brought this suit. On demurrer to an amended complaint, judgment was entered for the Company against the Collector for the full amount with interest. The writ of error is prosecuted by the Collector direct from the District Court under § 238 of the Judicial Code.

The Child Labor Tax Law is Title XII of an Act entitled "An Act To provide revenue, and for other purposes", approved February 24, 1919, c. 18, 40 Stat. 1057, 1138. The heading of the title is "Tax on Employment of Child Labor." It begins with § 1200 and includes eight sections. Section 1200 is as follows:

"Sec. 1200. That every person (other than a bona fide boys' or girls' canning club recognized by the Agricultural Department of a State and of the United States) operating (a) any mine or quarry situated in the United States in which children under the age of sixteen years have been employed or permitted to work during any portion of the taxable year; or (b) any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment situated in the United States in which children under the age of fourteen years have been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of fourteen and sixteen have been employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of seven o'clock post meridian, or before the hour of six o'clock ante meridian, during any portion of the taxable year, shall pay for each taxable year, in addition to all other taxes imposed by law, an excise tax equivalent to 10 per centum of the entire net profits received or accrued for such year from the sale or disposition of the product of such mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment."

Section 1203 relieves from liability to the tax any one who employs a child, believing him to be of proper age, relying on a certificate to this effect issued by persons prescribed by a board consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of Labor, or issued by state authorities. The section also provides in paragraph (b) that "the tax imposed by this title shall not be imposed in the case of any person who proves to the satisfaction of the Secretary that the only employment or permission to work which but for this section would subject him to the tax, has been of a child employed or permitted to work under a mistake of fact as to the age of such child, and without intention to evade the tax."

Section 1206 gives authority to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or any other person authorized by him, "to enter and inspect at any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment." The Secretary of Labor, or any person whom he authorizes, is given like authority in order to comply with a request of the commissioner to make such inspection and report the same. Any person who refuses entry or obstructs inspection is made subject to fine or imprisonment or both.

The law is attacked on the ground that it is a regulation of the employment of child labor in the states—an exclusively state function under the federal Constitution and within the reservations of the Tenth Amendment. It is defended on the ground that it is a mere excise tax levied by the Congress of the United States under its broad power of taxation conferred by § 8, Article I, of the federal Constitution. We must construe the law and interpret the intent and meaning of Congress from the language of the act. The words are to be given their ordinary meaning unless the context shows that they are differently used. Does this law impose a tax with only that incidental restraint and regulation which a tax must inevitably involve? Or does it regulate by the use of the so-called tax as a penalty? If a tax, it is clearly an excise. If it were an excise on a commodity or other thing of value we might not be permitted under previous decisions of this court to infer solely from its heavy burden that the act intends a prohibition instead of a tax. But this act is more. It provides a heavy exaction for a departure from a detailed and specified course of conduct in business. That course of business is that employers shall employ in mines and quarries, children of an age greater than sixteen years; in mills and factories, children of an age greater than fourteen years, and shall prevent children of less than sixteen years in mills and factories from working more than eight hours a day or six days in the week. If an employer departs from this prescribed course of business, he is to pay to the government one-tenth of his entire net income in the business for a full year. The amount is not to be proportioned in any degree to the extent or frequency of the departures, but is to be paid by the employer in full measure whether he employs five hundred children for a year, or employs only one for a day. Moreover, if he does not know the child is within the named age limit, he is not to pay; that is to say, it is only where he knowingly departs from the prescribed course that payment is to be exacted. Scienter is associated with penalties not with taxes. The employer's factory is to be subject to inspection at any time not only by the taxing officers of the Treasury, the Department normally charged with the collection of taxes, but also by the Secretary of Labor and his subordinates whose normal function is the advancement and protection of the welfare of the workers. In the light of these features of the act, a court must be blind not to see that the so-called tax is imposed to stop the employment of children within the age limits prescribed. Its prohibitory and regulatory effect and purpose are palpable. All others can see and understand this. How can we properly shut our minds to it?

It is the high duty and function of this court in cases regularly brought to its bar to decline to recognize or enforce seeming laws of Congress, dealing with subjects not entrusted to Congress but left or committed by the supreme law of the land to the control of the states. We can not avoid the duty even though it require us to refuse to give effect to legislation designed to promote the highest good. The good sought in unconstitutional legislation is an insidious feature because it leads citizens and legislators of good purpose to promote it without thought of the serious breach it will make in the ark of our covenant or the harm which will come from breaking down recognized standards. In the maintenance of local self government, on the one hand, and the national power, on the other, our country has been able to endure and prosper for near a century and a half.

Out of a proper respect for the acts of a coordinate branch of the government, this court has gone far to sustain taxing acts as such, even though there has been ground for suspecting from the weight of the tax it was intended to destroy its subject. But, in the act before us, the presumption of validity cannot prevail, because the proof of the contrary is found on the very face of its provisions. Grant the validity of this law, and all that Congress would need to do, hereafter, in seeking to take over to its control any one of the great number of subjects of public interest, jurisdiction of which the states have never parted with, and which are reserved to them by the Tenth Amendment, would be to enact a detailed measure of complete regulation of the subject and enforce it by a so-called tax upon departures from it. To give such magic to the word "tax" would be to break down all constitutional limitation of the powers of Congress and completely wipe out the sovereignty of the states.

The difference between a tax and a penalty is sometimes difficult to define and yet the consequences of the distinction in the required method of their collection often are important. Where the sovereign enacting the law has power to impose both tax and penalty the difference between revenue production and mere regulation may be immaterial, but not so when one sovereign can impose a tax only, and the power of regulation rests in another. Taxes are occasionally imposed in the discretion of the legislature on proper subjects with the primary motive of obtaining revenue from them and with the incidental motive of discouraging them by making their continuance onerous. They do not lose their character as taxes because of the incidental motive. But there comes a time in the extension of the penalizing features of the so-called tax when it loses its character as such and becomes a mere penalty with the characteristics of regulation and punishment. Such is the case in the law before us. Although Congress does not invalidate the contract of employment or expressly declare that the employment within the mentioned ages is illegal, it does exhibit its intent practically to achieve the latter result by adopting the criteria of wrongdoing and imposing its principal consequence on those who transgress its standard.

The case before us can not be distinguished from that of Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S. 251. Congress there enacted a law to prohibit transportation in interstate commerce of goods made at a factory in which there was employment of children within the same ages and for the same number of hours a day and days in a week as are penalized by the act in this case. This court held the law in that case to be void. It said:

"In our view the necessary effect of this act is, by means of a prohibition against the movement in interstate commerce of ordinary commercial commodities, to regulate the hours of labor of children in factories and mines within the states, a purely state authority."

In the case at the bar, Congress in the name of a tax which on the face of the act is a penalty seeks to do the same thing, and the effort must be equally futile.

The analogy of the Dagenhart Case is clear. The congressional power over interstate commerce is, within its proper scope, just as complete and unlimited as the congressional power to tax, and the legislative motive in its exercise is just as free from judicial suspicion and inquiry. Yet when Congress threatened to stop interstate commerce in ordinary and necessary commodities, unobjectionable as subjects of transportation, and to deny the same to the people of a state in order to coerce them into compliance with Congress's regulation of state concerns, the court said this was not in fact regulation of interstate commerce, but rather that of state concerns and was invalid. So here the so-called tax is a penalty to coerce people of a state to act as Congress wishes them to act in respect of a matter completely the business of the state government under the federal Constitution. This case requires as did the Dagenhart Case the application of the principle announced by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 423, in a much quoted passage:

"Should Congress, in the execution of its powers, adapt measures which are prohibited by the Constitution; or should Congress, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the government; it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say, that such an act was not the law of the land."

But it is pressed upon us that this court has gone so far in sustaining taxing measures the effect or tendency of which was to accomplish purposes not directly within congressional power that we are bound by authority to maintain this law. [Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533 was here distinguished.]

The next case is that of McCray v. United States, 195 U. S. 27. That, like the Veazie Bank Case, was the increase of an excise tax upon a subject properly taxable in which the taxpayers claimed that the tax had become invalid because the increase was excessive. It was a tax on oleomargarine, a substitute for butter. The tax on the white oleomargarine was one-quarter of a cent a pound, and on the yellow oleomargarine was first two cents and was then by the act in question increased to ten cents per pound. This court held that the discretion of Congress in the exercise of its constitutional powers to levy excise taxes could not be controlled or limited by the courts because the latter might deem the incidence of the tax oppressive or even destructive. It was the same principle as that applied in the Veazie Bank Case. This was that Congress in selecting its subjects for taxation might impose the burden where and as it would and that a motive disclosed in its selection to discourage sale or manufacture of an article by a higher tax than on some other did not invalidate the tax. In neither of these cases did the law objected to show on its face as does the law before us the detailed specifications of a regulation of a state concern and business with a heavy exaction to promote the efficacy of such regulation.

The third case is that of Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U. S. 107.

The fourth case is United States v. Doremus,[4] 249 U. S. 86. That involved the validity of the Narcotic Drug Act, 38 Stat. 785, which imposed a special tax on the manufacture, importation and sale or gift of opium or coca leaves or their compounds or derivatives. It required every person subject to the special tax to register with the Collector of Internal Revenue his name and place of business and forbade him to sell except upon the written order of the person to whom the sale was made on a form prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The vender was required to keep the order for two years, and the purchaser to keep a duplicate for the same time and both were to be subject to official inspection. Similar requirements were made as to sales upon prescriptions of a physician and as to the dispensing of such drugs directly to a patient by a physician. The validity of a special tax in the nature of an excise tax on the manufacture, importation and sale of such drugs was, of course, unquestioned. The provisions for subjecting the sale and distribution of the drugs to official supervision and inspection were held to have a reasonable relation to the enforcement of the tax and were therefore held valid.

[4] Before and since this decision the Harrison Narcotic Drug Act, U. S. C. Title 26, § 211 has been questioned and as to some of its details the more restricted of two meanings has been adopted because the other would raise grave doubts of its validity in these respects. United States v. Jin Fuey Moy (1916) 241 U. S. 394, 60 L. ed. 1061; Linder v. United States (1925) 268 U. S. 5, 69 L. ed. 819. A provision of the act not involved in the above cases was sustained in Alston v. United States (1927) 274 U. S. 289, 71 L. ed. 1052.

The court said that the act could not be declared invalid just because another motive than taxation, not shown on the face of the act, might have contributed to its passage. This case does not militate against the conclusion we have reached in respect of the law now before us. The court, there, made manifest its view that the provisions of the so-called taxing act must be naturally and reasonably adapted to the collection of the tax and not solely to the achievement of some other purpose plainly within state power.

For the reasons given, we must hold the Child Labor Tax Law invalid and the judgment of the District Court is

[5] In Hill v. Wallace (1922) 259 U. S. 44, 66 L. ed. 822, the act of Congress, Aug. 24, 1921 (42 Stat. 187, c. 86) entitled: "An Act taxing contracts for the sale of grain for future delivery, and options for such contracts, and providing for the regulation of boards of trade, and for other purposes" was held invalid. In addition to a tax of 2 cents on every $100 of value imposed by a prior law, this statute imposed a tax of 20 cents a bushel for every bushel involved in every such contract with exception that the 20 cent tax should not apply to such sales when made by or through a board of trade designated by the Secretary of Agriculture who was authorized to designate only such boards of trade as complied with the several detailed requirements referred to by Taft, C. J., who for the court said:

"It is impossible to escape the conviction, from a full reading of this law, that it was enacted for the purpose of regulating the conduct of business of boards of trade through supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture and the use of an administrative tribunal consisting of that Secretary, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Attorney General. Indeed the title of the act recites that one of its purposes is the regulation of boards of trade. As the bill shows, the imposition of 20 cents a bushel on the various grains affected by the tax is most burdensome. The tax upon contracts for sales for future delivery under the Revenue Act is only 2 cents upon $100 of value, whereas this tax varies according to the price and character of the grain from 15 per cent. of its value to 50 per cent. The manifest purpose of the tax is to compel boards of trade to comply with regulations, many of which can have no relevancy to the collection of the tax at all. Even if we conceded, as we do not, that the keeping of a memorandum and of the particulars of each sale as a record for three years or more, not only of contracts for future delivery, but also of cash sales, neither of which are subject to tax in designated boards of trade, would help taxing officers in any way to detect the evasions of this tax outside of such boards, no such construction can be put upon the provisions which require the board of trade to prevent a dissemination of false or misleading reports or to prevent the manipulation of prices or the cornering of grain or which enforce the admission to membership in the board of the representatives of co-operative associations of producers or the abrogation of rules against rebate as applied to such representatives. The act is in essence and on its face a complete regulation of boards of trade, with a penalty of 20 cents a bushel on all 'futures' to coerce boards of trade and their members into compliance. When this purpose is declared in the title to the bill, and is so clear from the effect of the provisions of the bill itself, it leaves no ground upon which the provisions we have been considering can be sustained as a valid exercise of the taxing power. The elaborate machinery for hearings by the Secretary of Agriculture and by the commission of violations of these regulations, with the withdrawal by the commission of the designation of the board as a contract market, and of complaints against persons who violate the act or such regulations, and the imposition upon them of the penalty of requiring all boards of trade to refuse to permit them the usual privileges, only confirm this view.

"Our decision, just announced, in the Child Labor Tax Case, [259 U. S. 20],

KANSAS v. COLORADO ET AL.

1907. Supreme Court of the United States. 206 U. S. 46.

[The State of Kansas brought this original suit in the Supreme Court to restrain the State of Colorado and certain corporations organized under the latter's laws from diverting the water of the Arkansas River for irrigation of lands in Colorado thereby, as alleged, preventing the natural and customary flow of the river into and through Kansas. The United States filed an intervention petition claiming a right to control the water of the river to aid in the reclamation of arid lands.]

MR. JUSTICE BREWER delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

The primary question is, of course, of national control. For, if the nation has a right to regulate the flow of the waters, we must inquire what it has done in the way of regulation. If it has done nothing the further question will then arise, what are the respective rights of the two states in the absence of national regulation? Congress has, by virtue of the grant to it of power to regulate commerce "among the several States," extensive control over the highways, natural or artificial, upon which such commerce may be carried. It may prevent or remove obstructions in the natural waterways and preserve the navigability of those ways. In United States v. Rio Grande Irrigation Company, 174 U. S. 690, in which was involving the constitutional validity of the Child Labor Tax Law, completely covers this case. We there distinguish between cases like Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, and McCray v. United States, 195 U. S. 27, in which it was held that this court could not limit the discretion of Congress in the exercise of its constitutional powers to levy excise taxes because the court might deem the incidence of the tax oppressive or even destructive. It was pointed out that in none of those cases did the law objected to show on its face, as did the Child Labor Tax Law, detailed regulation of a concern or business wholly within the police power of the state, with a heavy exaction to promote the efficacy of such regulation."

In holding that Congress could not by legislation enacted prior to the 17th Amendment (Query whether it now may do so?) control expenditures of candidates in party primaries running for nomination as candidates for election to the United States Senate, it was said: "Many things are prerequisites to elections or may affect their outcome—voters, education, means of transportation, health, public discussion, immigration, private animosities, even the face and figure of the candidate; but authority to regulate the manner of holding them gives no right to control any of these. It is settled, e. g., that the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce does not reach whatever is essential thereto. Without agriculture, manufacturing, mining, etc., commerce could not exist, but this fact does not suffice to subject them to the control of Congress. Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1. * * *

"We cannot conclude that authority to control party primaries or conventions for designating candidates was bestowed on Congress by the grant of power to regulate the manner of holding elections. The fair intendment of the words does not extend so far; the framers of the Constitution did not ascribe to them any such meaning. Nor is this control necessary in order to effectuate the power expressly granted." Reynolds, J., in Newberry v. United States (1921) 256 U. S. 232, 257, 258, 65 L. ed. 913.

considered the validity of the appropriation of the water of a stream by virtue of local legislation, so far as such appropriation affected the navigability of the stream, we said (p. 703):

> "Although this power of changing the common law rule as to streams within its dominion undoubtedly belongs to each state, yet two limitations must be recognized: First, that in the absence of specific authority from Congress a state cannot by its legislation destroy the right of the United States, as the owner of lands bordering on a stream, to the continued flow of its waters; so far at least as may be necessary for the beneficial uses of the government property. Second, that it is limited by the superior power of the general government to secure the uninterrupted navigability of all navigable streams within the limits of the United States. In other words, the jurisdiction of the general government over interstate commerce and its natural highways vests in that government the right to take all needed measures to preserve the navigability of the navigable watercourses of the country even against any state action."

It follows from this that if in the present case the National Government was asserting, as against either Kansas or Colorado, that the appropriation for the purposes of irrigation of the waters of the Arkansas was affecting the navigability of the stream, it would become our duty to determine the truth of the charge. But the government makes no such contention. On the contrary, it distinctly asserts that the Arkansas River is not now and never was practically navigable beyond Fort Gibson in the Indian Territory, and nowhere claims that any appropriation of the waters by Kansas or Colorado affects its navigability.

✓ It rests its petition of intervention upon its alleged duty of legislating for the reclamation of arid lands; alleges that in or near the Arkansas River, as it runs through Kansas and Colorado, are large tracts of those lands; that the national government is itself the owner of many thousands of acres; that it has the right to make such legislative provision as in its judgment is needful for the reclamation of all these arid lands and for that purpose to appropriate the accessible waters.

In support of the main proposition it is stated in the brief of its counsel:

> "That the doctrine of riparian rights is inapplicable to conditions prevailing in the arid region; that such doctrine, if applicable in said region, would prevent the sale, reclamation, and cultivation of the public arid lands, and defeat the policy of the government in respect thereto; that the doctrine which is applicable to conditions in said arid region, and which prevails therein, is that the waters of natural streams may be used to irrigate and cultivate arid lands, whether riparian or non-riparian, and that the priority of appropriation of such waters and the application of the same for beneficial purposes establishes a prior and superior right."

In other words, the determination of the rights of the two states inter sese in regard to the flow of waters in the Arkansas River is subordinate to a superior right on the part of the national government to control the whole system of the reclamation of arid lands. That involves the question whether the reclamation of arid lands is one of the powers granted to the general government. As heretofore stated, the constant declaration of this court from the beginning is that this government is one of enumerated powers. "The government, then, of the United States, can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted, must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication." Story, J., in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. 304, 326. "The Government of the United States is one of delegated, limited, and enumerated powers." United States v. Harris, 106 U. S. 629, 635.

Turning to the enumeration of the powers granted to Congress by the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, it is enough to say that no one of them by any implication refers to the reclamation of arid lands. The last paragraph of the section which authorizes Congress to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof, is not the delegation of a new and independent power, but simply provision for making effective the powers theretofore mentioned. The construction of that paragraph was precisely stated by Chief Justice Marshall in these words: "We think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional"—a statement which has become the settled rule of construction. From this and other declarations it is clear that the Constitution is not to be construed technically and narrowly, as an indictment, or even as a grant presumably against the interest of the grantor, and passing only that which is clearly included within its language, but as creating a system of government whose provisions are designed to make effective and operative all the governmental powers granted. Yet while so construed it still is true that no independent and unmentioned power passes to the National Government or can rightfully be exercised by the Congress.

We must look beyond section 8 for Congressional authority over arid lands, and it is said to be found in the second paragraph of section 3 of Article IV, reading: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

The full scope of this paragraph has never been definitely settled. Primarily, at least, it is a grant of power to the United States of control over its property. That is implied by the words "territory or other property." It is true it has been referred to in some decisions as granting political and legislative control over the Territories as distinguished from the states of the union. It is unnecessary in the present case to consider whether the language justifies this construction. Certainly we have no disposition to limit or qualify the expressions which have heretofore fallen from this court in respect thereto. But clearly it does not grant to Congress any legislative control over the states, and must, so far as they are concerned, be limited to authority over the property belonging to the United States within their limits. Appreciating the force of this, counsel for the government relies upon "the doctrine of sovereign and inherent power," adding "I am aware that in advancing this doctrine I seem to challenge great decisions of the court, and I speak with deference." His argument runs substantially along this line: All legislative power must be vested in either the state or the national government; no legislative powers belong to a state government other than those which affect solely the internal affairs of that state; consequently all powers which are national in their scope must be found vested in the Congress of the United States. But the proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the nation as a whole which belong to, although not expressed in the grant of powers, is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a government of enumerated powers.[6] That this is such a government clearly appears from the Constitution, independently of the Amendments, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting certain specified things made operative to grant other and distinct things. This natural construction of the original body of the Constitution is made absolutely certain by the Tenth Amendment. This amendment, which was seemingly adopted with prescience of just such contention as the present, disclosed the widespread fear that the National Government might, under the pressure of a supposed general welfare, attempt to exercise powers which had not been granted. With equal determination the framers intended that no such assumption should ever find justification in the organic act, and that if in the future further powers seemed necessary they should be granted by the people in the manner they had provided for amending that act. It reads: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The argument of counsel ignores the principal factor in this article, to wit, "the people." Its principal purpose was not the distribution of power between the United States and the states, but a reservation to the people of all powers not granted. The preamble of the Constitution declares who framed it, "we the people of the United States," not the people of one state, but the people of all the states, and Article X reserves to the people of all the states the powers not delegated to the United States. The powers affecting the internal affairs of the states not granted to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, and all powers of a national character which are not delegated to the national government by the Constitution are reserved to the people of the United States. The people who adopted the Constitution knew that in the nature of things they could not foresee all the questions which might arise in the future, all the circumstances which might call for the exercise of further national powers than those granted to the United States, and after making provision for an amendment to the Constitution by which any needed additional powers would be granted, they reserved to themselves all powers not so delegated. This Article X is not to be shorn of its meaning by any narrow or technical construction, but is to be considered fairly and liberally so as to give effect to its scope and meaning. * * *

[6] And see the remarks of the same Justice, in United States ex rel. Turner v. Williams (1904) 194 U. S. 279, 295-296, 48 L. ed. 979, printed ante p. 210.

This very matter of the reclamation of arid lands illustrates this: At the time of the adoption of the Constitution within the known and conceded limits of the United States there were no large tracts of arid land, and nothing which called for any further action than that which might be taken by the legislature of the state, in which any particular tract of such land was to be found, and the Constitution, therefore, makes no provisions for a national control of the arid regions or their reclamation. But, as our national territory has been enlarged, we have within our borders extensive tracts of arid lands which ought to be reclaimed, and it may well be that no power is adequate for their reclamation other than that of the national government. But if no such power has been granted, none can be exercised. * * *

But it is useless to pursue the inquiry further in this direction. It is enough for the purposes of this case that each state has full jurisdiction over the lands within its borders, including the beds of streams and other waters. * * * It may determine for itself whether the common law rule in respect to riparian rights or that doctrine which obtains in the arid regions of the West of the appropriation of waters for the purposes of irrigation shall control. Congress cannot enforce either rule upon any state. It is undoubtedly true that the early settlers brought to this country the common law of England, and that that common law throws light on the meaning and scope of the Constitution of the United States, and is also in many states expressly recognized as of controlling force in the absence of express statute. * * *

Now the question arises between two states, one recognizing generally the common law rule of riparian rights and the other prescribing the doctrine of the public ownership of flowing water. Neither state can legislate for or impose its own policy upon the other. A stream flows through the two and a controversy is presented as to the flow of that stream. It does not follow, however, that because Congress cannot determine the rule which shall control between the two states or because neither state can enforce its own policy upon the other, that the controversy ceases to be one of a justiciable nature, or that there is no power which can take cognizance of the controversy and determine the relative rights of the two states. Indeed, the disagreement, coupled with its effect upon a stream passing through the two states, makes a matter for investigation and determination by this court. It has been said that there is no common law of the United States as distinguished from the common law of the several states. This contention was made in Western Union Telegraph Company v. Call Publishing Company, 181 U. S. 92, in which it was asserted that, as Congress having sole jurisdiction over interstate commerce had prescribed no rates for interstate telegraph communications, there was no limit on the power of a telegraph company in respect thereto. After referring to the general contention, we said (pp. 101, 102):

"Properly understood, no exceptions can be taken to declarations of this kind. There is no body of federal common law separate and distinct from the common law existing in the several states[7] in the sense that there is a body of statute law enacted by Congress separate and distinct from the body of statute law enacted by the several states. But it is an entirely different thing to hold that there is no common law in force generally throughout the United States, and that the countless multitude of interstate commercial transactions are subject to no rules and burdened by no restrictions other than those expressed in the statutes of Congress. * * * Can it be that the great multitude of interstate commercial transactions are freed from the burdens created by the common law as so defined, and are subject to no rule except that to be found in the statutes of Congress? We are clearly of opinion that this cannot be so, and that the principles of the common law are operative upon all interstate commercial transactions except so far as they are modified by Congressional enactment."

[7] When federal courts have jurisdiction of a case solely because of diversity of citizenship of the parties, and the case requires the application of the common law of a state there is a settled practice of those courts to form a judgment as to what is that common law independently of decisions by the courts of that state. The types of cases in which this practice is indulged in and those in which the state court decisions are followed is usually discussed in courses on conflict of laws. Distinguish this practice from the doctrine above; namely, that there is no common law of the United States. The practice itself is acutely criticised in the dissenting opinion of Holmes, J. in Black & White Taxicab & Transfer Co. v. Brown & Yellow Taxicab & Transfer Co. (1928) — U. S. —, 48 Sup. Ct. 404, 72 L. ed. —.

What is the common law? Kent says (vol. 1, p. 471):

"The common law includes those principles, usages and rules of action applicable to the government and security of persons and property, which do not rest for their authority upon any express and positive declaration of the will of the legislature."

As it does not rest on any statute or other written declaration of the sovereign, there must, as to each principle thereof, be a first statement. Those statements are found in the decisions of courts, and the first statement presents the principle as certainly as the last. Multiplication of declarations merely adds certainty. For after all, the common law is but the accumulated expressions of the various judicial tribunals in their efforts to ascertain what is right and just between individuals in respect to private disputes. As Congress cannot make compacts between the states, as it cannot, in respect to certain matters, by legislation compel their separate action, disputes between them must be settled either by force or else by appeal to tribunals empowered to determine the right and wrong thereof. Force under our system of government is eliminated. The clear language of the Constitution vests in this court the power to settle those disputes. We have exercised that power in a variety of instances, determining in the several instances the justice of the dispute. Nor is our jurisdiction ousted, even if, because Kansas and Colorado are states sovereign and independent in local matters, the relations between them depend in any respect upon principles of international law. International law is no alien in this tribunal. In The Paquete Habana, 175 U. S. 677, 700, Mr. Justice Gray declared:

"International law is part of our law, and must be ascertained and administered by the courts of justice of appropriate jurisdiction, as often as questions of right depending upon it are duly presented for their determination."

And in delivering the opinion on the demurrer in this case Chief Justice Fuller said (185 U. S. 146):

"Sitting, as it were, as an international, as well as a domestic tribunal, we apply federal law, state law, and international law, as the exigencies of the particular case may demand."

One cardinal rule, underlying all the relations of the states to each other, is that of equality of right. Each state stands on the same level with all the rest. It can impose its own legislation on no one of the others, and is bound to yield its own views to none. Yet, whenever, as in the case of Missouri v. Illinois, 180 U. S. 208, the action of one state reaches through the agency of natural laws into the territory of another state, the question of the extent and the limitations of the rights of the two states becomes a matter of justiciable dispute between them, and this court is called upon to settle that dispute in such a way as will recognize the equal rights of both and at the same time establish justice between them. In other words, through these successive disputes and decisions this court is practically building up what may not improperly be called interstate common law. * * *

It is the State of Kansas which invokes the action of this court, charging that through the action of Colorado a large portion of its territory is threatened with disaster. In this respect it is in no manner evading the provisions of the Eleventh Amendment to the federal Constitution. It is not acting directly and solely for the benefit of any individual citizen to protect his riparian rights. Beyond its property rights it has an interest as a state in this large tract of land bordering on the Arkansas River. Its prosperity affects the general welfare of the state. The controversy rises, therefore, above a mere question of local private right and involves a matter of state interest, and must be considered from that standpoint. Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., [206 U. S. 230.]

This changes in some respect the scope of our inquiry. It is not limited to the simple matter of whether any portion of the waters of the Arkansas is withheld by Colorado. We must consider the effect of what has been done upon the conditions in the respective states and so adjust the dispute upon the basis of equality of rights as to secure as far as possible to Colorado the benefits of irrigation without depriving Kansas of the like beneficial effects of a flowing stream. A little reflection will make this clear. Suppose the controversy was between two individuals, upper and lower riparian owners on a little stream with rocky bank and rocky bottom. The question properly might be limited to the single one of the diminution of the flow by the upper riparian proprietor. The lower riparian proprietor might insist that he was entitled to the full, undiminished and unpolluted flow of the water of the stream as it had been wont to run. It would not be a defense on the part of the upper riparian proprietor that by the use to which he had appropriated the water he had benefited the lower proprietor, or that the latter had received in any other respects an equivalent. The question would be one of legal right, narrowed to place, amount of flow and freedom from pollution.

We do not intimate that entirely different considerations obtain in a controversy between two states. Colorado could not be upheld in appropriating the entire flow of the Arkansas River, on the ground that it is willing to give, and does give, to Kansas something else which may be considered of equal value. That would be equivalent to this court's making a contract between the two states, and that it is not authorized to do. But we are justified in looking at the question not narrowly and solely as to the amount of the flow in the channel of the Arkansas River, inquiring merely whether any portion thereof is appropriated by Colorado, but we may properly consider what, in case a portion of that flow is appropriated by Colorado, are the effects of such appropriation upon Kansas territory. For instance, if there be many thousands of acres in Colorado destitute of vegetation, which by the taking of water from the Arkansas River and in no other way can be made valuable as arable lands producing an abundance of vegetable growth, and this transformation of desert land has the effect, through percolation of water in the soil, or in any other way, of giving to Kansas territory, although not in the Arkansas Valley, a benefit from water as great as that which would enure by keeping the flow of the Arkansas in its channel undiminished, then we may rightfully regard the usefulness to Colorado as justifying its action, although the locality of the benefit which the flow of the Arkansas through Kansas has territorially changed. [Upon extended consideration of the evidence the court concluded that there were offsetting benefits resulting to Kansas such that she made out no sufficient present injury from the acts of Colorado to entitle her to equitable relief.]

The decree which, therefore, will be entered will be one dismissing the petition of the intervenor, without prejudice to the rights of the United States to take such action as it shall deem necessary to preserve or improve the navigability of the Arkansas River. The decree will also dismiss the bill of the State of Kansas as against all the defendants, without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to institute new proceedings whenever it shall appear that through a material increase in the depletion of the waters of the Arkansas by Colorado, its corporations or citizens, the substantial interests of Kansas are being injured to the extent of destroying the equitable apportionment of benefits between the two states resulting from the flow of the river. Each party will pay its own costs. * * *

Mr. Justice White and Mr. Justice McKenna concur in the result. Mr. Justice Moody took no part in the decision of this case.[8]

UNITED STATES v. ARJONA.

1887. Supreme Court of United States. 120 U. S. 479.

Indictment under the act of May 16, 1884, 23 Stat. 22, to prevent and punish the counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds, and other securities of foreign governments. The court below certified a division in opinion on several points.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court.

Congress has power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the government of the United States, Art. I, Sec. 8, Cl. 18; and the government of the United States has been vested exclusively with the power of representing the nation in all its intercourse with foreign countries. It alone can "regulate commerce with foreign nations," Art. I, Sec. 8, Cl. 3; make treaties and appoint ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls. Art. II, Sec. 2, Cl. 2. A state is expressly prohibited from entering into any "treaty, alliance, or confederation." Art. I, Sec. 10, Cl. 1. Thus all official intercourse between a state and foreign nations is prevented, and exclusive authority for that purpose given to the United States. The national government is in this way made responsible to foreign nations for all violations by the United States of their international obligations, and because of this, Congress is expressly authorized "to define and punish * * * offences against the law of nations." Art. I, Sec. 8, Cl. 10.

The law of nations requires every national government to use "due diligence" to prevent a wrong being done within its own dominion to another nation with which it is at peace, or to the people thereof; and because of this the obligation of one nation to punish those who within its own jurisdiction counterfeit the money of another nation has long been recognized. Vattel, in his Law of Nations, which was first printed at Neuchatel in 1758, and was translated into English and published in England in 1760, uses this language: "From the principles thus laid down, it is easy to conclude, that if one nation counterfeits the money of another, or if she allows and protects false coiners who presume to do it, she does that nation an injury." When this was written money was the chief thing of this kind that needed protection, but still it was added: "There is another custom more modern, and of no less use to commerce than the establishment of coin, namely, exchange, or the traffic of bankers, by means of which a merchant remits immense sums from one end of the world to the other, at very trifling expense, and, if he pleases, without risk. For the same reason that sovereigns are obliged to protect commerce, they are obliged to support this custom, by good laws, in which every merchant, whether citizen or foreigner, may find security. In general, it is equally the interest and duty of every nation to have wise and equitable commercial laws established in the country." Vattel, Law of Nations, Phil. ed. 1876, Book I, chap. 10, pages 46, 47. In a note by Mr. Chitty in his London edition of 1834 it is said: "This is a sound principle, which ought to be extended so as to deny effect to any fraud upon a foreign nation or its subjects." Id. 47, note 50. * * *

[8] Did the Supreme Court in making choice of the principle of justice, rule of law or rule of right by which it decided favorably to the defendant act as a lawgiver filling a gap in the national law which Congress was not authorized to fill, and as to which the nation had not legislated by its direct process of making provision in the Constitution? Is the central government of the United States one of "enumerated" powers or is it only Congress that is confined to enumerated purposes of legislation? Consider later whether the treaty-making authority in the central government is restricted to enumerated purposes in law-making.

In the time of Vattel certificates of the public debt of a nation, government bonds, and other government securities, were rarely seen in any other country than that in which they were put out. Banks of issue were not so common as to need special protection for themselves or the public against forgers and counterfeiters elsewhere than at home, and the great corporations, now so numerous and so important, established by public authority for the promotion of public enterprises, were almost unknown, and certainly they had not got to be extensive borrowers of money wherever it could be had at home or abroad on the faith of their quasi public securities. Now, however, the amount of national and corporate debt and of corporate property represented by bonds, certificates, notes, bills, and other forms of commercial securities, which are bought and sold in all the money markets of the world, both in and out of the country under whose authority they were created, is something enormous. * * *

No nation can be more interested in this question than the United States. Their money is practically composed of treasury notes or certificates issued by themselves, or of bank bills issued by banks created under their authority and subject to their control. Their own securities, and those of the states, the cities, and the public corporations, whose interests abroad they alone have the power to guard against foreign national neglect, are found on sale in the principal money markets of Europe. If these securities, whether national, municipal, or corporate, are forged and counterfeited with impunity at the places where they are sold, it is easy to see that a great wrong will be done to the United States and their people. Any uncertainty about the genuineness of the security necessarily depreciates its value as a merchantable commodity, and against this international comity requires that national protection shall, as far as possible, be afforded. If there is neglect in that, the United States may, with propriety, call on the proper government to provide for the punishment of such an offence, and thus secure the restraining influences of a fear of the consequences of wrong doing. A refusal may not, perhaps, furnish sufficient cause for war, but it would certainly give just ground of complaint, and thus disturb that harmony between the governments which each is bound to cultivate and promote.

But if the United States can require this of another, that other may require it of them, because international obligations are of necessity reciprocal in their nature. The right, if it exists at all, is given by the law of nations, and what is law for one is, under the same circumstances, law for the other. A right secured by the law of nations to a nation, or its people, is one the United States as the representatives of this nation are bound to protect. Consequently, a law which is necessary and proper to afford this protection is one that Congress may enact, because it is one that is needed to carry into execution a power conferred by the Constitution on the government of the United States exclusively. There is no authority in the United States to require the passage and enforcement of such a law by the states. Therefore the United States must have the power to pass it and enforce it themselves, or be unable to perform a duty which they may owe to another nation, and which the law of nations has imposed on them as part of their international obligations. This, however, does not prevent a state from providing for the punishment of the same thing; for here, as in the case of counterfeiting the coin of the United States, the act may be an offence against the authority of a state as well as that of the United States.

Again, our own people may be dealers at home in the public or quasi public securities of a foreign government, or of foreign banks or corporations, brought here in the course of our commerce with foreign nations, or sent here from abroad for sale in the money markets of this country. As such they enter into and form part of the foreign commerce of the country. If such securities can be counterfeited here with impunity, our own people may be made to suffer by a wrong done which affects a business that has been expressly placed by the Constitution under the protection of the government of the United States.

It remains only to consider those questions which present the point whether, in enacting a statute to define and punish an offence against the law of nations, it is necessary, in order "to define" the offence, that it be declared in the statute itself to be "an offence against the law of nations." This statute defines the offence, and if the thing made punishable is one which the United States are required by their international obligations to use due diligence to prevent, it is an offence against the law of nations. Such being the case, there is no more need of declaring in the statute that it is such an offence than there would be in any other criminal statute to declare that it was enacted to carry into execution any other particular power vested by the Constitution in the government of the United States. Whether the offence as defined is an offence against the law of nations depends on the thing done, not on any declaration to that effect by Congress. As has already been seen, it was incumbent on the United States as a nation to use due diligence to prevent any injury to another nation or its people by counterfeiting its money, or its public or quasi public securities. This statute was enacted as a means to that end, that is to say, as a means of performing a duty which had been cast on the United States by the law of nations, and it was clearly appropriate legislation for that purpose. * * *

STATE OF MISSOURI v. HOLLAND.

1920. Supreme Court of United States. 252 U. S. 416.

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a bill in equity brought by the State of Missouri to prevent a game warden of the United States from attempting to enforce the Migratory Bird Treaty Act of July 3, 1918, c. 128, 40 Stat. 755, and the regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture in pursuance of the same. The ground of the bill is that the statute is an unconstitutional interference with the rights reserved to the states by the Tenth Amendment, and that the acts of the defendant done and threatened under that authority invade the sovereign right of the state and contravene its will manifested in statutes. The state also alleges a pecuniary interest, as owner of the wild birds within its borders and otherwise, admitted by the government to be sufficient, but it is enough that the bill is a reasonable and proper means to assert the alleged quasi sovereign rights of a state. Kansas v. Colorado, 185 U. S. 125, 142. Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230, 237. Marshall Dental Manufacturing Co. v. Iowa, 226 U. S. 460, 462. A motion to dismiss was sustained by the District Court on the ground that the act of Congress is constitutional. 258 Fed. Rep. 479. Accord, United States v. Thompson, 258 Fed.

Rep. 257; United States v. Rockefeller, 260 Fed. Rep. 346. The state appeals.

On December 8, 1916, a treaty between the United States and Great Britain was proclaimed by the President. It recited that many species of birds in their annual migrations traversed certain parts of the United States and of Canada, that they were of great value as a source of food and in destroying insects injurious to vegetation, but were in danger of extermination through lack of adequate protection. It therefore provided for specified close seasons and protection in other forms, and agreed that the two powers would take or propose to their law-making bodies the necessary measures for carrying the treaty out. 39 Stat. 1702. The above mentioned Act of July 3, 1918, entitled an act to give effect to the convention, prohibited the killing, capturing or selling any of the migratory birds included in the terms of the treaty except as permitted by regulations compatible with those terms, to be made by the Secretary of Agriculture. Regulations were proclaimed on July 31, and October 25, 1918. 40 Stat. 1812; 1863. It is unnecessary to go into any details, because, as we have said, the question raised is the general one whether the treaty and statute are void as an interference with the rights reserved to the states. ?

To answer this question it is not enough to refer to the Tenth Amendment, reserving the powers not delegated to the United States, because by Article II, § 2, the power to make treaties is delegated expressly, and by Article VI treaties made under the authority of the United States, along with the Constitution and laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, are declared the supreme law of the land. If the treaty is valid there can be no dispute about the validity of the statute under Article I, § 8, as a necessary and proper means to execute the powers of the Government. The language of the Constitution as to the supremacy of treaties being general, the question before us is narrowed to an inquiry into the ground upon which the present supposed exception is placed.

It is said that a treaty cannot be valid if it infringes the Constitution, that there are limits, therefore, to the treaty-making power, and that one such limit is that what an act of Congress could not do unaided, in derogation of the powers reserved to the states, a treaty cannot do. An earlier act of Congress that attempted by itself and not in pursuance of a treaty to regulate the killing of migratory birds within the states had been held bad in the District Court. United States v. Shauver, 214 Fed. Rep. 154. United States v. McCullagh, 221 Fed. Rep. 288. Those decisions were supported by arguments that migratory birds were owned by the states in their sovereign capacity for the benefit of their people, and that under cases like Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, this control was one that Congress had no power to displace. The same argument is supposed to apply now with equal force.

Whether the two cases cited were decided rightly or not they cannot be accepted as a test of the treaty power. Acts of Congress are the supreme law of the land only when made in pursuance of the Constitution, while treaties are declared to be so when made under the authority of the United States. It is open to question whether the authority of the United States means more than the formal acts prescribed to make the convention. We do not mean to imply that there are no qualifications to the treaty-making power; but they must be ascertained in a different way. It is obvious that there may be matters of the sharpest exigency for the national well being that an act of Congress could not deal with but that a treaty followed by such an act could, and it is not lightly to be assumed that, in matters requiring national action, "a power which must belong to and somewhere reside in every civilized government" is not to be found. Andrews v. Andrews, 188 U. S. 14, 33. What was said in that case with regard to the powers of the states applies with equal force to the powers of the nation in cases where the states individually are incompetent to act. We are not yet discussing the particular case before us but only are considering the validity of the test proposed. With regard to that we may add that when we are dealing with words that also are a constituent act, like the Constitution of the United States, we must realize that they have called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters. It was enough for them to realize or to hope that they had created an organism; it has taken a century and has cost their successors much sweat and blood to prove that they created a nation. The case before us might be considered in the light of our whole experience and not merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago. The treaty in question does not contravene any prohibitory words to be found in the Constitution. The only question is whether it is forbidden by some invisible radiation from the general terms of the Tenth Amendment. We must consider what this country has become in deciding what that Amendment has reserved.

The state as we have intimated found its claim of exclusive authority upon an assertion of title to migratory birds, an assertion that is embodied in statute. No doubt it is true that as between a state and its inhabitants the state may regulate the killing and sale of such birds, but it does not follow that its authority is exclusive of paramount powers. To put the claim of the state upon title is to lean upon a slender reed. Wild birds are not in the possession of anyone; and possession is the beginning of ownership. The whole foundation of the state's rights is the presence within their jurisdiction of birds that yesterday had not arrived, tomorrow may be in another state and in a week a thousand miles away. If we are to be accurate we cannot put the case of the state upon higher ground than that the treaty deals with creatures that for the moment are within the state borders, that it must be carried out by officers of the United States within the same territory, and that but for the treaty the state would be free to regulate this subject itself.

As most of the laws of the United States are carried out within the states and as many of them deal with matters which in the silence of such laws the state might regulate, such general grounds are not enough to support Missouri's claim. Valid treaties of course "are as binding within the territorial limits of the states as they are elsewhere throughout the dominion of the United States." Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S. 678, 683. No doubt the great body of private relations usually fall within the control of the state, but a treaty may override its power. We do not have to invoke the later developments of constitutional law for this proposition; it was recognized as early as Hopkirk v. Bell, 3 Cranch, 454, with regard to statutes of limitations, and even earlier, as to confiscation, in Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. 199. It was assumed by Chief Justice Marshall with regard to the escheat of land to the state in Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat. 259, 275; Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483; Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258; Blythe v. Hinckley, 180 U. S. 333, 340. So as to a limited jurisdiction of foreign consuls within a state. Wildenhus's Case, 120 U. S. 1. See Ross v. McIntyre, 140 U. S. 453. Further illustration seems unnecessary, and it only remains to consider the application of established rules to the present case.

Here a national interest of very nearly the first magnitude is involved. It can be protected only by national action in concert with that of another power. The subject-matter is only transitory within the state and has no permanent habitat therein. But for the treaty and the statute there soon might be no birds for any powers to deal with. We see nothing in the Constitution that compels the Government to sit by while a food supply is cut off and the protectors of our forests and our crops are destroyed. It is not sufficient to rely upon the states. The reliance is vain, and were it otherwise, the question is whether the United States is forbidden to act. We are of opinion that the treaty and statute must be upheld. Carey v. South Dakota, 250 U. S. 118.

CIVIL RIGHTS CASES.

1883. Supreme Court of the United States. 109 U. S. 3.

These cases were all founded on the first and second sections of the act of Congress, known as the Civil Rights Act, passed March 1st, 1875, entitled "An Act to protect all Citizens in their Civil and Legal Rights." 18 Stat. 335. Two of the cases, those against Stanley and Nichols, were indictments for denying to persons of color the accommodations and privileges of an inn or hotel; two of them, those against Ryan and Singleton, were, one an information, the other an indictment, for denying to individuals the privileges and accommodations of a theatre, the information against Ryan being for refusing a colored person a seat in the dress circle of Maguire's theatre in San Francisco; and the indictment against Singleton was for denying to another person, whose color was not stated, the full enjoyment of the accommodations of the theatre known as the Grand Opera House in New York, "said denial not being made for any reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude." * * * The cases of Stanley, Nichols, and Singleton, came up on certificates of division of opinion between the judges below as to the constitutionality of the first and second sections of the act referred to; and the case of Ryan, on a writ of error to the judgment of the Circuit Court for the District of California sustaining a demurrer to the information.

The Stanley, Ryan, Nichols, and Singleton cases were submitted together, by the Solicitor-General at the last term of court, on the 7th day of November, 1882. There were no appearances and no briefs filed for the defendants. [The statute is printed below.][10]

[10] "SEC. 1. That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theatres, and other places of public amusement; subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

"SEC. 2. That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in an action of debt, with full costs; and shall also, for every such offence, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year: Provided, That all persons may elect to sue for the penalty aforesaid, or to proceed under their rights at common law and by State statutes; and having so elected to proceed in the one mode or the other, their right to proceed in the other jurisdiction shall be barred. But this provision shall not apply to criminal

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court.

2. It is obvious that the primary and important question in all the cases is the constitutionality of the law: for if the law is unconstitutional none of the prosecutions can stand. * * *

Are these sections constitutional? The first section, which is the principle one, cannot be fairly understood without attending to the last clause, which qualifies the preceding part.

The essence of the law is, not to declare broadly that all persons shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances, and theatres; but that such enjoyment shall not be subject to any conditions applicable only to citizens of a particular race or color, or who had been in a previous condition of servitude. In other words, it is the purpose of the law to declare that, in the enjoyment of the accommodations and privileges of inns, public conveyances, theatres, and other places of public amusement, no distinction shall be made between citizens of different race or color, or between those who have, and those who have not, been slaves. Its effect is to declare, that in all inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement, colored citizens, whether formerly slaves or not, and citizens of other races, shall have the same accommodations and privileges in all inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement as are enjoyed by white citizens; and vice versa. The second section makes it a penal offence in any person to deny to any citizen of any race or color, regardless of previous servitude, any of the accommodations or privileges mentioned in the first section.

Has Congress constitutional power to make such a law? Of course, no one will contend that the power to pass it was contained in the Constitution before the adoption of the last three amendments. The power is sought, first, in the Fourteenth Amendment, and the views and arguments of distinguished senators, advanced whilst the law was under consideration, claiming authority to pass it by virtue of that amendment, are the principal arguments adduced in favor of the power. We have carefully considered those arguments, as was due to the eminent ability of those who put them forward, and have felt, in all its force, the weight of authority which always invests a law that Congress deems itself competent to pass. But the responsibility of an independent judgment is now thrown upon this court; and we are bound to exercise it according to the best lights we have.

The first section of the Fourteenth Amendment (which is the one relied on), after declaring who shall be citizens of the United States, proceedings, either under this Act or the criminal law of any State: And provided further, That a judgment for the penalty in favor of the party aggrieved, or a judgment upon an indictment, shall be a bar to either prosecution respectively."

and of the several States, is prohibitory in its character, and prohibitory upon the states. It declares that:

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

It is state action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject-matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all state legislation, and state action of every kind, which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, or which injures them in life, liberty or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the laws. It not only does this, but, in order that the national will, thus declared, may not be a mere brutum fulmen, the last section of the amendment invests Congress with power to enforce it by appropriate legislation. To enforce what? To enforce the prohibition. To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited state laws and state acts, and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous. This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it. It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of state legislation; but to provide modes of relief against state legislation, or state action, of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights; but to provide modes of redress against the operation of state laws, and the action of state officers executive or judicial, when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment. Positive rights and privileges are undoubtedly secured by the Fourteenth Amendment; but they are secured by way of prohibition against state laws and state proceedings affecting those rights and privileges, and by power given to Congress to legislate for the purpose of carrying such prohibition into effect: and such legislation must necessarily be predicated upon such supposed state laws or state proceedings, and be directed to the correction of their operation and effect. A quite full discussion of this aspect of the amendment may be found in United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542; Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313; and Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339.

An apt illustration of this distinction may be found in some of the provisions of the original Constitution. Take the subject of contracts, for example. The Constitution prohibited the states from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. This did not give to Congress power to provide laws for the general enforcement of contracts; nor power to invest the courts of the United States with jurisdiction over contracts, so as to enable parties to sue upon them in those courts. It did, however, give the power to provide remedies by which the impairment of contracts by state legislation might be counteracted and corrected: and this power was exercised. The remedy which Congress actually provided was that contained in the 25th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 85, giving to the Supreme Court of the United States jurisdiction by writ of error to review the final decisions of state courts whenever they should sustain the validity of a state statute or authority alleged to be repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States. By this means, if a state law was passed impairing the obligation of a contract, and the state tribunals sustained the validity of the law, the mischief could be corrected in this court. The legislation of Congress, and the proceedings provided for under it, were corrective in their character. No attempt was made to draw into the United States courts the litigation of contracts generally; and no such attempt would have been sustained. We do not say that the remedy provided was the only one that might have been provided in that case. Probably Congress had power to pass a law giving to the courts of the United States direct jurisdiction over contracts alleged to be impaired by a state law; and under the broad provisions of the Act of March 3d, 1875, ch. 137, 18 Stat. 470, giving to the circuit courts jurisdiction of all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, it is possible that such jurisdiction now exists. But under that, or any other law, it must appear as well by allegation, as proof at the trial, that the Constitution had been violated by the action of the state legislature. Some obnoxious state law passed, or that might be passed, is necessary to be assumed in order to lay the foundation of any federal remedy in the case; and for the very sufficient reason, that the constitutional prohibition is against state laws impairing the obligation of contracts.

And so in the present case, until some state law has been passed, or some state action through its officers or agents has been taken, adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceeding under such legislation, can be called into activity: for the prohibitions of the amendment are against state laws and acts done under state authority. Of course, legislation may, and should be, provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises; but it should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the amendment was intended to provide against; and that is, state laws, or state action of some kind, adverse to the rights of the citizen secured by the amendment. Such legislation cannot properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty and property, defining them and providing for their vindication. That would be to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights between man and man in society. It would be to make Congress take the place of the state legislatures and to supersede them. It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty and property (which include all civil rights that men have), are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the state without due process of law, Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case; and that, because the denial by a state to any persons, of the equal protection of the laws, is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection. In fine, the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizen, but corrective legislation, that is, such as may be necessary and proper for counteracting such laws as the states may adopt or enforce, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from making or enforcing, or such acts and proceedings as the states may commit or take, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from committing or taking. It is not necessary for us to state, if we could, what legislation would be proper for Congress to adopt. It is sufficient for us to examine whether the law in question is of that character.

An inspection of the law shows that it makes no reference whatever to any supposed or apprehended violation of the Fourteenth Amendment on the part of the states. It is not predicated on any such view. It proceeds ex directo to declare that certain acts committed by individuals shall be deemed offences, and shall be prosecuted and punished by proceedings in the courts of the United States. It does not profess to be corrective of any constitutional wrong committed by the states; it does not make its operation to depend upon any such wrong committed. It applies equally to cases arising in states which have the justest laws respecting the personal rights of citizens, and whose authorities are ever ready to enforce such laws, as to those which arise in states that may have violated the prohibition of the amendment. In other words, it steps into the domain of local jurisprudence, and lays down rules for the conduct of individuals in society towards each other, and imposes sanctions for the enforcement of those rules, without referring in any manner to any supposed action of the state or its authorities.

If this legislation is appropriate for enforcing the prohibitions of the amendment, it is difficult to see where it is to stop. Why may not Congress with equal show of authority enact a code of laws for the enforcement and vindication of all rights of life, liberty, and property? If it is supposable that the states may deprive persons of life, liberty, and property without due process of law (and the amendment itself does suppose this), why should not Congress proceed at once to prescribe due process of law for the protection of every one of these fundamental rights, in every possible case, as well as to prescribe equal privileges in inns, public conveyances, and theatres? The truth is, that the implication of a power to legislate in this manner is based upon the assumption that if the states are forbidden to legislate or act in a particular way on a particular subject, and power is conferred upon Congress to enforce the prohibition, this gives Congress power to legislate generally upon that subject, and not merely power to provide modes of redress against such state legislation or action. The assumption is certainly unsound. It is repugnant to the Tenth Amendment of the Constitution, which declares that powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively or to the people.

We have not overlooked the fact that the fourth section of the act now under consideration has been held by this court to be constitutional. That section declares "that no citizen, possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid, shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than five thousand dollars." In Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, it was held that an indictment against a state officer under this section for excluding persons of color from the jury list is sustainable. But a moment's attention to its terms will show that the section is entirely corrective in its character. Disqualifications for service on juries are only created by the law, and the first part of the section is aimed at certain disqualifying laws, namely, those which make mere race or color a disqualification; and the second clause is directed against those who, assuming to use the authority of the state government, carry into effect such a rule of disqualification. In the Virginia case, the state, through its officer, enforced a rule of disqualification which the law was intended to abrogate and counteract. Whether the statute-book of the state actually laid down any such rule of disqualification, or not, the state, through its officer, enforced such a rule: and it is against such state action, through its officers and agents, that the last clause of the section is directed. This aspect of the law was deemed sufficient to divest it of any unconstitutional character, and makes it differ widely from the first and second sections of the same act which we are now considering.

These sections, in the objectionable features before referred to, are different also from the law ordinarily called the "Civil Rights Bill," originally passed April 9th, 1866, 14 Stat. 27, ch. 31, and re-enacted with some modifications in sections 16, 17, 18, of the Enforcement Act, passed May 31st, 1870, 16 Stat. 140, ch. 114. That law, as re-enacted, after declaring that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every state and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses and exactions of every kind, and none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation or custom to the contrary notwithstanding, proceeds to enact, that any person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any inhabitant of any state or Territory to the deprivation of any rights secured or protected by the preceding section (above quoted), or to different punishment, pains, or penalties, on account of such person being an alien, or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of citizens, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to fine and imprisonment as specified in the act. This law is clearly corrective in its character, intended to counteract and furnish redress against state laws and proceedings, and customs having the force of law, which sanction the wrongful acts specified. In the Revised Statutes, it is true, a very important clause, to wit, the words "any law, statute, ordinance, regulation or custom to the contrary notwithstanding," which gave the declaratory section its point and effect, are omitted; but the penal part, by which the declaration is enforced, and which is really the effective part of the law, retains the reference to state laws, by making the penalty apply only to those who should subject parties to a deprivation of their rights under color of any statute, ordinance, custom, etc., of any state or Territory: thus preserving the corrective character of the legislation. Rev. St. §§ 1977, 1978, 1979, 5510. The Civil Rights Bill here referred to is analogous in its character to what a law would have been under the original Constitution, declaring that the validity of contracts should not be impaired, and that if any person bound by a contract should refuse to comply with it, under color or pretence that it had been rendered void or invalid by a state law, he should be liable to an action upon it in the courts of the United States, with the addition of a penalty for setting up such an unjust and unconstitutional defence.

In this connection it is proper to state that civil rights, such as are guaranteed by the Constitution against state aggression, cannot be impaired by the wrongful acts of individuals, unsupported by state authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings. The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any such authority, is simply a private wrong, or a crime of that individual; an invasion of the rights of the injured party, it is true, whether they affect his person, his property, or his reputation; but if not sanctioned in some way by the state, or not done under state authority, his rights remain in full force, and may presumably be vindicated by resort to the laws of the state for redress. An individual cannot deprive a man of his right to vote, to hold property, to buy and sell, to sue in the courts, or to be a witness or a juror; he may, by force or fraud, interfere with the enjoyment of the right in a particular case; he may commit an assault against the person, or commit murder, or use ruffian violence at the polls, or slander the good name of a fellow-citizen; but, unless protected in these wrongful acts by some shield of state law or state authority, he cannot destroy or injure the right; he will only render himself amenable to satisfaction or punishment; and amenable therefor to the laws of the state where the wrongful acts are committed. Hence, in all those cases where the Constitution seeks to protect the rights of the citizen against discriminative and unjust laws of the state by prohibiting such laws, it is not individual offences, but abrogation and denial of rights, which it denounces, and for which it clothes the Congress with power to provide a remedy. This abrogation and denial of rights, for which the states alone were or could be responsible, was the great seminal and fundamental wrong which was intended to be remedied. And the remedy to be provided must necessarily be predicated upon that wrong. It must assume that in the cases provided for, the evil or wrong actually committed rests upon some state law or state authority for its excuse and perpetration.

Of course, these remarks do not apply to those cases in which Congress is clothed with direct and plenary powers of legislation over the whole subject, accompanied with an express or implied denial of such power to the states, as in the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, among the several states, and with the Indian tribes, the coining of money, the establishment of post-offices and post-roads, the declaring of war, etc. In these cases Congress has power to pass laws for regulating the subjects specified in every detail, and the conduct and transactions of individuals in respect thereof. But where a subject is not submitted to the general legislative power of Congress, but is only submitted thereto for the purpose of rendering effective some prohibition against particular state legislation or state action in reference to that subject, the power given is limited by its object, and any legislation by Congress in the matter must necessarily be corrective in its character, adapted to counteract and redress the operation of such prohibited state laws or ~~proceedings of state~~ officers.

If the principles of interpretation which we have laid down are correct, as we deem them to be (and they are in accord with the principles laid down in the cases before referred to, as well as in the recent case of United States v. Harris, 106 U. S. 629), it is clear that the law in question cannot be sustained by any grant of legislative power made to Congress by the Fourteenth Amendment. That amendment prohibits the states from denying to any person the equal protection of the laws, and declares that Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of the amendment. The law in question, without any reference to adverse state legislation on the subject, declares that all persons shall be entitled to equal accommodations and privileges of inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusement, and imposes a penalty upon any individual who shall deny to any citizen such equal accommodations and privileges. This is not corrective legislation; it is primary and direct; it takes immediate and absolute possession of the subject of the right of admission to inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement. It supersedes and displaces state legislation on the same subject, or only allows it permissive force. It ignores such legislation, and assumes that the matter is one that belongs to the domain of national regulation. Whether it would not have been a more effective protection of the rights of citizens to have clothed Congress with plenary power over the whole subject, is not now the question. What we have to decide is, whether such plenary power has been conferred upon Congress by the Fourteenth Amendment; and, in our judgment, it has not.

We have discussed the question presented by the law on the assumption that a right to enjoy equal accommodation and privileges in all inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusement, is one of the essential rights of the citizen which no state can abridge or interfere with. Whether it is such a right, or not, is a different question which, in the view we have taken of the validity of the law on the ground already stated, it is not necessary to examine.

We have also discussed the validity of the law in reference to cases arising in the states only; and not in reference to cases arising in the Territories or the District of Columbia, which are subject to the plenary legislation of Congress in every branch of municipal regulation. Whether the law would be a valid one as applied to the Territories and the District is not a question for consideration in the cases before us: they all being cases arising within the limits of states. And whether Congress, in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce amongst the several states, might or might not pass a law regulating rights in public conveyances passing from one state to another, is also a question which is not now before us, as the sections in question are not conceived in any such view.

But the power of Congress to adopt direct and primary, as distinguished from corrective legislation, on the subject in hand, is sought, in the second place, from the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolishes slavery. This amendment declares "that neither slavery, nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction;" and it gives Congress power to enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation.

This amendment, as well as the Fourteenth, is undoubtedly self-executing without any ancillary legislation, so far as its terms are applicable to any existing state of circumstances. By its own unaided force and effect it abolished slavery, and established universal freedom. Still, legislation may be necessary and proper to meet all the various cases and circumstances to be affected by it, and to prescribe proper modes of redress for its violation in letter or spirit. And such legislation may be primary and direct in its character; for the amendment is not a mere prohibition of state laws establishing or upholding slavery, but an absolute declaration that slavery or involuntary servitude shall not exist in any part of the United States. * * *

The amendments are different, and the powers of Congress under them are different. What Congress has power to do under one, it may not have power to do under the other. Under the Thirteenth Amendment, it has only to do with slavery and its incidents. Under the Fourteenth Amendment, it has power to counteract and render nugatory all state laws and proceedings which have the effect to abridge any of the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, or to deprive them of life, liberty or property without due process of law, or to deny to any of them the equal protection of the laws. Under the Thirteenth Amendment, the legislation, so far as necessary or proper to eradicate all forms and incidents of slavery and involuntary servitude, may be direct and primary, operating upon the acts of individuals, whether sanctioned by state legislation or not; under the Fourteenth, as we have already shown, it must necessarily be, and can only be, corrective in its character, addressed to counteract and afford relief against state regulations or proceedings. * * * The Thirteenth Amendment has respect, not to distinctions of race, or class, or color, but to slavery. * * * It would be running the slavery argument into the ground to make it apply to every act of discrimination which a person may see fit to make as to the guests he will entertain, or as to the people he will take into his coach or cab or car, or admit to his concert or theatre, or deal with in other matters of intercourse or business.

Innkeepers and public carriers, by the laws of all states, so far as we are aware, are bound, to the extent of their facilities, to furnish proper accommodation to all unobjectionable persons who in good faith apply for them. If the laws themselves make any unjust discrimination, amenable to the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress has full power to afford a remedy under that amendment and in accordance with it. * * *

On the whole we are of opinion, that no countenance of authority for the passage of the law in question can be found in either the Thirteenth or Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution; and no other ground of authority for its passage being suggested, it must necessarily be declared void, at least so far as its operation in the several states is concerned.

[HARLAN, J., gave a dissenting opinion.]

HODGES v. UNITED STATES.

1906. Supreme Court of the United States. 203 U. S. 1.

On October 8, 1903, the grand jury returned into the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas an indictment charging that the defendants, (now plaintiffs in error) with others, "did knowingly, willfully and unlawfully conspire to oppress, threaten and intimidate Berry Winn, Dave Hinton, Percy Legg, Joe Mardis, Joe McGill, Dan Shelton, Jim Hall and George Shelton, citizens of the United States of African descent, in the free exercise and enjoyment of rights and privileges secured to them and each of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States and because of their having exercised the same, to wit: [The gist of the alleged offense was a conspiracy furthered by threats of violence to compel the eight citizens to abandon their employment in a lumber manufactory "because they were colored men and citizens of African descent," this color and descent being laid in the indictment as the motive for the conspiracy.]

A demurrer to this indictment, on the ground that the offense created by sections 1977 and 5508,[11] Rev. Stat., under which it was found, was not within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, but was judicially cognizable by state tribunals only, was overruled, a trial had, and the three plaintiffs in error found guilty, sentenced separately to imprisonment for different terms and to fine, and to be thereafter ineligible to any office of profit or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

[11] Section 5508 (now U. S. C. Title 18, Sec. 51). "Conspiracy to injure persons in exercise of civil rights. If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same, or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured, they shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than ten years, and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office, or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States."

"Sec. 1977. All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, to be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and to no other. * * *

There being constitutional questions involved, the judgment was brought directly to this court on writ of error.

MR. JUSTICE BREWER, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

That prior to the three post bellum Amendments to the Constitution the national government had no jurisdiction over a wrong like that charged in this indictment is conceded; that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments do not justify the legislation is also beyond dispute, for they, as repeatedly held, are restrictions upon state action, and no action on the part of the state is complained of. Unless, therefore, the Thirteenth Amendment vests in the nation the jurisdiction claimed the remedy must be sought through state action and in state tribunals subject to the supervision of this court by writ of error in proper cases.[12] * * *

Notwithstanding the adoption of these three Amendments, the national government still remains one of enumerated powers, and the Tenth Amendment, which reads "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," is not shorn of its vitality. True the Thirteenth Amendment grants certain specified and additional power to Congress, but any Congressional legislation directed against individual action which was not warranted before the Thirteenth Amendment must find authority in it. And in interpreting the scope of that Amendment it is well to bear in mind the words of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 188, which, though spoken more than four score years ago, are still the rule of construction of constitutional provisions:

[12] In the dissenting opinion it is said: "The objections urged to the view taken by the court are not met by the suggestion that this court may revise the final judgment of the state court, if it should deny to the complaining party a right secured by the federal Constitution; for the revisory power of this court would be of no avail to the complaining party if it be true, as seems now to be adjudged, that a conspiracy to deprive colored citizens, solely because of their race, of the right to earn a living in a lawful way, infringes no right secured to them by the federal Constitution."

"As men whose intentions require no concealment, generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed our Constitution, and the people who adopted it, must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said."

The Thirteenth Amendment reads:

"Sec. 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

"Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

The meaning of this is as clear as language can make it. The things denounced are slavery and involuntary servitude, and Congress is given power to enforce that denunciation. All understand by these terms a condition of enforced compulsory service of one to another. While the inciting cause of the Amendment was the emancipation of the colored race, yet it is not an attempt to commit that race to the care of the nation. It is the denunciation of a condition and not a declaration in favor of a particular people. It reaches every race and every individual, and if in any respect it commits one race to the nation it commits every race and every individual thereof. Slavery or involuntary servitude of the Chinese, of the Italian, of the Anglo-Saxon are as much within its compass as slavery or involuntary servitude of the African. * * *

A reference to the definitions in the dictionaries of words whose meaning is so thoroughly understood by all seems an affectation, yet in Webster "slavery" is defined as "the state of entire subjection of one person to the will of another." Even the secondary meaning given recognizes the fact of subjection, as "one who has lost the power of resistance; one who surrenders himself to any power whatever; as a slave to passion, to lust, to strong drink, to ambition," and "servitude" is by the same authority declared to be "the state of voluntary or compulsory subjection to a master."

It is said, however, that one of the disabilities of slavery, one of the indicia of its existence, was a lack of power to make or perform contracts, and that when these defendants, by intimidation and force, compelled the colored men named in the indictment to desist from performing their contract they to that extent reduced those parties to a condition of slavery, that is, of subjection to the will of defendants, and deprived them of a freeman's power to perform his contract. But every wrong done to an individual by another, acting singly or in concert with others, operates pro tanto to abridge some of the freedom to which the individual is entitled. A freeman has a right to be protected in his person from an assault and battery. He is entitled to hold his property safe from trespass or appropriation, but no mere personal assault or trespass or appropriation operates to reduce the individual to a condition of slavery. Indeed, this is conceded by counsel for the government, for in their brief (after referring to certain decisions of this court) it is said:

"With these decisions, and many others that might be cited, before us, it is vain to contend that the federal Constitution secures to a citizen of the United States the right to work at a given occupation or particular calling free from injury, oppression, or interference by individual citizens.

"Even though such right be a natural or inalienable right, the duty of protecting the citizen in the enjoyment of such right, free from individual interference, rests alone with the state.

"Unless, therefore, the additional element, to wit, the infliction of an injury upon one individual citizen by another, solely on account of his color, be sufficient ground to redress such injury the individual citizen suffering such injury must be left for redress of his grievance to the state laws."

The logic of this concession points irresistibly to the contention that the Thirteenth Amendment operates only to protect the African race. This is evident from the fact that nowhere in the record does it appear that the parties charged to have been wronged by the defendants had ever been themselves slaves, or were the descendants of slaves. They took no more from the Amendment than any other citizens of the United States. But if, as we have seen, that denounces a condition possible for all races and all individuals, then a like wrong perpetrated by white men upon a Chinese, or by black men upon a white man, or by any men upon any man on account of his race, would come within the jurisdiction of Congress, and that protection of individual rights which prior to the Thirteenth Amendment was unquestionably within the jurisdiction solely of the states, would by virtue of that Amendment be transferred to the nation, and subject to the legislation of Congress. * * *

For these reasons we think the United States court had no jurisdiction of the wrong charged in the indictment.

Judgments reversed.

Mr. Justice Brown concurs in the judgments. Mr. Justice Harlan, with whom concurs Mr. Justice Day, dissenting. [Dissenting opinion is omitted. It included this remark: "The opinion of the court, it may be observed, does not, in words, adjudge section 5508 to be unconstitutional. But if its scope and effect are not wholly misapprehended by me, the court does adjudge that Congress cannot make it an offense against the United States for individuals to combine or conspire to prevent, even by force, citizens of African descent, solely because of their race, from earning a living."]

JAMES v. BOWMAN.

1903. Supreme Court of the United States. 190 U. S. 127.

In December, 1900, an indictment was found by the United States District Court for the District of Kentucky against the appellee, Henry Bowman, and one Harry Weaver, based upon section 5507 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The indictment charged in substance that certain "men of African descent, colored men, negroes, and not white men," being citizens of Kentucky and of the United States, were, by means of bribery, unlawfully and feloniously intimidated and prevented from exercising their lawful right of voting at a certain election held in the Fifth Congressional District of Kentucky on the 8th day of November, 1898, for the election of a representative in the fifty-sixth Congress of the United States.

No allegation is made that the bribery was because of the race, color or previous condition of servitude of the men bribed. The appellee, Henry Bowman, having been arrested and held in default of bail, sued out a writ of habeas corpus on the ground of the unconstitutionality of section 5507. The District Judge granted the writ, following reluctantly the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, in Lackey v. United States, 46 C. C. A. 189; 107 Fed. Rep. 114. From that judgment the government has taken this appeal.

Section 5507[13] is as follows:

"Sec. 5507. Every person who prevents, hinders, controls, or intimidates another from exercising, or in exercising the right of suffrage, to whom that right is guaranteed by the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, by means of bribery or threats of depriving such person of employment or occupation, or of ejecting such person from a rented house, lands, or other property, or by threats of refusing to renew leases or contracts for labor, or by threats of violence to himself or family, shall be punished as provided in the preceding section."

The Fifteenth Amendment provides:

"Sec. 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

"Sec. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court.

The single question presented for our consideration is whether section 5507 can be upheld as a valid enactment, for if not, the indictment must also fall, and the defendant was rightfully discharged. On its face the section purports to be an exercise of the power granted to Congress by the Fifteenth Amendment, for it declares a punishment upon any one who by means of bribery prevents another to whom the right of suffrage is guaranteed by such amendment from exercising that right. But that amendment relates solely to action "by the United States or by any State," and does not contemplate wrongful individual acts. It is in this respect similar to * * * the Fourteenth Amendment. * * *

But we are not left alone to this reasoning from analogy. The Fifteenth Amendment itself has been considered by this court and the same limitations placed upon its provisions. In United States v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214, 217, we said:

"The Fifteenth Amendment does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one. It prevents the states, or the United States, however, from giving preference, in this particular, to one citizen of the United States over another on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Before its adoption this could be done. It was as much within the power of a state to exclude citizens of the United States from voting on account of race, etc., as it was on account of age, property or education. Now it is not. If citizens of one race having certain qualifications are permitted by law to vote, those of another having the same qualifications must be. Previous to this amendment, there was no constitutional guaranty against this discrimination: now there is. It follows that the amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right which is within the protecting power of Congress. That right is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. This, under the express provisions of the second section of the amendment, Congress may enforce by 'appropriate legislation.' "

In passing it may be noticed that this indictment charges no wrong done by the State of Kentucky, or by any one acting under its authority. The matter complained of was purely an individual act of the defendant. Nor is it charged that the bribery was on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. True, the parties who were bribed were alleged to be "men of African descent, colored men, negroes, and not white men," and again, that they were "persons to whom the right of suffrage and the right to vote was then and there guaranteed by the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States." But this merely describes the parties wronged as within the classes named in the amendment. They were not bribed because they were colored men, but because they were voters. No discrimination on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude is charged.

These authorities show that a statute which purports to punish purely individual action cannot be sustained as an appropriate exercise of the power conferred by the Fifteenth Amendment upon Congress to prevent action by the state through some one or more of its official representatives, and that an indictment which charges no discrimination on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude is likewise destitute of support by such amendment.

But the contention most earnestly pressed is that Congress has ample power in respect to elections of representatives in Congress; that the election which was held, and at which this bribery took place, was such an election; and that therefore under such general power this statute and this indictment can be sustained. The difficulty with this contention is that Congress has not by this section acted in the exercise of such power. It is not legislation in respect to elections of federal officers, but is levelled at all elections, state or federal and it does not purport to punish bribery of any voter, but simply of those named in the Fifteenth Amendment. On its face it is clearly an attempt to exercise power supposed to be conferred by the Fifteenth Amendment in respect to all elections, and not in pursuance of the general control by Congress over particular elections. To change this statute, enacted to punish bribery of persons named in the Fifteenth Amendment at all elections, to a statute punishing bribery of any voter at certain elections would be in effect judicial legislation. It would be wresting the statute from the purpose with which it was enacted and making it serve another purpose. Doubtless even a criminal statute may be good in part and bad in part, providing the two can be clearly separated, and it is apparent that the legislative body would have enacted the one without the other, but there are no two parts to the statute. If the contention be sustained it is simply a transformation of the statute in its single purpose and scope. * * *

Congress has no power to punish bribery at all elections. The limits of its power are in respect to elections in which the nation is directly interested, or in which some mandate of the national Constitution is disobeyed, and courts are not at liberty to take a criminal statute, broad and comprehensive in its terms and in these terms beyond the power of Congress, and change it to fix [fit] some particular transaction which Congress might have legislated for if it had seen fit.

The judgment of the District Court is

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE MCKENNA took no part in the decision of this case. MR. JUSTICE HARLAN and MR. JUSTICE BROWN dissented.

LOGAN v. UNITED STATES.

1892. Supreme Court of the United States. 144 U. S. 263.

The facts of this case are that five Marlow brothers and others were in the custody of a United States deputy marshal in the Northern District of Texas under commitment to answer a federal indictment on a charge of committing larceny in the Indian country, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. While these prisoners were being removed from one jail to another by the deputy marshal a large lynching party attacked them resulting in fatalities on both sides. Logan was suspected of being a member of the lynching party. He and others were indicted by a federal grand jury, under Rev. Stat. § 5508[14] charged with conspiracy to injure and oppress the prisoners, naming them, "citizens of the United States in the free exercise and enjoyment of a right secured to them by the Constitution and laws of the United States, to wit, the right to be protected by said deputy United States marshal from the assault of" the defendants and other evil-disposed persons and "the right to be held" in the custody of the deputy marshal. By a motion equivalent to a demurrer the defendants challenged the indictment as charging no offence against the laws of the United States or within the jurisdiction of the federal court but an offence, if any, against the laws of the State of Texas of which the state courts would have exclusive jurisdiction. This motion was over-ruled, and defendants excepted, were tried and convicted and now on error:[15]

MR. JUSTICE GRAY delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

The principal question in this case is whether the right of a citizen of the United States, in the custody of a United States marshal under a lawful commitment to answer for an offence against the United States, to be protected against lawless violence, is a right secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or whether it is a right which can be vindicated only under the laws of the several states. * * *

Although the Constitution contains no grant, general or specific, to Congress of the power to provide for the punishment of crimes, except piracies and felonies on the high seas, offences against the law of nations, treason, and counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States, no one doubts the power of Congress to provide for the punishment of all crimes and offences against the United States, whether committed within one of the states of the union, or within territory over which Congress has plenary and exclusive jurisdiction.

To accomplish this end, Congress has the right to enact laws for the arrest and commitment of those accused of any such crime or offence, and for holding them in safe custody until indictment and trial; and persons arrested and held pursuant to such laws are in the exclusive custody of the United States, and are not subject to the judicial process or executive warrant of any state. Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. 506; Tarble's Case, 13 Wall. 397; Robb v. Connolly, 111 U. S. 624. The United States, having the absolute right to hold such prisoners, have an equal duty to protect them, while so held, against assault or injury from any quarter. The existence of that duty on the part of the government necessarily implies a corresponding right of the prisoners to be so protected; and this right of the prisoners is a right secured to them by the Constitution and laws of the United States. * * *

The prisoners were in the exclusive custody and control of the United States, under the protection of the United States, and in the peace of the United States. There was a co-extensive duty on the part of the United States to protect against lawless violence persons so within their custody, control, protection and peace; and a corresponding right of those persons, secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States, to be so protected by the United States. If the officers of the United States, charged with the performance of the duty, in behalf of the United States, of affording that protection and securing that right, neglected or violated their duty, the prisoners were not the less under the shield and panoply of the United States.

The cases heretofore decided by this court, and cited in behalf of the plaintiffs in error, are in no way inconsistent with these views, but, on the contrary, contain much to support them. The matter considered in each of those cases was whether the particular right there in question was secured by the Constitution of the United States, and was within the acts of Congress. But the question before us is so important, and the learned counsel for the plaintiffs in error have so strongly relied on those cases, that it is fit to review them in detail. * * * [The Civil Rights Cases and others are here discussed.]

The whole scope and effect of this series of decisions is that, while certain fundamental rights, recognized and declared, but not granted or created, in some of the Amendments to the Constitution, are thereby guaranteed only against violation or abridgment by the United States, or by the states, as the case may be, and cannot therefore be affirmatively enforced by Congress against unlawful acts of individuals; yet that every right, created by, arising under or dependent upon, the Constitution of the United States, may be protected and enforced by Congress by such means and in such manner as Congress, in the exercise of the correlative duty of protection, or of the legislative powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, may in its discretion deem most eligible and best adapted to attain the object. * * *

In the case at bar, the right in question does not depend upon any of the Amendments to the Constitution, but arises out of the creation and establishment by the Constitution itself of a national government, paramount and supreme within its sphere of action. Any government which has power to indict, try and punish for crime, and to arrest the accused and hold them in safekeeping until trial, must have the power and the duty to protect against unlawful interference its prisoners so held, as well as its executive and judicial officers charged with keeping and trying them.

In the very recent Case of Neagle, 135 U. S. 1, at October term, 1889, it was held that, although there was no express act of Congress authorizing the appointment of a deputy marshal or other officer to attend a justice of this court while travelling in his circuit, and to protect him against assault or injury, it was within the power and the duty of the executive department to protect a judge of any of the courts of the United States, when there was just reason to believe that he would be in personal danger while executing the duties of his office; that an assault upon such a judge, while in discharge of his official duties, was a breach of the peace of the United States, as distinguished from the peace of the state in which the assault took place; and that a deputy marshal of the United States, specially charged with the duty of protecting and guarding a judge of a court of the United States, had imposed upon him the duty of doing whatever might be necessary for that purpose, even to the taking of human life.

In delivering judgment, Mr. Justice Miller, repeating the language used by Mr. Justice Bradley speaking for the court in Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 394, said: "It is argued that the preservation of peace and good order in society is not within the powers confided to the government of the United States, but belongs exclusively to the states. Here again we are met with the theory that the government of the United States does not rest upon the soil and territory of the country. We think that this theory is founded on an entire misconception of the nature and powers of that government. We hold it to be an incontrovertible principle, that the government of the United States may, by means of physical force, exercised through its official agents, execute on every foot of American soil the powers and functions that belong to it. This necessarily involves the power to command obedience to its laws, and hence the power to keep the peace to that extent." 135 U. S. 60. After further discussion of that question, and of the powers of sheriffs in the State of California, where the transaction took place, Mr. Justice Miller added: "That there is a peace of the United States; that a man assaulting a judge of the United States while in the discharge of his duties violates that peace; that in such case the marshal of the United States stands in the same relation to the peace of the United States which the sheriff of the county does to the peace of the State of California; are questions too clear to need argument to prove them." 135 U. S. 69.

The United States are bound to protect against lawless violence all persons in their service or custody in the course of the administration of justice. This duty and the correlative right of protection are not limited to the magistrates and officers charged with expounding and executing the laws, but apply, with at least equal force, to those held in custody on accusation of crime, and deprived of all means of self-defence.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the crime of which the plaintiffs in error were indicted and convicted was within the reach of the constitutional powers of Congress, and was covered by section 5508 of the Revised Statutes. * * *[16]

[16] In re Quarles (1895) 158 U. S. 532, 39 L. ed. 1080, Q and B were convicted under U. S. C. Title 18, § 51 of conspiracy to injure W because W had exercised a "right" to inform a United States deputy marshall that G had violated the internal revenue laws of the United States; and in furtherance of the conspiracy Q and B beat and bruised W. Without reference to any specific clause of the Constitution which secured this right to W or any other private citizen, the Supreme Court upon consideration of the merits refused to grant Q and B a habeas corpus. Gray, J., for the court, said: "Every right, created by, arising under, or dependent upon the Constitution, may be protected and enforced by such means and in such manner as Congress, in the exercise of the correlative duty of protection, or of the legislative powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, may in its discretion deem most eligible and best adapted to attain the object. United States v. Logan, 144 U. S. 293. * * * It is the duty and the right, not only of every peace officer of the United States, but of every citizen, to assist in prosecuting, and in securing the punishment of, any breach of the peace of the United States. It is the right, as well as the duty, of every citizen, when called upon by the proper officer, to act as part of the posse comitatus in upholding the laws of his country. It is likewise his right and his duty to communicate to the executive officers any information which he has of the commission of an offence against those laws: * * * The right of a citizen informing of a violation of law, like the right of a prisoner in custody upon a charge of such violation, to be protected against lawless violence, does not depend upon any of the Amendments to the Constitution, but arises out of the creation and establishment by the Constitution itself of a national government, paramount and supreme within its sphere of action. United States v. Logan, 144 U. S. 294. * * * To leave to the several states the prosecution and punishment of conspiracies to oppress citizens of the United States, in performing the duty and exercising the right of assisting to uphold and enforce the laws of the United States, would tend to defeat the independence and the supremacy of the national government." Accord: Motes v. United States (1900) 178 U. S. 458, 44 L. ed. 1150. The student should note that in sustaining the conviction by interpreting the statute to cover the conduct for which the accused were convicted, the court sustained the power of Congress to reach that conduct to the particular extent. Can Congress reach every conspiracy by two or more persons to injure a third, in the United States?

the following: "In United States v. Waddell, 112 U. S. 76, at October term, 1884, the court reaffirmed the constitutionality of section 5508 of the Revised Statutes, and speaking by the same eminent judge [Miller] said: 'The statute itself is careful to limit its operation to an obstruction or oppression in "the free exercise of a right or privilege secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having exercised such rights." The protection of this section extends to no other right, to no right or privilege dependent on a law or laws of the state. Its object is to guarantee safety and protection to persons in the exercise of rights dependent on the laws of the United States, including, of course, the Constitution and treaties as well as statutes, and it does not, in this section at least, design to protect any other rights.' 112 U. S. 79. The particular right, held in that case to be dependent on and secured by the laws of the United States, and to be protected by section 5508 of the Revised Statutes against interference by individuals, was the right of a citizen, having made a homestead entry on public land, within the limits of a state, to continue to reside on the land for five years, for the purpose of perfecting his title to a patent, under sections 2289-2291 of the Revised Statutes, of which the court said: 'The right here guaranteed is not the mere right of protection against personal violence. This, if the result of an ordinary quarrel or malice, would be cognizable under the laws of the state and by its courts. But it is something different from that. It is the right to remain on the land in order to perform the requirements of the act of Congress, and, according to its rules, perfect his incipient title. Whenever the acts complained of are of a character to prevent this, or throw obstruction in the way of exercising this right, and for the purpose and with intent to prevent it, or to injure or oppress a person because he has exercised it, then, because it is a right asserted under the law of the United States and granted by that law, those acts come within the purview of the statute and of the constitutional power of Congress to make such statute.' 112 U. S. 80."

Congress has power to legislate for the protection of an eligible voter's right to vote for members of Congress and a conspiracy between election officers not to count such votes is punishable under U. S. C. Title 18, § 51. United States v. Mosley (1915) 238 U. S. 383, 59 L. ed. 1355. Observe that the right to vote for members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate is conferred by the Constitution, though only upon such persons as by state law are qualified to vote for the more numerous branch of the state legislature. Constitution, Art. I, Sec. 2; Amendment XVII; Ex parte Yarbrough (1884) 110 U. S. 651, 28 L. ed. 274. Compare United States v. Gradwell (1917) 243 U. S. 476, 61 L. ed. 857 holding that rights of candidates in a primary for nomination to run for the United States Senate are not within the protection of U. S. C. Title 18, § 51 (Rev. Stats. § 5508, Penal Code § 19); nor does this section cover a conspiracy to bribe voters at an election at which presidential electors, a United States senator and a member of the House of Representatives are to be chosen. United States v. Bathgate (1918) 246 U. S. 220, 62 L. ed. 676. Note that the last two cases cited only interpret § 51 and do not pass upon the scope of the power of Congress.

the new Constitution, we were divided into independent states, united for some purposes, but, in most respects, sovereign. These states could exercise almost every legislative power, and, among others, that of passing bankrupt laws. When the American people created a national legislature, with certain enumerated powers, it was neither necessary nor proper to define the powers retained by the states. These powers proceed, not from the people of America, but from the people of the several states; and remain, after the adoption of the Constitution, what they were before, except so far as they may be abridged by that instrument. In some instances, as in making treaties, we find an express prohibition; and this shows the sense of the convention to have been, that the mere grant of a power to Congress did not imply a prohibition on the states to exercise the same power. But it has never been supposed, that this concurrent power of legislation extended to every possible case in which its exercise by the states has not been expressly prohibited. The confusion resulting from such a practice would be endless. The principle laid down by the counsel for the plaintiff, in this respect, is undoubtedly correct. Whenever the terms in which a power is granted to Congress, or the nature of the power, require that it should be exercised exclusively by Congress the subject is as completely taken from the state legislatures, as if they had been expressly forbidden to act on it.

"Is the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies, throughout the United States, of this description? * * * It is obvious that much inconvenience would result from that construction of the Constitution, which should deny to the state legislatures the power of acting on this subject, in consequence of the grant to Congress. It may be thought more convenient that much of it should be regulated by state legislation, and Congress may purposely omit to provide for many cases to which their power extends. It does not appear to be a violent construction of the Constitution, and is certainly a convenient one, to consider the power of the states as existing over such cases as the laws of the Union may not reach. But be this as it may, the power granted to Congress may be exercised or declined, as the wisdom of that body shall decide. If, in the opinion of Congress, uniform laws concerning bankruptcies ought not to be established, it does not follow that partial laws may not exist, or that state legislation on the subject must cease. It is not the mere existence of the power, but its exercise, which is incompatible with the exercise of the same power by the states. It is not the right to establish these uniform laws, but their actual establishment, which is inconsistent with the partial acts of the states."[17]

UNITED STATES v. LANZA ET AL.

1922. Supreme Court of the United States. 260 U. S. 377.

[The defendants were indicted in the United States District Court for the Western District of Washington charged with manufacturing intoxicating liquor, transporting it and having it in their possession in violation of the National Prohibition Act. The defendants pleaded in bar a prior conviction for the same acts in the Superior Court of Whatcomb County, State of Washington, wherein they had been tried upon an information charging them with having done these acts in violation of a state prohibition statute. The United States District Court sustained the plea and ordered the indictment dismissed. The United States took this writ of error under the Criminal Appeals Act (c. 2564, 34 Stat. 1246) to reverse the order.]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE TAFT delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

The Eighteenth Amendment is as follows:

"Section 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"Section 2. The Congress and the several states shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The defendants insist that two punishments for the same act, one under the National Prohibition Act and the other under a state law, constitute double jeopardy under the Fifth Amendment; and in support of this position it is argued that both laws derive their force from the same authority,—the second section of the Amend-vital importance also to state authority and state legislation, it is not to be admitted that a mere grant of such powers in affirmative terms to Congress, does, per se, transfer an exclusive sovereignty on such subjects to the latter. On the contrary, a reasonable interpretation of that instrument necessarily leads to the conclusion, that the powers so granted are never exclusive of similar powers existing in the states, unless where the constitution has expressly in terms given an exclusive power to Congress, or the exercise of a like power is prohibited to the states, or there is a direct repugnancy or incompatibility in the exercise of it by the states. The example of the first class is to be found in the exclusive legislation delegated to Congress over places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for forts, arsenals, dockyards, &c.; of the second class, the prohibition of a state to coin money or emit bills of credit; of the third class, as this Court have already held, the power to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and the delegation of admirality and maritime jurisdiction. In all other cases not falling within the classes already mentioned, it seems unquestionable that the states retain concurrent authority with Congress, not only upon the letter and spirit of the eleventh [tenth] amendment of the constitution, but upon the soundest principles of general reasoning." Story, J., in Houston v. Moore (1820) 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 1, 48-49, 5 L. ed. 19.

ment,—and therefore that in principle it is as if both punishments were in prosecutions by the United States in its courts.

Consideration of this argument requires an analysis of the reason and purpose of the second section of the Amendment. We dealt with both sections in the National Prohibition Cases, 253 U. S. 350. The conclusions of the Court, relevant here, are Nos. 6, 7, 8 and 9.

"6. The first section of the Amendment—the one embodying the prohibition—is operative throughout the entire territorial limits of the United States, binds all legislative bodies, courts, public officers and individuals within those limits, and of its own force invalidates every legislative act—whether by Congress, by a state legislature, or by a territorial assembly—which authorizes or sanctions what the section prohibits.

"7. The second section of the Amendment—the one declaring 'The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation'—does not enable Congress or the several states to defeat or thwart the prohibition, but only to enforce it by appropriate means.

"8. The words 'concurrent power' in that section do not mean joint power, or require that legislation thereunder by Congress, to be effective, shall be approved or sanctioned by the several states or any of them; nor do they mean that the power to enforce is divided between Congress and the several states along the lines which separate or distinguish foreign and interstate commerce from intrastate affairs.

"9. The power confided to Congress by that section, while not exclusive, is territorially coextensive with the prohibition of the first section, embraces manufacture and other intrastate transactions as well as importation, exportation and interstate traffic, and is in no wise dependent on or affected by action or inaction on the part of the several states or any of them."

The Amendment was adopted for the purpose of establishing prohibition as a national policy reaching every part of the United States and affecting transactions which are essentially local or intrastate, as well as those pertaining to interstate or foreign commerce. The second section means that power to take legislative measures to make the policy effective shall exist in Congress in respect of the territorial limits of the United States and at the same time the like power of the several states within their territorial limits shall not cease to exist. Each state, as also Congress, may exercise an independent judgment in selecting and shaping measures to enforce prohibition. Such as are adopted by Congress become laws of the United States and such as are adopted by a state become laws of that state. They may vary in many particulars, including the penalties prescribed, but this is an inseparable incident of independent legislative action in distinct jurisdictions.

To regard the Amendment as the source of the power of the states to adopt and enforce prohibition measures is to take a partial and erroneous view of the matter. Save for some restrictions arising out of the federal Constitution, chiefly the commerce clause, each state possessed that power in full measure prior to the Amendment, and the probable purpose of declaring a concurrent power to be in the states was to negative any possible inference that in vesting the national government with the power of country-wide prohibition, state power would be excluded. In effect the second section of the Eighteenth Amendment put an end to restrictions upon the state's power arising out of the federal Constitution and left her free to enact prohibition laws applying to all transactions within her limits. To be sure, the first section of the Amendment took from the states all power to authorize acts falling within its prohibition, but it did not cut down or displace prior state laws not inconsistent with it. Such laws derive their force, as do all new ones consistent with it, not from this Amendment, but from power originally belonging to the states, preserved to them by the Tenth Amendment, and now relieved from the restriction heretofore arising out of the federal Constitution. This is the ratio decidendi of our decision in Vigliotti v. Pennsylvania, 258 U. S. 403.

We have here two sovereignties, deriving power from different sources, capable of dealing with the same subject-matter within the same territory. Each may, without interference by the other, enact laws to secure prohibition, with the limitation that no legislation can give validity to acts prohibited by the Amendment. Each government in determining what shall be an offense against its peace and dignity is exercising its own sovereignty, not that of the other.

It follows that an act denounced as a crime by both national and state sovereignties is an offense against the peace and dignity of both and may be punished by each. The Fifth Amendment, like all the other guaranties in the first eight amendments, applies only to proceedings by the federal government, Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243, and the double jeopardy therein forbidden is a second prosecution under authority of the federal government after a first trial for the same offense under the same authority. Here the same act was an offense against the State of Washington, because a violation of its law, and also an offense against the United States under the National Prohibition Act. The defendants thus committed two different offenses by the same act, and a conviction by a court of Washington of the offense against that state is not a conviction of a different offense against the United States and so is not double jeopardy.

This view of the Fifth Amendment is supported by a long line of decisions by this court. [Some quotations and several citations are here omitted.]

Counsel for defendants in error invokes the principle that, as between federal and state jurisdictions over the same prisoner, the one which first gets jurisdiction may first exhaust its jurisdiction to the exclusion of the other. Ponzi v. Fessenden, 258 U. S. 254. This is beside the point and has no application. The effect of the ruling of the court below was to exclude the United States from jurisdiction to punish the defendants after the state court had exhausted its jurisdiction and when there was no conflict of jurisdiction.

If Congress sees fit to bar prosecution by the federal courts for any act when punishment for violation of state prohibition has been imposed, it can, of course, do so by proper legislative provision; but it has not done so. If a state were to punish the manufacture, transportation and sale of intoxicating liquor by small or nominal fines, the race of offenders to the courts of that state to plead guilty and secure immunity from federal prosecution for such acts would not make for respect for the federal statute or for its deterrent effect. But it is not for us to discuss the wisdom of legislation, it is enough for us to hold that, in the absence of special provision by Congress, conviction and punishment in a state court under a state law for making, transporting and selling intoxicating liquors is not a bar to a prosecution in a court of the United States under the federal law for the same acts.

Judgment reversed with direction to sustain the demurrer to the special plea in bar of the defendants and for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Section 5.—Special Problems of Sole and Dual Control.

OSBORN ET AL. v. THE PRESIDENT, DIRECTORS, AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.[1]

1824. Supreme Court of the United States. 9 Wheat. 738.

[The President, Directors and Company of the Bank of the United States filed a bill in the Circuit Court of the United States praying an injunction to restrain Osborn, Auditor of the State of Ohio, from proceeding to enforce against them an Ohio statute, passed February 8, 1819, entitled, "An act to levy and collect a tax from all banks, and individuals, and companies and associations of individuals, that may transact banking business in this state, without being allowed to do so by the laws thereof." This act recited that the Bank of the United States pursued its operations in Ohio contrary to a law of the state and that if it continued to transact banking business in the state it should pay an annual tax of $50,000. In case of refusal to pay, the statute authorized the auditor to levy the amount on the money or other goods of the bank. An injunction was granted. Ohio officers in contempt of this injunction seized $100,000 in specie and bank bills from the branch bank at Chillicothe, Ohio. The bill was amended to include a prayer for the return of this money. The Circuit Court granted final decrees as prayed for and this appeal was taken.]

[1] In this case the Supreme Court consented to reconsider the validity of the charter granted by Congress to the second Bank of the United States, held valid in McCulloch v. Maryland. The first Bank of the United States was created in 1791 and its charter expired at the end of its 20 year limitation, without judicial determination of its validity. The charter of the second was not renewed at its expiration in 1836. The grounds for sustaining it are again considered here because the Act of 1864 authorizing the creation of the present national banks was sustained on the authority of McCulloch v. Maryland and Osborn v. the President etc. of the Bank. See Farmers & Mechanics Nat. Bank v. Dearing (1875) 91 U. S. 29, 33, 23 L. ed. 196. The Act of 1816 was a special charter incorporating a single banking association with authority to create branches. (See the epitome of the statute in the foot-note to p. 256, ante.) While the latter was a general enabling act authorizing any five or more persons to incorporate a banking association by compliance with its requirements. (U. S. C. Title 12, § 21). Nearly all of the national banks are located in the states.

The Federal Reserve Bulletin of January, 1928, shows that on October 10, 1927, there were about 27,000 banks in the United States doing ordinary banking business. Of these about 8,000 were organized under the National Bank Act of 1864 as amended (Title 12, U. S. C.) and the remainder under state laws. The relative extent to which these two classes of banks shared in the ordinary banking business of the country is fairly indicated by deposits on that date of 20 billion in national banks, 33 billion in state banks; by loans of 21 billion by national banks and 33 billion by state banks, ib. pp. 106-107.

The problem of dual control of human affairs by two governments both operating within the areas called states is a complex one varying as the types of affairs vary. Herein are materials for the study of this problem so far as it has been worked out with reference to banking.

The governmental instrumentality features of the national banks as authorized in the Act of 1864 are (1) they may be used as depositaries and financial agents by the general government (U. S. C. Title 12, § 90) and (2) each national bank may issue circulating notes (ib., §§ 101 ff.) which serve as currency, though they are legal tender for very few purposes. (ib., § 109). Each national bank's notes are its own promises to pay, to be distinguished from government notes. The statute requires a national bank to deposit bonds of the United States with the treasurer of the United States for the benefit of holders of these notes as security for their redemption. (ib., §§ 131-138).

The private functions of national banks are those customary in private banking, and have been enlarged since 1864. An extreme instance is the Act of September 7, 1916 (U. S. C. Title 12, § 92) authorizing national banks in places of not over 5,000 population to act as agents for fire, life or other insurance by soliciting and selling insurance, and as brokers in making or procuring loans on real estate. The validity of this statute seems not to have been decided. See also the statute considered in First Nat. Bank v. Fellows ex rel. Union Trust Co., 244 U. S. 416, 61 L. ed. 1233, infra, p. 343.

The foundation of the argument in favour of the right of a state to tax the bank, is laid in the supposed character of that institution. The argument supposes the corporation to have been originated for the management of an individual concern, to be founded upon contract between individuals, having private trade and private profit for its great end and principal object.

If these premises were true, the conclusion drawn from them would be inevitable. This mere private corporation, engaged in its own business, with its own views, would certainly be subject to the taxing power of the state, as any individual would be; and the casual circumstance of its being employed by the government in the transaction of its fiscal affairs, would no more exempt its private business from the operation of that power, than it would exempt the private business of any individual employed in the same manner. But the premises are not true. The bank is not considered as a private corporation, whose principal object is individual trade and individual profit; but as a public corporation, created for public and national purposes. That the mere business of banking is, in its own nature, a private business, and may be carried on by individuals or companies having no political connexion with the government, is admitted; but the bank is not such an individual or company. It was not created for its own sake, or for private purposes. It has never been supposed that Congress could create such a corporation. The whole opinion of the Court, in the case of M'Culloch v. The State of Maryland, is founded on, and sustained by, the idea that the bank is an instrument which is "necessary and proper for carrying into effect the powers vested in the government of the United States." It is not an instrument which the government found ready made, and has supposed to be adapted to its purposes; but one which was created in the form in which it now appears, for national purposes only. It is, undoubtedly, capable of transacting private as well as public business. While it is the great instrument by which the fiscal operations of the government are effected, it is also trading with individuals for its own advantage. The appellants endeavour to distinguish between this trade and its agency for the public, between its banking operations and those qualities which it possesses in common with every corporation, such as individuality, immortality, &c. While they seem to admit the right to preserve this corporate existence, they deny the right to protect it in its trade and business.

If there be any thing in this distinction, it would tend to show that so much of the act as incorporates the bank is constitutional, but so much of it as authorizes its banking operations is unconstitutional. Congress can make the inanimate body, and employ the machine as a depository of, and vehicle for, the conveyance of the treasure of the nation, if it be capable of being so employed, but cannot breathe into it the vital spirit which alone can bring it into useful existence.

Let this distinction be considered.

Why is it that Congress can incorporate or create a bank? This question was answered in the case of M'Culloch v. The State of Maryland. It is an instrument which is "necessary and proper" for carrying on the fiscal operations of government. Can this instrument, on any rational calculation, effect its object, unless it be endowed with that faculty of lending and dealing in money, which is conferred by its charter? If it can, if it be as competent to the purposes of government without, as with this faculty, there will be much difficulty in sustaining that essential part of the charter. If it cannot, then this faculty is necessary to the legitimate operations of government, and was constitutionally and rightfully engrafted on the institution. * * *

This distinction, then, has no real existence. To tax its faculties, its trade, and occupation, is to tax the bank itself. To destroy or preserve the one, is to destroy or preserve the other.

It is urged, that Congress has not, by this act of incorporation, created the faculty of trading in money; that it had anterior existence, and may be carried on by a private individual, or company, as well as by a corporation. As this profession or business may be taxed, regulated, or restrained, when conducted by an individual, it may, likewise, be taxed, regulated, or restrained, when conducted by a corporation.

The general correctness of these propositions need not be controverted. Their particular application to the question before the Court, is alone to be considered. We do not maintain that the corporate character of the bank exempts its operations from the action of state authority. If an individual were to be endowed with the same faculties, for the same purposes, he would be equally protected in the exercise of those faculties. The operations of the bank are believed not only to yield the compensation for its services to the government, but to be essential to the performance of those services. Those operations give its value to the currency in which all the transactions of the government are conducted. They are, therefore, inseparably connected with those transactions. They enable the bank to render those services to the nation for which it was created, and are, therefore, of the very essence of its character, as national instruments. The business of the bank constitutes its capacity to perform its functions, as a machine for the money transactions of the government. Its corporate character is merely an incident, which enables it to transact that business more beneficially.

Were the Secretary of the Treasury to be authorized, by law, to appoint agencies throughout the union, to perform the public functions of the bank, and to be endowed with its faculties, as a necessary auxiliary to those functions, the operations of those agents would be as exempt from the control of the states as the bank, and not more so. If, instead of the Secretary of the Treasury, a distinct office were to be created for the purpose, filled by a person who should receive, as a compensation for his time, labour, and expense, the profits of the banking business, instead of other emoluments, to be drawn from the treasury, which banking business was essential to the operations of the government, would each state in the union possess a right to control these operations? The question on which this right would depend must always be, are these faculties so essential to the fiscal operations of the government, as to authorize Congress to confer them? Let this be admitted, and the question, does the right to preserve them exist? must always be answered in the affirmative.

Congress was of opinion that these faculties were necessary, to enable the bank to perform the services which are exacted from it, and for which it was created. This was certainly a question proper for the consideration of the national legislature. But, were it now to undergo revision, who would have the hardihood to say, that, without the employment of a banking capital, those services could be performed? That the exercise of these faculties greatly facilitates the fiscal operations of the government, is too obvious for controversy; and who will venture to affirm, that the suppression of them would not materially affect those operations, and essentially impair, if not totally destroy, the utility of the machine to the government. The currency which it circulates, by means of its trade with individuals, is believed to make it a more fit instrument for the purposes of government, than it could otherwise be; and, if this be true, the capacity to carry on this trade, is a faculty indispensable to the character and objects of the institution.

The appellants admit, that, if this faculty be necessary, to make the bank a fit instrument for the purposes of the government, Congress possesses the same power to protect the machine in this, as in its direct fiscal operations; but they deny that it is necessary to those purposes, and insist that it is granted solely for the benefit of the members of the corporation. Were this proposition to be admitted, all the consequences which are drawn from it might follow. But it is not admitted. The Court has already stated its conviction, that without this capacity to trade with individuals, the bank would be a very defective instrument, when considered with a single view to its fitness for the purposes of government. On this point the whole argument rests. * * *

The appellants rely greatly on the distinction between the bank and the public institutions, such as the mint or the post office. The agents in those offices are, it is said, officers of government, and are excluded from a seat in Congress. Not so the directors of the bank.

The connexion of the government with the bank, is likened to that with contractors.

It will not be contended, that the directors, or other officers of the bank, are officers of government. But it is contended, that, were their resemblance to contractors more perfect than it is, the right of the state to control its operations, if those operations be necessary to its character, as a machine employed by the government, cannot be maintained. Can a contractor for supplying a military post with provisions, be restrained from making purchases within any state, or from transporting the provisions to the place at which the troops were stationed? or could he be fined or taxed for doing so? We have not yet heard these questions answered in the affirmative. It is true, that the property of the contractor may be taxed, as the property of other citizens; and so may the local property of the bank. But we do not admit that the act of purchasing, or of conveying the articles purchased, can be under state control.

If the trade of the bank be essential to its character, as a machine for the fiscal operations of the government, that trade must be as exempt from state control as the actual conveyance of the public money. Indeed, a tax bears upon the whole machine; as well upon the faculty of collecting and transmitting the money of the nation, as on that of discounting the notes of individuals. No distinction is taken between them.

Considering the capacity of carrying on the trade of banking, as an important feature in the character of this corporation, which was necessary, to make it a fit instrument for the objects for which it was created, the Court adheres to its decision in the case of M'Culloch against The State of Maryland, and is of opinion, that the act of the State of Ohio, which is certainly much more objectionable than that of the State of Maryland, is repugnant to a law of the United States, made in pursuance of the constitution, and, therefore, void.[2]

[2] Compare Smith v. Kansas City Title & Tr. Co. (1921) 255 U. S. 180, 65 L. ed. 577, where the validity of the Act of Congress of July 17, 1916 as amended January 18, 1918, establishing the Federal Land Banks and Joint Stock Land Banks was sustained on the authority of M'Culloch v. Maryland. Day, J., for the court said:

"It is said that the power [given by the statute] to designate these banks as such depositaries has not been exercised by the Government, and that the Federal Land Banks have acted as federal agents only in the case of loans of money for seed purposes made in the summer of 1918, to which we have already referred. But the existence of the power under the Constitution is not determined by the extent of the exercise of the authority conferred under it. Congress declared it necessary to create these fiscal agencies, and to make them authorized depositaries of public money. Its power to do so is no longer open to question.

"But, it is urged, the attempt to create these federal agencies, and to make these banks fiscal agents and public depositaries of the Government, is but a pretext. But nothing is better settled by the decisions of this court than that when Congress acts within the limits of its constitutional authority, it is not the province of the judicial branch of the Government to question its motives. FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BAY CITY v. FELLOWS, ATTORNEY GENERAL, EX REL. UNION TRUST CO.

1917. Supreme Court of the United States. 244 U. S. 416.

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

Section 11 (k) of the Act of Congress approved December 23, 1913, establishing the Federal Reserve Board (38 Stat. 251, 262, c. 6), gives to that board authority "To grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of state or local law, the right to act as trustee, executor, administrator, or registrar of stocks and bonds under such rules and regulations as the said board may prescribe."

The First National Bank of Bay City having obtained the certificate required began the exercise of the powers stated. Thereupon certain trust companies which under the laws of Michigan had the authority to do the same character of business petitioned the Attorney General of the state to test the right of the national bank to use the functions on the ground that its doing so was contrary to the laws of the State of Michigan and that the action of the Federal Reserve Board purporting to give authority was in contravention of the Constitution of the United States. The Attorney General then, on the relation of the trust companies, commenced in the Supreme Court of the state a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto to test the right of the corporation to exercise the functions. The bank in defense fully stated its federal charter, the rights given Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, 541; McCray v. United States, 195 U. S. 27; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U. S. 107, 147, 153, 156, and cases cited.

"That Congress has seen fit in making these banks fiscal agencies and depositaries of public moneys, to grant to them banking powers of a limited character, in nowise detracts from the authority of Congress to use them for the governmental purposes named, if it sees fit to do so. A bank may be organized with or without the authority to issue currency. It may be authorized to receive deposits in only a limited way. Speaking generally, a bank is a moneyed institution to facilitate the borrowing, lending and caring for money. But whether technically banks, or not, these organizations may serve the governmental purposes declared by Congress in their creation. Furthermore, these institutions are organized to serve as a market for United States bonds. Not less than 5% of the capital of the Federal Land Banks, for which stock is outstanding to Farm Loan Associations, is required to be invested in United States bonds. Both kinds of banks are empowered to buy and sell United States bonds. * * *

"We, therefore, conclude that the creation of these banks, and the grant of authority to them to act for the Government as depositaries of public moneys and purchasers of Government bonds, brings them within the creative power of Congress although they may be intended, in connection with other privileges and duties, to facilitate the making of loans upon farm security at low rates of interest. This does not destroy the validity of these enactments any more than the general banking powers destroyed the authority of Congress to create the United States Bank, or the authority given to national banks to carry on additional activities, destroyed the authority of Congress to create those institutions." Pp. 210-211.

by the act of Congress and the action of the Federal Reserve Board taken thereunder. The Attorney General demurred to this defense, first, because Congress had no power to confer the authority which was called in question; second, because if it had the power, it was without right to delegate to the Reserve Board the determination of when it should be used; and third, because the exercise of the powers was in contravention of the laws and authority of the state and the Reserve Board therefore under the act had no power to grant the certificate.

The case was heard by the full court. * * * It said:

"But in the reasoning of the judges, in the opinions to which I have referred [McCulloch v. Maryland and Osborn v. Bank] I find, I think, a conclusive argument supporting the proposition that congress has exceeded its constitutional powers in granting to banks the right to act as trustees, executors and administrators. If for mere profit it can clothe this agency with the powers enumerated, it can give it the rights of a trading corporation, or a transportation company, or both. There is, as Judge Marshall points out, a natural connection between the business of banking and the carrying on of federal fiscal operations. There is none, apparently, between such operations and the business of settling estates, or acting as the trustee of bondholders. This being so, there is in the legislation a direct invasion of the sovereignty of the state which controls not only the devolution of estates of deceased persons and the conducting of private business within the state, but as well the creation of corporations and the qualifications and duties of such as may engage in the business of acting as trustees, executors and administrators. Such an invasion I think the court may declare and may prevent by its order operating upon the offending agency." [192 Mich. 640, 653.]

But we are of opinion that the doctrine thus announced not only was wholly inadequate to distinguish the case before us from the rulings in McCulloch v. Maryland and Osborn v. Bank, but on the contrary directly conflicted with what was decided in those cases, that is to say, disregarded their authority so as to cause it to be our duty to reverse for the following reasons:

1. Because the opinion of the court instead of testing the existence of the implied power to grant the particular functions in question by considering the bank as created by Congress as an entity with all the functions and attributes conferred upon it, rested the determination as to such power upon a separation of the particular functions from the other attributes and functions of the bank and ascertained the existence of the implied authority to confer them by considering them as segregated, that is, by disregarding their relation to the bank as component parts of its operations,—a doctrine which, as we have seen, was in the most express terms held to be unsound in both of the cases.

2. Because while in the premise to the reasoning the right of Congress was fully recognized to exercise its legislative judgment as to the necessity for creating the bank including the scope and character of the public and private powers which should be given to it, in application the discretion of Congress was disregarded or set aside by exercising judicial discretion for the purpose of determining whether it was relevant or appropriate to give the bank the particular functions in question.

3. Because even under this mistaken view the conclusion that there was no ground for implying the power in Congress was erroneous because it was based on a mistaken standard, since for the purpose of testing how far the functions in question which were conferred by the act of Congress on the bank were relevant to its business or had any relation to discrimination by state legislation against banks created by Congress it considered not the actual situation, that is, the condition of the state legislation, but an imaginary or non-existing condition, that is, the assumption that so far as the state power was concerned the particular functions were in the state enjoyed only by individuals or corporations not coming at all, actually or potentially, in competition with national banks. And the far-reaching effect of this error becomes manifest when it is borne in mind that plainly the particular functions enumerated in the statute were conferred upon national banks because of the fact that they were enjoyed as the result of state legislation by state corporations, rivals in a greater or less degree of national banks.

4. In view of the express ruling that the enjoyment of the powers in question by the national bank would not be in contravention of the state law, it follows that the reference of the court below to the state authority over the particular subjects which the statute deals with must have proceeded upon the erroneous assumption that because a particular function was subject to be regulated by the state law, therefore Congress was without power to give a national bank the right to carry on such functions. But if this be what the statement signifies, the conflict between it and the rule settled in McCulloch v. Maryland and Osborn v. Bank, is manifest. What those cases established was that although a business was of a private nature and subject to state regulation, if it was of such a character as to cause it to be incidental to the successful discharge by a bank chartered by Congress of its public functions, it was competent for Congress to give the bank the power to exercise such private business in cooperation with or as part of its public authority. Manifestly this excluded the power of the state in such case, although it might possess in a general sense authority to regulate such business, to use that authority to prohibit such business from being united by Congress with the banking function, since to do so would be but the exertion of state authority to prohibit Congress from exerting a power which under the Constitution it had a right to exercise. From this it must also follow that even although a business be of such a character that it is not inherently considered susceptible of being included by Congress in the powers conferred on national banks, that rule would cease to apply if by state law state banking corporations, trust companies, or others which by reason of their business are rivals or quasi-rivals of national banks are permitted to carry on such business. This must be, since the state may not by legislation create a condition as to a particular business which would bring about actual or potential competition with the business of national banks and at the same time deny the power of Congress to meet such created condition by legislation appropriate to avoid the injury which otherwise would be suffered by the national agency. Of course as the general subject of regulating the character of business just referred to is peculiarly within state administrative control, state regulations for the conduct of such business, if not discriminatory or so unreasonable as to justify the conclusion that they necessarily would so operate, would be controlling upon banks chartered by Congress when they came in virtue of authority conferred upon them by Congress to exert such particular powers. And these considerations clearly were in the legislative mind when it enacted the statute in question. This result would seem to be plain when it is observed (a) that the statute authorizes the exertion of the particular functions by national banks when not in contravention of the state law, that is, where the right to perform them is expressly given by the state law or what is equivalent is deducible from the state law because that law has given the functions to state banks or corporations whose business in a greater or less degree rivals that of national banks, thus engendering from the state law itself an implication of authority in Congress to do as to national banks that which the state law has done as to other corporations; and (b) that the statute subjects the right to exert the particular functions which it confers on national banks to the administrative authority of the Reserve Board, giving besides to that Board power to adopt rules regulating the exercise of the functions conferred, thus affording the means of coordinating the functions when permitted to be discharged by national banks with the reasonable and non-discriminating provisions of state law regulating their exercise as to state corporations,—the whole to the end that harmony and the concordant exercise of the national and state power might result.[3]

[Van Devanter and Day, J. J., dissented from a portion of the opinion not included above.]

EASTON v. IOWA.

1903. Supreme Court of the United States. 188 U. S. 220.

In 1899, in the District Court of Wenneshiek County, State of Iowa, James H. Easton, who had been previously indicted, was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary of Iowa at hard labor for a term of five years, under the provisions of a statute of that state, for the offence of having received, as president of the First National Bank of Decorah, Iowa, a deposit of one hundred dollars in money in said bank, at a time when the bank was insolvent and when such insolvency was known to the defendant. [On appeal the state Supreme Court affirmed and now on error:]

Mr. Justice Shiras delivered the opinion of the court.

Those portions of the Iowa statute whose validity is the question in this case consist of sections 1884 and 1885 of the code of that state, and are in the following terms:

"Sec. 1884. No bank, banking house, exchange broker, deposit office, firm, company, corporation, or person engaged in the banking, brokerage, exchange or deposit business, shall, when insolvent, accept or receive on deposit, with or without interest, any money, bank bills or notes, United States Treasury notes or currency, or other notes, bills, checks or drafts, or renew any certificate of deposit.

[3] After the decision of the above case Congress enlarged the statute passed upon therein to read as follows:

"To grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of state or local law, the right to act as trustee, executor, administrator, registrar of stocks and bonds, guardian of estates, assignee, receiver, committee of estates of lunatics, or in any other fiduciary capacity in which State banks, trust companies, or other corporations which come into competition with national banks are permitted to act under the laws of the State in which the national bank is located.

"Whenever the laws of such state authorize or permit the exercise of any or all of the foregoing powers by state banks, trust companies, or other corporations which compete with national banks, the granting to and the exercise of such powers by national banks shall not be deemed to be in contravention of state or local law within the meaning of this chapter."

This statute, at least so far as it authorized national banks to act as executors, was held valid in Missouri ex rel. Burnes Nat. Bank v. Duncan (1924) 265 U. S. 14, 68 L. ed. 881, two Justices dissenting. Holmes, J., for the majority said of the statute: "This says in a roundabout and polite but unmistakable way that whatever may be the state law, national banks having the permit of the Federal Reserve Board may act as executors if trust companies competing with them have that power," [and the attack upon its validity is] "fully answered by the reasoning in First National Bank of Bay City v. Fellows."

"Sec. 1885. [Penalties for knowingly violating the previous section.] * * *

It will be observed that national banks or banking associations are not specifically named in the statute; and it was hence argued on behalf of the defendant, that such institutions are not within the enactment. As, however, the state courts, following a previous decision of the Supreme Court of Iowa, in the case of State v. Fields, 98 Iowa, 748, held that the statute was applicable to all banks, whether organized under the laws of the state or the acts of Congress, we must accept that construction as correct, and confine our consideration to the question whether, as so construed, the act is within the jurisdiction of the state. * * *

The principles enunciated in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 425, and in Osborn v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat. 738, though expressed in respect to banks incorporated directly by acts of Congress, are yet applicable to the later and present system of national banks.

In the latter case it was said by Chief Justice Marshall:

"The bank is not considered as a private corporation, whose principal object is individual trade and individual profit; but as a public corporation, created for public and national purposes. That the mere business of banking is, in its own nature, a private business, and may be carried on by individuals or companies having no political connection with the government, is admitted; but the bank is not such an individual or company. It was not created for its own sake or for private purposes. It has never been supposed that Congress could create such a corporation. The whole opinion of the court, in McCulloch v. Maryland, is founded on, and sustained by, the idea that the bank is an instrument which is 'necessary and proper for carrying into effect the powers vested in the government of the United States.'"

A similar view of the nature of banks organized under the national bank laws has been frequently expressed by this court. Thus, in Farmers' National Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29, it was said:

"National banks organized under the act are instruments designed to be used to aid the government in the administration of an important branch of the public service. They are means appropriate to that end."

Such being the nature of these national institutions, it must be obvious that their operations cannot be limited or controlled by state legislation, and the Supreme Court of Iowa was in error when it held that national banks are organized and their business prosecuted for private gain, and that there is no reason why the officers of such banks should be exempt from the penalties prescribed for fraudulent banking. Nor is it altogether true, as asserted by that court, that there is no act of Congress prohibiting the receipt of deposits by national banks or their officers, when a bank is insolvent. It is true that there is no express prohibition contained in the federal statutes, but there are apt provisions, sanctioned by severe penalties, which are intended to protect the depositors and other creditors of national banks from fraudulent banking. It is not necessary to quote at length those provisions, but it will be sufficient to say that a bank organized under the national bank act is authorized to make contracts; to prescribe, by its board of directors, by-laws regulating the manner in which its general business shall be conducted, and the privileges granted by law exercised and enjoyed; to exercise by its board of directors, or duly authorized officers, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking, by discounting and negotiating promissory notes and drafts, bills of exchange; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange; by loaning money on personal security. Such banks are required to deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, as security for their circulating notes, United States bonds in an amount not less than one-fourth of their capital; to report to the Treasurer of the United States twice each year the average amount of their deposits, and to pay to said Treasurer each half year a tax upon such deposits; and to make to the Comptroller of the Currency not less than five reports during each year, (and special reports as often as he may require,) according to such form as he may require, verified by the oath or affirmation of the president or cashier, which reports shall exhibit in detail the resources and liabilities of the association. The Comptroller is directed to appoint suitable persons to make examination of the affairs of every banking association, who shall have power to make a thorough examination into all the affairs of the association, and in doing so to examine any of the officers or agents thereof, and to make a full and detailed report of the condition to the Comptroller. Whenever the Comptroller becomes satisfied of the insolvency of such bank he may, after due examination of its affairs, appoint a receiver, who shall take possession of the assets of the association, wind up its affairs, and make ratable distribution of its assets. And severe penalties are imposed upon any officer or agent of such association who violates any of the provisions of the national bank act.

It thus appears that Congress has provided a symmetrical and complete scheme for the banks to be organized under the provisions of the statute.

It is argued by the learned Attorney General on behalf of the State of Iowa that "the effect of the statute of Iowa is to require of the officers of all banks within the state a higher degree of diligence in the discharge of their duties. It gives to the general public greater confidence in the stability and solvency of national banks, and in the honesty and integrity of their managing officers. It enables them better to accomplish the purposes and designs of the general government, and is an aid, rather than impediment, to their utility and efficiency as agents and instrumentalities of the United States."

But we are unable to perceive that Congress intended to leave the field open for the states to attempt to promote the welfare and stability of national banks by direct legislation. If they had such power it would have to be exercised and limited by their own discretion, and confusion would necessarily result from control possessed and exercised by two independent authorities.

Nor can we concede that by such legislation of a state, as was attempted in this instance, the affairs of a national bank, or the security of its creditors, would be advantageously affected. The provision of the state statute is express that it is the duty of the officers of the bank, when they know it is insolvent, to at once suspend its active operations; for it is obvious, that to refuse to accept deposits would be equivalent to a cessation of business. Whether a bank is or is not actually insolvent may be, often, a question hard to answer. There may be good reason to believe that, though temporarily embarrassed the bank's affairs may take a fortunate turn. Some of the assets that cannot at once be converted into money may be of a character to justify the expectation that, if actual and open insolvency be avoided, they may be ultimately collectible, and thus the ruin of the bank and its creditors be prevented. McDonald v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 174 U. S. 610. But under the state statute, no such conservative action can be followed by the officers of the bank except at the risk of the penalties of fine and imprisonment. In such a case the provisions of the federal statute would permit the Comptroller to withhold closing the bank and to give an opportunity to escape final insolvency. It would seem that such an exercise of discretion on the part of the Comptroller would, in many cases, be better for all concerned than the unyielding course of action prescribed by the state law. However, it is not our province to vindicate the policy of the federal statute, but to declare that it cannot be overridden by the policy of the state.

Similar legislation to that of the State of Iowa has been considered and disapproved by the supreme courts of several of the other states.

Thus in Commonwealth v. Ketner, 92 Penn. St. 372, one Torrey was indicted and found guilty under a charge that, as the cashier of the First National Bank of Ashland, organized under the laws of the United States, he had embezzled the moneys of the said bank contrary to the form of the act of assembly of the State of Pennsylvania, prescribing a penalty of fine and imprisonment. A writ of habeas corpus was allowed by he Supreme Court of the state, and the accused was discharged. * * *

In Allen's Appeal, 119 Pa. St. 192, the question was whether a state law, which forbade "any cashier of any bank from engaging, directly or indirectly, in the purchase or sale of stock, or in any other profession, occupation or calling other than his duty as cashier," and which declared the same to be a misdemeanor, was applicable to the cashier of a national bank, and it was held that it was not so applicable, the court saying, among other things: * * *

"If the state may impose one qualification upon the cashiers, why not another? If upon the cashier, why not upon the president or other officer? Nay, further, suppose the legislature should declare that no person should be a bank director unless he has arrived at fifty years of age, or should be the owner of one hundred shares of stock, could we apply such an act to national banks? If so, such institutions would have a precarious existence. They would be liable to be interfered with at every step, and it might not be long before the whole national banking system would have to be thrown aside as so much worthless lumber." * * *

So, in In re Thomas, 82 Fed. Rep. 304, it was held by the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio that, the governor of the soldiers' home at Dayton, Ohio, in serving to the inmates, as food, oleomargarine furnished by the government, is not subject to the law of the state prescribing the manner in which oleomargarine shall be used in eating houses, because his act is that of the government of the United States within its constitutional powers, and wholly beyond the control or regulation of the legislature of the state.

This judgment was affirmed by this court in Ohio v. Thomas, 173 U. S. 276. * * *

This subject has received recent and careful consideration in the case of Davis v. Elmira Savings Bank, 161 U. S. 275, twice argued in this court. The legislature of the State of New York had provided by law that savings banks, organized under the laws of that state, should have a preference as depositors in banks in case of the insolvency of such banks, and it was sought to apply this provision to the case of a deposit by a savings bank in a national bank which had subsequently become insolvent. But this court held that such a provision could not be extended by a state to national banks, because it was repugnant to that provision of the national banking act which requires the assets of an insolvent national bank to be ratably distributed among its creditors. * * *

Cross v. North Carolina, 132 U. S. 131, was a case wherein this court pointed out the distinction between crimes defined and punishable at common law or by the general statutes of a state and crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States; and accordingly it was held that the crime of forging promissory notes, purporting to be made by individuals, and made payable to or at a national bank, was a distinct and separate offence, indictable under the laws of the state.

Undoubtedly a state has the legitimate power to define and punish crimes by general laws applicable to all persons within its jurisdiction. So, likewise, it may declare, by special laws, certain acts to be criminal offences when committed by officers or agents of its own banks and institutions. But it is without lawful power to make such special laws applicable to banks organized and operating under the laws of the United States.

It was by failing to observe the distinction between the two classes of cases that, we think, the courts below fell into error.

Judgment reversed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SAN JOSE v. STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

1923. Supreme Court of United States. 262 U. S. 366.

[Section 1273, California Code of Civil Procedure, declared escheated to the state any deposit in "any bank" if the depositor within twenty years after such deposit had made no new deposit, had not drawn on the deposit, had made no claim, and neither the depositor nor any claimant had filed notice of present residence, and the state's attorney general was authorized to institute actions for deposits so declared escheated. This was such an action. The state had judgment, which was affirmed by the state Supreme Court, and now on error:]

Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the Court. * * *

The Supreme Court declined to express an "opinion upon the question whether the judgment of the superior court herein operates as a present escheat of the rights of the several depositors against the respective banks, or whether under section 1272 they each still have the right within the time there stated to prosecute an action to obtain payment of their several deposits from the state treasurer," and said, "if they have such right the judgment of the superior court would not be a bar thereto."

Section 5136, U. S. Revised Statutes, confers upon national banks power to receive deposits, which necessarily implies the right to accept loans of money, promising to repay upon demand to lender or his order. These banks are instrumentalities of the federal government. Their contracts and dealings are subject to the operation of general and undiscriminating state laws which do not conflict with the letter or the general object and purposes of congressional legislation. But any attempt by a state to define their duties or control the conduct of their affairs is void whenever it conflicts with the laws of the United States or frustrates the purposes of the national legislation or impairs the efficiency of the bank to discharge the duties for which it was created. Davis v. Elmira Savings Bank, 161 U. S. 275, 283, 288, 290.

"National banks organized under the act are instruments designed to be used to aid the government in the administration of an important branch of the public service. They are means appropriate to that end. * * * Being such means, brought into existence for this purpose, and intended to be so employed, the states can exercise no control over them, nor in any wise affect their operation, except in so far as Congress may see proper to permit. Anything beyond this is 'an abuse, because it is the usurpation of power which a single state cannot give.'" Farmers' & Mechanics' National Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29, 33, 34.

Congressional legislation in respect of national banks "has in view the erection of a system extending throughout the country, and independent, so far as powers conferred are concerned, of state legislation which, if permitted to be applicable, might impose limitations and restrictions as various and as numerous as the states." Easton v. Iowa, 188 U. S. 220, 229.

Plainly, no state may prohibit national banks from accepting deposits or directly impair their efficiency in that regard. And we think, under circumstances like those here revealed, a state may not dissolve contracts of deposit even after twenty years and require national banks to pay to it the amounts then due; the settled principles stated above oppose such power.

Does the statute conflict with the letter or general object and purposes of the legislation by Congress? Obviously, it attempts to qualify in an unusual way agreements between national banks and their customers long understood to arise when the former receive deposits under their plainly granted powers. If California may thus interfere other states may do likewise; and, instead of twenty years, varying limitations may be prescribed—three years perhaps, or five, or ten, or fifteen. We cannot conclude that Congress intended to permit such results. They seem incompatible with the purpose to establish a system of governmental agencies specifically empowered and expected freely to accept deposits from customers irrespective of domicile with the commonly consequent duties and liabilities. The depositors of a national bank often live in many different states and countries; and certainly it would not be an immaterial thing if the deposits of all were subject to seizure by the state where the bank happened to be located. The success of almost all commercial banks depends upon their ability to obtain loans from depositors, and these might well hesitate to subject their funds to possible confiscation.

This Court has often pointed out the necessity for protecting federal agencies against interference by state legislation. The approved principle of obsta principiis should be adhered to.[4]

Reversed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK IN ST. LOUIS v. STATE OF MISSOURI.

1924. Supreme Court of the United States. 263 U. S. 640.

Mr. Justice Sutherland delivered the opinion of the Court.

The State of Missouri brought this proceeding in the nature of quo warranto in the state Supreme Court against the plaintiff in error to determine its authority to establish and conduct a branch bank in the City of St. Louis. The information avers that the bank was organized under the laws of the United States and was and is engaged in a general banking business in that city at a banking house, the location of which is given; that, in contravention of its charter and of the act of Congress under which it was incorporated, it has illegally opened and is operating a branch bank for doing a general banking business in a separate building several blocks from its banking house, and proposes to open additional branch banks at various other locations, and that this is in violation of a statute of the state expressly prohibiting the establishment of branch banks. The prayer is that, upon final hearing, the bank be ousted from the privilege of operating this branch bank or any other. A demurrer to the information was interposed and the cause thereupon submitted. The contention of the state was upheld and judgment rendered in accordance with the prayer. 297 Mo. 397.

The correctness of the judgment is challenged under numerous specifications of error presenting federal questions, which, for the purposes of the case, may be considered under two heads: (1) ? Whether the state statute is valid as applied to national banks; and (2) Whether a proceeding to call a national bank to account 2? for acts of the kind here alleged may be maintained by the state, and whether the form of remedy pursued is sustainable.

S. 292, 59 L. ed. 234; Bank of California v. Richardson, 248 U. S. 476, 63 L. ed. 372.

First, The Missouri statute (§ 11737, R. S. Mo., 1919) provides "that no bank shall maintain in this state a branch bank or receive deposits or pay checks except in its own banking house." That the facts alleged in the information bring the case within that part of the statute which prohibits the maintenance of branch banks and that the statute applies to national banks is conclusively established by the decision of the state court, and we confine ourselves to the inquiry whether, as thus applied, the statute is valid.

National banks are brought into existence under federal legislation, are instrumentalities of the federal government and are necessarily subject to the paramount authority of the United States. Nevertheless, national banks are subject to the laws of a state in respect of their affairs unless such laws interfere with the purposes of their creation, tend to impair or destroy their efficiency as federal agencies or conflict with the paramount law of the United States. National Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wall. 352, 362; Davis v. Elmira Savings Bank, 161 U. S. 275, 283. These two cases are cited and followed in the later case of McClellan v. Chipman, 164 U. S. 347, 357, and the principle which they establish is said to contain a rule and an exception, "the rule being the operation of general state laws upon the dealings and contracts of national banks, the exception being the cessation of the operation of such laws whenever they expressly conflict with the laws of the United States or frustrate the purpose for which national banks were created, or impair their efficiency to discharge the duties imposed upon them by the law of the United States." See also Waite v. Dowley, 94 U. S. 527, 533. The question is whether the Missouri statute falls within the rule or within the exception.

Does it conflict with the laws of the United States? In our opinion, it does not. The extent of the powers of national banks is to be measured by the terms of the federal statutes relating to such associations, and they can rightfully exercise only such as are expressly granted or such incidental powers as are necessary to carry on the business for which they are established. Bullard v. Bank, 18 Wall. 589, 593; Logan County National Bank v. Townsend, 139 U. S. 67, 73; California Bank v. Kennedy, 167 U. S. 362, 366. Among other things the federal law (Rev. Stat., § 5134) provides that the organization certificate of the association shall specifically state "the place where its operations of discount and deposit are to be carried on, designating the state, Territory or district, and the particular county, city, town, or village." By another provision (Rev. Stats. § 5190) it is required that "the usual business of each national banking association shall be transacted at an office or banking-house located in the place specified in its organization certificate." Strictly, the latter provision, employing as it does, the article "an," to qualify words in the singular number, would confine the association to one office or banking-house. We are asked, however, to construe it otherwise in view of the rule that "words importing the singular number may extend and be applied to several persons or things." Rev. Stat., § 1. But obviously this rule is not one to be applied except where it is necessary to carry out the evident intent of the statute. See Garrigus v. Board of Commissioners, 39 Ind. 66, 70; Moynahan v. City of New York, 205 N. Y. 181, 186. Here there is not only nothing in the context or in the subject matter to require the construction contended for, but other provisions of the national banking laws are persuasively to the contrary. By § 5138, Rev. Stat., the minimum amount of capital is fixed in proportion to the population of the place where the bank is located. If it had been intended to allow the establishment by an association of not one bank only but, in addition, as many branch banks as it saw fit, it is remarkable, to say the least, that there should have been no provision for adjusting the capital to the latter contingency or for determining how or under what circumstances such branch banks might be established or for regulating them. Section 5155, Rev. Stat., provides that it shall be lawful for a state bank "having branches, the capital being joint and assigned to and used by the mother-bank and branches in definite proportions, to become a national banking association * * * and to retain and keep in operation its branches * * * the amount of the circulation * * * to be regulated by the amount of capital assigned to and used by each." This provision, confined by its terms, as it is, to existing state institutions, may be fairly considered as constituting an exception to the general rule, and the presence of safeguarding limitations in the excepted case, with their entire absence from the statute otherwise, goes far in the direction of confirming the conclusion that the general rule does not contemplate the establishment of branch banks. This apparently was the interpretation of Congress itself, since in two instances at least special legislation was deemed necessary to allow the establishment of branch banks, viz: at the Chicago Exposition, in 1892, c. 71, 27 Stat. 33, and at the St. Louis Exposition, in 1901, c. 864, 31 Stat. 1444, § 21, the existence of the branch bank in each instance being expressly limited to the period of two years. * * *

Second. The state statute as applied to national banks is, therefore, valid, and the corollary that it is obligatory and enforceable necessarily results, unless some controlling reason forbids; and, since the sanction behind it is that of the state and not that of the national government, the power of enforcement must rest with the former and not with the latter. To demonstrate the binding quality of a statute but deny the power of enforcement involves a fallacy made apparent by the mere statement of the proposition, for such power is essentially inherent in the very conception of law. It is insisted with great earnestness that the United States alone may inquire by quo warranto whether a national bank is acting in excess of its charter powers, and that the state is wholly without authority to do so. This contention will be conceded since it is plainly correct, but the attempt to apply it here proceeds upon a complete misconception of what the state is seeking to do, a misconception which arises from confounding the relief sought with the circumstances relied upon to justify it. The state is neither seeking to enforce a law of the United States nor endeavoring to call the bank to account for an act in excess of its charter powers. What the state is seeking to do is to vindicate and enforce its own law, and the ultimate inquiry which it propounds is whether the bank is violating that law, not whether it is complying with the charter or law of its creation. The latter inquiry is preliminary and collateral, made only for the purpose of determining whether the state law is free to act in the premises or whether its operation is precluded in the particular case by paramount law. Having determined that the power sought to be exercised by the bank finds no justification in any law or authority of the United States, the way is open for the enforcement of the state statute. In other words, the national statutes are interrogated for the sole purpose of ascertaining whether anything they contain constitutes an impediment to the enforcement of the state statute, and the answer being in the negative, they may be laid aside as of no further concern.

The application of the state statute to the present case and the power of the state to enforce it being established, the nature of the remedy to be employed is a question for state determination; and the judgment of the state court that the one here employed was appropriate is conclusive unless it involves a denial of due process of law, which plainly it does not. We are not concerned with the question whether an information in the nature of quo warranto, according to the general principles of the law, is in fact appropriate. It is enough that the Supreme Court of the state has so held. * * *

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Missouri is therefore

Affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER, dissenting. * * *

It must be admitted that, in so far as the legislation of Congress does not provide otherwise, the general laws of a state have the same application to the ordinary transactions of a national bank,—such as incurring and discharging obligations to depositors, presenting drafts for acceptance or payment and giving notice of their dishonor, taking pledges for the repayment of money loaned, and receiving or making conveyances of real property,—that they have to like transactions of others. But not so of questions of corporate power. As explained in Easton v. Iowa and other cases, their solution must turn on the laws of the United States under which the bank is created. * * *

Only where those laws bring state laws into the problem,—as by enabling national banks to act as executors, administrators, etc., where that is permitted by state laws,—can the latter have any bearing on the question of corporate power—the privileges which the bank may exercise. First National Bank v. Union Trust Co., 244 U. S. 416.

The proceeding now before us is an information in the nature of quo warranto brought in the Supreme Court of Missouri, whereby that state challenges the power of a national bank in the City of St. Louis to conduct a branch bank established by it in that city and asks that the bank be ousted from that privilege on the grounds, first, that establishing and conducting the branch is a violation of the bank's charter powers, and, secondly, that it is prohibited by a law of the state.

It is not claimed that the laws of the United States contain any provision whereby the privilege asserted by the bank is made to depend on the will or legislative policy of the state; nor do they in fact contain any such provision. Whether the bank has the privilege which it asserts is therefore in no way dependent on or affected by the state law, but turns exclusively on the laws of the United States. If they grant the privilege, expressly or by fair implication, no law of the state can abridge it or take it away. And if they do not grant it, they in effect prohibit it, and no law of the state can strengthen or weaken the prohibition. In either event nothing can turn on the state law. It simply has no bearing on the solution of the question.

In this situation the state is not, in my opinion, entitled to maintain the proceeding. It has no distinctive right to protect, nor any applicable law to vindicate or enforce. The proceeding is one which may be maintained only in the public right. Here the state is not authorized to represent or to speak for the public. The bank is not a creation and instrumentality of the state, but of the national government. Its presence in the state is attributable to the national power, not to the state's permission. Whether the bank shall be kept within its legitimate powers and made to discontinue any departure from or abuse of them is a matter in which the people of all the states have the same interest, the bank being a national creation and instrumentality. The people of Missouri merely share in the common interest. "In that field it is the United States, and not the State, which represents them as parens patriae, when such representation becomes appropriate; and to the former, and not to the latter, they must look for such protective measures as flow from the status." Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U. S. 447, 486. It therefore is apparent that the state is here mistakenly appropriating to itself a function which belongs to the United States. * * * [Taft, C. J., and Butler, J., concurred in this dissent.]

S. 415, 425, holding that the Fleet Corporation is a department of the government within the meaning of a national statute, Post Roads Act, July 24, 1864, by which acceptance of its benefits by telegraph companies bound them to give preferential rates to "departments of the government." See for the organization and functions of this peculiar corporation, the case cited and those cited in it.

"The right of Congress to determine to what extent a state court shall be permitted to entertain actions against national banks * * * is undeniable." Van Reed v. Peoples Nat. Bank (1905) 198 U. S. 554, 557, 49 L. ed. 1161. The extent to which national banks may sue or be sued civilly in state or national courts is distinct from the question what law, state or national, either court shall apply, that is what law, state or national, governs in the particular matter. Congress has declared that a national bank shall be deemed for purposes of suing or being sued a "citizen" of the state in which it is located. Congress has also declared that most types of suits by or against national banks shall be cognizable in state courts, but that some are cognizable exclusively in the federal courts. U. S. C., Title 28, § 41, subd. (16), Title 12, § 94.

That a state may not tax the operations of a national bank but may under restrictions tax the property of the corporation and the shares of shareholders as their property, see the chapter on Taxation. See Alfred J. Schweppe (1922) 6 Minn. Law. Rev. 219-229.

Speaking of state banks, banks organized under the laws of a state, that have voluntarily joined the Federal Reserve Bank system, it has been said:

"Finally Congress may employ state corporations with their consent as instrumentalities of the United States, Clallam County v. United States, 263 U. S. 341, and may make frauds that impair their efficiency crimes, United States v. Walter, 263 U. S. 15," Westfall v. United States (1927) 274 U. S. 256, 71 L. ed. 1036, sustaining a conviction of Westfall charged with aiding and procuring the branch manager of a state bank which was a member of the Federal Reserve System to misapply the funds of the state bank, the indictment being drawn under a national statute, and the statute as thus construed was held valid.

BATTLE v. UNITED STATES.

1908. Supreme Court of the United States. 209 U. S. 36.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court.

This case comes up on a writ of error to the United States Circuit Court, after a conviction of the plaintiff in error of murder without capital punishment. The chief error assigned is that the court proceeded without jurisdiction—an objection taken by demurrer and renewed in other forms. The crime was committed upon land bought by the United States in the city of Macon, on which it was building a post office and court-house, and over which the State of Georgia had ceded jurisdiction; but it is said that murder in a post office of the United States has not been made an offense against the United States, whatever might be the power of Congress if it saw fit to put it forth.

There can be no doubt of the power of Congress to purchase land within a state for post offices or courts, by consent of the legislature of the state, and to exercise exclusive legislation over the same. Post offices are among the "other needful buildings" for the erection of which, as well as of "forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards," it is assumed that land will be bought, and for which land has been bought by the government all over the United States. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 17. Indeed, this is not denied. The power to establish post offices is given by Art. I, § 8, cl. 7, in terms. See Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S. 367, 372; Burt v. Merchants' Insurance Co., 106 Mass., 356; Trombley v. Humphrey, 23 Mich., 471, 475; Sinks v. Reese, 19 Ohio St. 306. The exclusive legislative power and jurisdiction of the United States is equally clear. Fort Leavenworth R. R. Co. v. Lowe, 114 U. S. 525; Benson v. United States, 146 U. S. 325. So that the question is only whether the statutes of the United States extend to this case, which was the question intended to be raised.

By Rev. Stat. § 5339, "Every person who commits murder—First. Within any fort, arsenal, dock-yard, magazine, or in any other place or district of country under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States; * * * shall suffer death"; and by the act of January 15, 1897, c. 29, § 1, 29 Stat. 487, in such cases "the jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto 'without capital punishment,'" whereupon the sentence is imprisonment at hard labor for life. The jurisdiction of the United States courts under these sections is exclusive. Rev. Stat. § 711. If the language of the Constitution is wide enough to authorize the purchase of land for a post office and court-house and the acceptance of a grant of jurisdiction, there is no reason for taking the language of the statute in any narrower sense. The argument, although ostensibly directed against the statute, must embrace the Constitution, and, as we have implied, such an argument comes many years too late. [After brief comment upon some exceptions taken to the trial judge's instructions the opinion concludes:]

The foregoing are the exceptions argued. In our opinion there is nothing in them or in any that were taken. The judgment of the Circuit Court must stand.[5]

FORT LEAVENWORTH R. CO. v. LOWE.

1885. Supreme Court of the United States. 114 U. S. 525.

This was a suit at law brought by the plaintiff in error as plaintiff below in a District Court of the State of Kansas to recover taxes imposed upon it and paid, on its property within the Fort Leavenworth Military Reservation. The defendant, sheriff of the County of Leavenworth, demurred to the complaint. The demurrer was sustained by the district court, and the judgment thereon was affirmed by the supreme court of the state. This writ of error was brought to review that judgment. The facts which raise the federal question are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff, a corporation organized under the laws of Kansas, was in 1880, and has ever since been, the owner of a railroad in the reservation of the United States in that state, known as the Fort Leavenworth Military Reservation. In that year its track, right of way, franchises, road-bed, telegraph line and instruments connected therewith on the reservation, were assessed by the board of assessors of the state, and a tax of $394.40 levied thereon, which was paid by the railroad company under protest, in order to prevent a sale of the property. The present action is brought to recover back the money thus paid, on the ground that the property, being entirely within the reservation, was exempt from assessment and taxation by the state.

which the United States had acquired exclusive jurisdiction, held punishable by a federal court, the law applicable being that stated in a New Jersey statute which by adoption Congress had made a part of the statutory law of the United States in said federal "island" at Trenton); State ex rel. Jones v. Mack (1897) 23 Nev. 359, 47 Pac. 763, 62 Am. St. 811 (a state court has no jurisdiction to try a person charged with assault committed with a deadly weapon on such a federal "island" as is above described).

Cf. United States v. Bateman (1888) 34 Fed. 86 (The Presidio, an area adjoining San Francisco, was occupied by the United States as a military reservation from its conquest from Mexico continuously until the homicide was committed. Prior to the admission of California and since, the area has been public land of the United States reserved from sale. The act of Congress admitting California into the Union did not reserve any special authority ("sovereignty") to the general government over the area. Held, that the homicide, one soldier killing another, both being stationed there, was not an offense against the United States which did not have over the area the exclusive jurisdiction referred to in Art. I, § 8, Cl. 17, and that the State of California had sole jurisdiction to punish the offense); Accord: United States v. Stahl (1868) Fed. Cas. No. 16373, McCahon 206, 1 Kans. 606; Clay v. State (1866) 4 Kans. 49 (homicide in Ft. Leavenworth military reservation); and see United States v. Tully (1905) 140 Fed. 899 (Tully was convicted of murder by the state trial court and the conviction was reversed by the state supreme court on the ground that the offense was not committed within the jurisdiction of the state, the place of committal being land used by the United States army as an annex to the Ft. Missoula military reservation in Montana. On a subsequent indictment in the federal court the accused was discharged for want of jurisdiction, the federal court disagreeing with the state supreme court as to the status of the site of the crime).

The land constituting the reservation was part of the territory acquired in 1803 by session from France, and, until the formation of the State of Kansas, and her admission into the union, the United States possessed the rights of a proprietor, and had political dominion and sovereignty over it. For many years before that admission it had been reserved from sale by the proper authorities of the United States for military purposes, and occupied by them as a military post. The jurisdiction of the United States over it during this time was necessarily paramount. But in 1861 Kansas was admitted into the union upon an equal footing with the original states, that is, with the same rights of political dominion and sovereignty, subject like them only to the Constitution of the United States. Congress might undoubtedly, upon such admission, have stipulated for retention of the political authority, dominion and legislative power of the United States over the reservation, so long as it should be used for military purposes by the government; that is, it could have excepted the place from the jurisdiction of Kansas, as one needed for the uses of the general government. But from some cause, inadvertence perhaps, or over-confidence that a recession of such jurisdiction could be had whenever desired, no such stipulation or exception was made. The United States, therefore, retained after the admission of the state only the rights of an ordinary proprietor; except [that,] as an instrument for the execution of the powers of the general government, that part of the tract, which was actually used for a fort or military post, was beyond such control of the state, by taxation or otherwise, as would defeat its use for those purposes. So far as the land constituting the reservation was not used for military purposes, the possession of the United States was only that of an individual proprietor.[6] The state could have exercised with reference to it, the same authority and jurisdiction which she could have exercised over similar property held by private parties. This defect in the jurisdiction of the United States was called to the attention of the government in 1872. In April of that year the secretary of war addressed a communication to the attorney-general, enclosing papers touching the reservation, and submitting for his official opinion the questions, whether under the Constitution the reservation of the land for a site as a military post and for public buildings took it out of the operation of the law of March 3, 1859, 11 Stat. 430, and, if so, what action would be required on the part of the executive or Congress to restore the land to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. The attorney-general replied that the act admitting Kansas as a state into the union had the effect to withdraw from federal jurisdiction all the territory within the boundaries of the new state, excepting only that of the Indians having treaties with the United States, which provided that without their consent such territory should not be subject to state jurisdiction, and the reservation was not within this exception; and that to restore the federal jurisdiction over the land included in the reservation, it would be necessary to obtain from the State of Kansas a cession of jurisdiction, which he had no doubt would upon application be readily granted by the state legislature. 14 Opin. Attorneys General, 33. It does not appear from the record before us that such application was ever made; but, on the 22d of February, 1875, the legislature of the state passed an act entitled "An Act to cede jurisdiction to the United States over the territory of the Fort Leavenworth Military Reservation," the first section of which is as follows:

[6] If this statement is correct in its general suggestion or point of view is it not too sweeping? Compare Van Brocklin v. Tennessee (1886) 117 U. S. 151, 29 L. ed. 845 (land owned by the United States within a state though unoccupied and unused for any governmental purpose other than eventual sale is exempt from state taxation); Camfield v. United States (1897) 167 U. S. 518, 42 L. ed. 260 (Congress may by legislation protect federal proprietary interests in vacant public land which lies within the bounds of a state even by regulations which restrict the conduct of adjacent landowners upon their own land); Wilcox v. Jackson (1839) 13 Pet. (U. S.) 498, 516, 10 L. ed. 264 (Congress has exclusive power to make the rules of law which determine how and when the title to public land passes from the United States. See Const. Art. IV, Sec. 3, Cl. 2.); Utah Power & Light Co. v. United States (1917) 243 U. S. 389, 61 L. ed. 791 (a state can not authorize condemnation of public lands of the United States within the bounds of the state for public utility purposes). In the last cited case Van Devanter, J. for the court said: "True, for many purposes a state has civil and criminal jurisdiction over lands within its limits belonging to the United States, but this jurisdiction does not extend to any matter that is not consistent with full power in the United States to protect its lands, to control their use and to prescribe in what manner others may acquire rights in them. Thus while the state may punish public offenses, such as murder or larceny, committed on such lands, and may tax private property, such as live stock, located thereon, it may not tax the lands themselves or invest others with any right whatever in them.

"That exclusive jurisdiction be, and the same is hereby ceded to the United States over and within all the territory owned by the United States, and included within the limits of the United States military reservation known as the Fort Leavenworth Reservation in said state, as declared from time to time by the president of the United States, saving, however, to the said state the right to serve civil or criminal process within said reservation, in suits or prosecutions for or on account of rights acquired, obligations incurred, or crimes committed in said state, but outside of said cession and reservation; and saving further to said state the right to tax railroad, bridge, and other corporations, their franchises and property, on said reservation." Laws of Kansas, 1875, p. 95.

* * * And so we are of opinion that the inclusion within a state of lands of the United States does not take from Congress the power to control their occupancy and use, to protect them from trespass and injury and to prescribe the conditions upon which others may obtain rights in them, even though this may involve the exercise in some measure of what commonly is known as the police power."

The question as to the right of the plaintiff to recover back the taxes paid depends upon the validity and effect of the last saving clause in this act. As we have said, there is no evidence before us that any application was made by the United States for this legislation, but, as it conferred a benefit, the acceptance of the act is to be presumed in the absence of any dissent on their part. The contention of the plaintiff is that the act of cession operated under the Constitution to vest in the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the reservation, and that the last saving clause, being inconsistent with that result, is to be rejected. The Constitution provides that "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district, (not exceeding ten miles square,) as may, by cession of particular states and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." Art. 1, sec. 8. * * *

This power of exclusive legislation is to be exercised, as thus seen, over places purchased, by consent of the legislatures of the states in which they are situated, for the specific purposes enumerated. It would seem to have been the opinion of the framers of the Constitution that, without the consent of the states, the new government would not be able to acquire lands within them; and therefore it was provided that when it might require such lands for the erection of forts and other buildings for the defence of the country, or the discharge of other duties devolving upon it, and the consent of the states in which they were situated was obtained for their acquisition, such consent should carry with it political dominion and legislative authority over them. Purchase with such consent was the only mode then thought of for the acquisition by the general government of title to lands in the states. Since the adoption of the Constitution this view has not generally prevailed. Such consent has not always been obtained, nor supposed necessary, for the purchase by the general government of lands within the states. If any doubt has ever existed as to its power thus to acquire lands within the states, it has not had sufficient strength to create any effective dissent from the general opinion. The consent of the states to the purchase of lands within them for the special purposes named is, however, essential, under the Constitution, to the transfer to the general government, with the title, of political jurisdiction and dominion.[7] Where lands are acquired without such consent, the possession of the United States, unless political jurisdiction be ceded to them in some other way, is simply that of an ordinary proprietor. The property in that case, unless used as a means to carry out the purposes of the government, is subject to the legislative authority and control of the states equally with the property of private individuals.[8] [7] Meaning governmental authority additional to what the general government had over it prior to such consent, that is, passing from the federal into the unitary scheme of American government.

But not only by direct purchase have the United States been able to acquire lands they needed without the consent of the states, but it has been held that they possess the right of eminent domain within the states, * * *. This doctrine was authoritatively declared in Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S. 367. * * *

Besides these modes of acquisition, the United States possessed, on the adoption of the Constitution, an immense domain lying north and west of the Ohio River, acquired as the result of the Revolutionary War from Great Britain, or by cessions from Virginia, Massachusetts and Connecticut; and, since the adoption of the Constitution, they have by cession from foreign countries, come into the ownership of a territory still larger, lying between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean, and out of these territories several states have been formed and admitted into the union. The proprietorship of the United States in large tracts of land within these states has remained after their admission. There has been, therefore, no necessity for them to purchase or to condemn lands within those states, for forts, arsenals, and other public buildings, unless they have disposed of what they afterwards needed. Having the title, they have usually reserved certain portions of their lands from sale or other disposition, for the uses of the government.

[8] Certainly persons thereon are within the jurisdiction of the state and as much within the control of the state as are persons in any other part of the state. Of course, federal agents thereon doing acts validly authorized by federal law are exempt from state interference as are federal agents doing federally authorized acts in other parts of the state.

In Ohio v. Thomas (1899) 173 U. S. 276, 283, 43 L. ed. 699, Thomas was convicted in an Ohio court for violation of an Ohio statute which imposed regulations upon the using or serving of oleomargarine in eating houses. On his petition to a federal court for a writ of habeas corpus it appeared that the acts charged were done by him as governor of a national soldiers' home located in the State of Ohio. Though the United States had acquired this land with the consent of the state Congress had granted the state's jurisdiction back to it. The writ was issued and the prisoner discharged. In affirming the discharge the Supreme Court held that the governor used and served the oleomargarine under specific authority of Congress given in appropriation bills enacted in response to itemized estimates which the court said must be presumed to have included oleomargarine as part of the rations of the inmates. Mr. Justice Peckham, for the court, said: "Federal officers who are discharging their duties in a state and who are engaged as this appellee was engaged in superintending the internal government and management of a federal institution, under the lawful direction of its board of managers and with the approval of Congress, are not subject to the jurisdiction of the state in regard to those very matters of administration which are thus approved by federal authority.

"In asserting that this officer under such circumstances is exempt from the state law, the United States are not thereby claiming jurisdiction over this particular piece of land, in opposition to the language of the act of Congress ceding back the jurisdiction the United States received from the state. The government is but claiming that its own officers, when discharging duties under federal authority pursuant to and by virtue of valid federal laws, are not subject to arrest or other liability under the laws of the state in which their duties are performed."

In Pundt v. Pendleton (1909) 167 Fed. 997, teamsters employed by the quarter-master's department of the United States army, not enlisted men, and free to quit "except as bound by contract" who had worked for the government, one more than a year others about three years, were held exempt from state public road service required by Georgia law of all male inhabitants of the state between the ages of 16 and 50. Was the fact material that the teamsters lived inside a federal military reservation which had been purchased by the United States with the consent of the legislature of Georgia?

This brief statement as to the different modes in which the United States have acquired title to lands upon which public buildings have been erected will serve to explain the nature of their jurisdiction over such places, and the consistency with each other of decisions on the subject by federal and state tribunals, and of opinions of the attorneys general.

When the title is acquired by purchase by consent of the legislatures of the states, the federal jurisdiction is exclusive of all state authority. This follows from the declaration of the Constitution that Congress shall have "like authority" over such places as it has over the district which is the seat of government; that is, the power of "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever." Broader or clearer language could not be used to exclude all other authority than that of Congress; and that no other authority can be exercised over them has been the uniform opinion of federal and state tribunals, and of the attorneys general.

The reservation which has usually accompanied the consent of the states, that civil and criminal process of the state courts may be served in the places purchased, is not considered as interfering in any respect with the supremacy of the United States over them; but is admitted to prevent them from becoming an asylum for fugitives from justice. * * *

The case referred to in which the subject was considered by a learned state court is that of Commonwealth v. Clary, 8 Mass. 72. There the Supreme Court of Massachusetts held that the courts of the commonwealth could not take cognizance of offences committed upon lands in the town of Springfield purchased with the consent of the commonwealth by the United States for the purpose of erecting arsenals upon them. That was the case of a prosecution against the defendant for selling spirituous liquors on the land without a license, contrary to a statute of the state. But the court held that the law had no operation within the lands mentioned.

In Sinks v. Reese, 19 Ohio St. 306, the question came before the Supreme Court of Ohio, as to the effect of a proviso in the act of that state, ceding to the United States its jurisdiction over lands within her limits for the purposes of a National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, which was, that nothing in the act should be construed to prevent the officers, employees and inmates of the asylum, who were qualified voters of the State, from exercising the right of suffrage at all township, county, and state elections in the township in which the National Asylum should be located. And it was held that, upon the purchase of the territory by the United States, with the consent of the legislature of the state, the general government became invested with exclusive jurisdiction over it and its appurtenances in all cases whatsoever; and that the inmates of such asylum resident within the territory, being within such exclusive jurisdiction, were not residents of the state so as to entitle them to vote, within the meaning of the [state] constitution, which conferred the elective franchise upon its residents alone.[9] * * *

These authorities are sufficient to support the proposition which follows naturally from the language of the Constitution, that no other legislative power than that of Congress can be exercised over lands within a state purchased by the United States with her consent for one of the purposes designated; and that such consent under the Constitution operates to exclude all other legislative authority.

But with reference to lands owned by the United States, acquired by purchase without the consent of the state, or by cessions from other governments, the case is different. Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says: "If there has been no cession by the state of the place, although it has been constantly occupied and used under purchase, or otherwise, by the United States for a fort or arsenal, or other constitutional purpose, the state jurisdiction still remains complete and perfect;" and in support of this statement he refers to People v. Godfrey, 17 Johns. 225. In that case the land on which Fort Niagara was erected, in New York, never having been ceded by the state to the United States, it was adjudged that the courts of the state had jurisdiction of crimes or offences against the laws of the state committed within the fort or its precincts, although it had been garrisoned by the troops of the United States and held by them since its surrender by Great Britain pursuant to the treaties of 1783 and 1794. * * *

Where, therefore, lands are acquired in any other way by the United States within the limits of a state than by purchase with her consent, they will hold the lands subject to this qualification: that if upon them forts, arsenals, or other public buildings are erected for the uses of the general government, such buildings, with their appurtenances, as instrumentalities for the execution of its powers, will be free from any such interference and jurisdiction of the state as would destroy or impair their effective use for the purposes designed. Such is the law with reference to all instrumentalities created by the general government.[10] Their exemption from state control is essential to the independence and sovereign authority of the United States within the sphere of their delegated powers. But, when not used as such instrumentalities, the legislative power of the state over the places acquired will be as full and complete as over any other places within her limits.

For peculiarities as to the establishment and status of this National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and its branches see U. S. C. A., tit. 24, §§ 71, 77, 79; National Home v. Parrish (1913) 229 U. S. 494, 57 L. ed. 1296; State ex rel. Lyle v. Willett, supra.

As already stated, the land constituting the Fort Leavenworth Military Reservation was not purchased, but was owned by the United States by cession from France many years before Kansas became a state; and whatever political sovereignty and dominion the United States had [has] over the place comes from the cession of the state since her admission into the union. It not being a case where exclusive legislative authority is vested by the Constitution of the United States, that cession could be accompanied with such conditions as the state might see fit to annex not inconsistent with the free and effective use of the fort as a military post. * * *

We are here met with the objection that the legislature of a state has no power to cede away her jurisdiction and legislative power over any portion of her territory, except as such cession follows under the Constitution from her consent to a purchase by the United States for some one of the purposes mentioned. If this were so, it would not aid the railroad company; the jurisdiction of the state would then remain as it previously existed. But aside from this consideration, it is undoubtedly true that the state, whether represented by her legislature, or through a convention specially called for that purpose, is incompetent to cede her political jurisdiction and legislative authority over any part of her territory to a foreign country, without the concurrence of the general government. The jurisdiction of the United States extends over all the territory within the states, and, therefore, their authority must be obtained, as well as that of the state within which the territory is situated, before any cession of sovereignty or political jurisdiction can be made to a foreign country. * * *

In their relation to the general government, the states of the union stand in a very different position from that which they hold to foreign governments. Though the jurisdiction and authority of the general government are essentially different from those of the state, they are not those of a different country; and the two, the state and general government, may deal with each other in any way they may deem best to carry out the purposes of the Constitution.

It is for the protection and interests of the states, their people and property, as well as for the protection and interests of the people generally of the United States, that forts, arsenals, and other buildings for public uses are constructed within the states. As instrumentalities for the execution of the powers of the general government, they are, as already said, exempt from such control of the states as would defeat or impair their use for those purposes; and if, to their more effective use, a cession of legislative authority and political jurisdiction by the state would be desirable, we do not perceive any objection to its grant by the legislature of the state. Such cession is really as much for the benefit of the state as it is for the benefit of the United States. It is necessarily temporary, to be exercised only so long as the places continue to be used for the public purposes for which the property was acquired or reserved from sale. When they cease to be thus used, the jurisdiction reverts to the state.

The Military Reservation of Fort Leavenworth was not, as already said, acquired by purchase with the consent of Kansas. And her cession of jurisdiction is not of exclusive legislative authority over the land, except so far as that may be necessary for its use as a military post; and it is not contended that the saving clause in the act of cession interferes with such use. There is, therefore, no constitutional prohibition against the enforcement of that clause. The right of the state to subject the railroad property to taxation exists as before the cession. The invalidity of the tax levied not being asserted on any other ground than the supposed exclusive jurisdiction of the United States over the reservation notwithstanding the saving clause, the judgment of the court below must be

Affirmed.

EFFECT OF A CESSION OF JURISDICTION BY A STATE TO THE UNITED STATES.

"The greatest landed proprietor throughout the several states is undoubtedly the United States. Besides numerous Indian reservations, national parks, and forest and game preserves, the federal government maintains military or naval stations in every state but one,[11] post offices and court houses in most large cities,[12] and many other institutions, from life-saving stations to penitentiaries, throughout the country. Thus, such places as Ft. Leavenworth, [12] Congress appropriates funds for the erection of approximately 100 new federal buildings a session. See ROSE, JURISDICTION AND PROCEDURE OF THE FEDERAL COURTS (3d ed. 1926) § 91.

Muscle Shoals, West Point, Sandy Hook and Old Point Comfort are under federal proprietorship. Moreover, the United States is the country's greatest landlord. Besides a numerous official personnel, its reservations contain thousands of civilian inhabitants, whose status, by reason of the nature of federal proprietorship, is often peculiar. They are within the physical limits of a state but, in many cases, beyond its jurisdiction. Hence they are to a certain extent beyond the law. * * *

"Congress early enacted penal laws for territory over which it had [exclusive] jurisdiction,[13] and in 1825 passed the first assimulation crime statute,[14] providing that where an offense was not specially provided for by any federal law, it should be prosecuted in the federal courts and receive the same punishment as the laws of the state in which the territory was situated prescribed for a like offense. This statute was held to be not unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power,[15] since it was construed as adopting only such state penal laws as existed at the time of its enactment,[16] or re-enactment.[17] It has been substantially re-enacted in 1866,[18] when a provision that no subsequent repeal of any state law should have any effect was added, in 1898,[19] and in 1909.[20] It is not operative, however, when the state law in its terms does not permit of adoption, as where the state law provides that a prosecution for criminal libel may be brought only in the county where the libelous paper is published.[21]

"While Congress has thus provided a criminal code for ceded territory, it has enacted little or no law respecting private rights. Under the rule of international law applicable when territory passes from one sovereignty to another, the local law regarding private rights existing at the time of the cession, so far as it is not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, has been held to continue until superseded by federal legislation.[22] Thus a railway has been held responsible as an insurer for the killing of cattle on its right of way through a military reservation, when at the time of the cession a state statute imposed on it such responsibility on failure to fence its track.[23] But a refusal on the part of the War Department to permit fencing because it would "greatly restrict the use of the reservation for drill and maneuver purposes" has been held a good defense to a similar action.[24] The laws of negligence[25] and the rights of action for wrongful death[26] in effect at the time of the cession have likewise been held to continue, except where abrogated by the enactment of a federal employees' compensation law.[27] But state laws, such as a workmen's compensation act[28] or a law imposing responsibility on a telegraph company for failure to deliver a message,[29] passed subsequent to the cession and creating new causes of action, have no application. * * *

"While Congress has kept the penal law of ceded territory reasonably up to date by re-enactment of the assimulation crime statute, private rights within such territory are in general determined only by such law as existed at the time of cession, in many cases fifty or one hundred years ago. Moreover, its inhabitants are usually denied by the state wherein the territory is situated the civil and political rights which it accords to residents, and are given no substitutes by Congress. Thus it has been held that they are not entitled to vote in state elections,[30] to send their children to the public schools,[31] to benefit by the poor laws,[32] or to sue for divorce in the state courts.[33] The exemption which they enjoy from state taxation[34] and from the duty to work on state roads[35] seems inadequate compensation for so great a loss of civil rights. On grounds of necessity it has been held that a state court retained probate jurisdiction over ceded territory, Congress not having conferred it on the federal courts,[36] and a similar view has been expressed by dissenting judges with regard to divorce.[37] But by the weight of authority inhabitants of such territory are considered non-residents of the state for all purposes.[38]"—37 Yale Law J. CHAPTER III.

CITIZENSHIP, NATIONAL AND STATE.

Section 1.—What is National Citizenship?

"Modern systems of public law recognize four concepts which it is necessary for this purpose to define briefly. These are nationality, alienage, subjection and citizenship.

"Nationality is the characteristic or status of a person by virtue of which he belongs to a particular state.[1] As a synonym for nationalität, many German writers prefer staatsangehörigkeit, which accurately embodies the above definition.

"The opposite of nationality is alienage, a proposition that completely defines alienage. Re-stated, alienage is the characteristic of not belonging to the state, from the standpoint of which the person is being regarded. Alienage is a negative, nationality a positive. Thus we say clothed with American nationality, but not clothed with alienage. 'American alienage' would be an inexcusable novelty. Alienage is regarded as a disability, an incapacity. Yet we speak of the status of alienage and the status of nationality, just as, in private law, we speak of the status of infancy, or of lunacy. A person who has the status of alienage is called an alien. To find a corresponding term to apply to a person who has the status of nationality has troubled writers on public law in all languages. 'Subject' and 'citizen' have been so much abused that neither has any longer the singleness or the definiteness of meaning that is desired in accurate writing. In France several years ago, the word national came into use for this purpose, and is now general there. The more learned and clearer American and English writers have adopted it; and clearness of thought and exposition demand its use.

"It is permissible, therefore, to state that a person is a national of the state in which he has the status of nationality. Recurring to the definition of nationality, a national is a person who belongs to the state, nothing more nor less.

"What is meant by belonging to a state is that the person who belongs, who is a national, is one upon whom the state has primary claims as against other states. The chief significance of nationality is in international relations.

"The jurisdiction of the state extends in a qualified way over its nationals while they are abroad. The state may make acts done by them abroad criminal (crimes against itself) and, upon their return, may punish them. It may command its nationals to return home at a time of public emergency to serve the state, as in its armies, and their refusal to obey is just ground for punishment, should the state later lawfully get possession of their persons; and no other state may complain. The chief benefit of nationality is that the national abroad is entitled[2] to the protection of his state.

[1] The term "nationality" is used in its legal, not its ethnological, sense. In this essay the word "state" is used in its international sense of an independent nation or country, such as the British Empire, France or the United States of America.

"With the alien it is different. So long as he remains outside of the territorial limits of a particular state, he is in nowise subject to the jurisdiction of that state, except in rare instances of his committing an act outside and in violation of the law of a state, which takes effect within the territorial limits of that state. Piracy is an anomalous exception.

"So soon as an alien crosses the territorial boundary into a state, he becomes almost wholly subject to its jurisdiction. But not wholly. It seems that he cannot be compulsively enlisted in the army of the state, at least in an international war. He may not be prevented from leaving the state, except for cause, that is, when leaving would permit him to escape or evade a duty which has lawfully been imposed upon him, or which he assumed. If he is a national of a foreign state his state has the privilege of diplomatic intervention to protect him from, or claim compensation for, arbitrary acts of the state in which he resides, if those acts are violative of international law, or treaties. The special privileges of the head of a foreign state, a foreign minister, or ambassador, and the less extensive privileges of a foreign consul, are additional exceptions.

"These qualifications, though potentially of great importance, are practically so slight, or applicable to such a limited number of persons, that it may be repeated that an alien who has entered the territorial limits of a state is almost wholly subject to its jurisdiction.

"Once he has lawfully left the territory, having discharged all duties lawfully imposed upon him or assumed by him, he entirely ceases to be subject to the state.

"With these fundamental notions, which cannot be treated in detail here, the concepts of nationality and alienage stand out clearly and distinctly.

"As to any particular state it may be said that every person in the world is either a national or an alien.

"Now, it may be asked, what law determines this distribution or division of all persons in the world among the several states? What law determines which persons belong to this state and to that? Being an international matter it would seem that international law itself should furnish the rule of division. But it does not do so. International law has here a complete hiatus. The only rule that it lays down is, that each state may determine for itself what persons it will regard as nationals. In short, it lays down a rule of confusion, and confusion exists. As a result we have cases of double nationality. By French law a person born in the United States of French parents may be a French national; by the American law he is an American national, etc. In instances now rare, a person may have no nationality at all, a heimatlos as European writers term him.

[2] Perhaps it is more accurate to say that a state is privileged to "protect" its nationals.

"International law, whether public or private, does not even offer a recognized rule for resolving these conflicts of laws, though the doctrine of election at majority promises to grow into a rule of law.

"This confusion is not at all inherent in the concept of nationality, or in the status itself, but resides wholly in the rule of division, in the determination of what persons have the nationalities of the several states. That is, while international law has defined the rights of a national, it has provided no rules for determining who are nationals of the various states. Of course, since in the crude condition of international law, each state legislates for itself in this matter, it should be perfectly feasible to declare accurately who, by the laws of a given state, are nationals of that state.

"Now a word as to the concept, 'subjection.' In English law a national was and is called a 'subject.' So too an alien, while within the territorial limits, was regarded as a 'temporary' subject, as owing a temporary allegiance.[3] It is apparent that 'subject' has a double sense. As applied to the alien within the state it means one who is subject to the state, not a subject of the state. Subjection is a tantamount derivative from subject, in the sense of subject to the state, but not from subject as a synonym for national. The confused use of the word 'subject' is so obvious that it must either be discarded altogether, or it must be confined to the idea of one subject to the jurisdiction, one in a condition of subjection to the state. Of course, there will be degrees of subjection. The alien within the state is almost wholly subject, the alien without is almost wholly not subject. So far the word 'subject' has been discussed on its merits, and it appears that its use in our law to designate the concept 'national' will only perpetuate confused thought.

"In fact it is rarely so used. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, in monarchical states, it became so intimately associated with the idea of subjects of a monarch that the American revolutionists and the democratic revolutionists in continental Europe at the close of the eighteenth century, regarded it as an odious term, resorting to 'citizen,' 'member,' and even 'inhabitant' to avoid its use. An American national today has no objection to being called a subject of the American national democratic state,[4] but this affords no reason for retaining or reviving the word as an equivalent for national. Subject and subjection, without this, have their appropriate and distinct meaning.

"A statute of Henry VIII enacted that if anybody should rob or take 'the goods of the king's subjects within his realm,' and be found guilty the party robbed should have restitution of his goods. Of this statute Sir Matthew Hale said that 'though it speaks of the king's subjects, it extends to aliens robbed; for though they are not the king's natural born subjects, they are the king's subjects when in England, by local allegiance.' 1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, p. 42." Field, J., Ross v. McIntyre (1891) 140 U. S. 453, 476, 35 L. ed. 581.

"Finally, we have the concept 'citizenship.' The modern public law of England recognizes no such distinct concept. All persons, by that law are either subjects (nationals) or aliens. There is no class of nationals so specialized, or so privileged, as to require the recognition of this additional status.

"In Roman law the civitas as a distinct status of persons was recognized. Through the one thousand years of Roman history the complex of special privileges enjoyed by a person by virtue of his citizen status varied. These were not confined to political privileges. Details are not in place here. It is sufficient that, perhaps at all times, there were persons who belonged to the Roman state, but were not citizens.[5]

"In the middle ages the term 'citizen' designated a burgess (German, bürger), one who was an especially privileged inhabitant of a city, mainly the possessor of political privileges. In the French Constitution of 1799 a portion of the nationals were set apart and designated 'citizens.' These alone were made eligible to vote and hold office. It is believed that they differed from other nationals in no other respect. The Constitution itself answered the question who are 'citizens.'

"The Civil Code (1804) accepted this distinction. It referred to the fact that a French national could be a citizen only by fulfilling the qualifications of the Constitution of 1799, then still in force; that the enjoyment of civil rights was independent of citizenship; that every French national should enjoy civil rights, and set forth comprehensive rules to determine who were French nationals. Under that system, as under every other, the fundamental, the primary relationship is that of nationality. The foundation of the state, the state itself, is the body of nationals. These were represented in the electoral capacity by the citizen class. The name 'citizen' could have been dispensed with. 'Electors' and 'eligibles to office' would have supplied adequate terminology. Citizenship under that system was defined as a specially privileged political status, as the possession of the two designated political privileges.

[4] "The plain men who formed the constitution of New Jersey were not carried away by such refinements. They supposed (perhaps weakly) that allegiance might be due to the people as well as to the king, and that even a republican might be called, without offense, a subject, provided his master was the law." Rawle, counsel, in McIlvaine v. Coxe's Lessee (U. S. 1804) 2 Cranch 280, 318, 2 L. ed. 279.

[5] Mommsen's very full treatment of the whole subject in his Römische Staatsrecht is especially enlightening and written with a rare understanding of modern problems of nationality.

"In short there is no universal definition of citizenship when citizenship ceases to be synonymous with nationality. While nationality is an inherent necessity, a matter of international significance and defined by international law, citizenship, if it is confined to less than the whole body of nationals, if it is a specially privileged status conferred upon some nationals and denied to others, is purely an internal affair, variantly defined by the various legislations that recognize it. Moreover, the concept may be entirely dispensed with and ignored in a liberal system of legislation, without loss.

"In fact, three positions may be taken in any system of law: (1) to ignore and avoid the use of 'citizen' and 'citizenship'; (2) to recognize 'citizens' as an especially privileged class of nationals, in which case the terms must be defined by the system of law recognizing them; or (3) the legislation of a state may prefer the words citizen and citizenship though using them as exact equivalents of national and nationality. In that case it would be immaterial that the national was also called citizen at home, except that by ancient usage, the usage of the middle ages and in modern France, the term citizen has received a restricted sense, with which the word citizen as the equivalent of national is, and may be, confused.

"Is the citizenship spoken of in the Constitution of the United States a status distinct from and differing from American nationality? * * *"—D. O. McGovney. American Citizenship (1911) 11 Col. L. Rev. 231-236.[6]

[6] The remainder of the essay (11 Col. L. Rev. 236-250, 326-347) to which the above extract served as an introduction attempted to answer the question above put. A careful examination of our legal literature including constitutions, treaties, judicial decisions and dicta of judges seemed to establish that prior to the acquisition of our "insular possessions" at the close of the Spanish-American war there was no conscious recognition of the existence of any third category of persons other than citizens and aliens, and much to indicate that in American law citizenship and nationality are coextensive concepts. An exception may be Chief Justice Taney's remark that free negroes owed allegiance to the United States though he thought they were not citizens. The conclusion was drawn by the author that there is no justification for the idea that there are American nationals who are not citizens. He now doubts the soundness of his conclusion, and for two reasons: first, a distinction may exist though not recognized as existing, and there is no case which required a court to consider whether such a distinction existed (the dicta that American born tribal Indians were aliens may have been given too much weight); second, the concept, citizenship, like every other complex legal concept is the sum of its component parts. The status of citizenship as a concept in our constitutional law is the bundle of powers, privileges, immunities, duties and disabilities which, by the provisions of the Constitution, a citizen has by virtue of being a citizen. This concept in the field of constitutional law called citizenship may not be so rich a compound as the student may have presupposed and yet be richer than that compound known in international relations as nationality. Our legal literature offers no ready answer. Does the definition of citizenship in Minor v. Happersett comport with equivalence or difference between citizenship and nationality? Throughout this chapter there should be frequent recurrence to the question, what are the compositions of the concepts national citizenship and state citizenship. A distinction between nation-conferred state citizenship and state-conferred state citizenship may be observed.

COOK v. TAIT, UNITED STATES COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE

1924. Supreme Court of the United States. 265 U. S. 47.

MR. JUSTICE McKENNA delivered the opinion of the Court.

Action by plaintiff in error, who will be referred to as plaintiff, to recover the sum of $298.34 as the first installment of an income tax paid, it is charged, under the threats and demands of Tait.

The tax was imposed under the Revenue Act of 1921, which provides by section 210 (40 Stat. 227, 233):

"That, in lieu of the tax imposed by section 210 of the Revenue Act of 1918, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every individual a normal tax of 8 per centum of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 216: Provided, that in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States the rate upon the first $4,000 of such excess amount shall be 4 per centum."

Plaintiff is a native citizen of the United States, and was such when he took up his residence and became domiciled in the city of Mexico. A demand was made upon him by defendant in error, designated defendant, to make a return of his income for the purpose of taxation under the revenue laws of the United States. Plaintiff complied with the demand, but under protest; the income having been derived from property situated in the city of Mexico. A tax was assessed against him in the sum of $1,193.38, the first installment of which he paid, and for it, as we have said this action was brought.

The question in the case, and which was presented by the demurrer to the declaration is, as expressed by plaintiff, whether Congress has power to impose a tax upon income received by a native citizen of the United States who, at the time the income was received, was permanently resident and domiciled in the city of Mexico, the income being from real and personal property located in Mexico.

Plaintiff assigns against the power, not only his rights under the Constitution of the United States, but under international law, and in support of the assignments cites many cases. It will be observed that the foundation of the assignments is the fact that the citizen receiving the income and the property of which it is the product are outside of the territorial limits of the United States. These two facts, the contention is, exclude the existence of the power to tax. Or to put the contention another way, to the existence of the power and its exercise, the person receiving the income and the property from which he receives it must both be within the territorial limits of the United States to be within the taxing power of the United States. The contention is not justified, and that it is not justified is the necessary deduction of recent cases. In United States v. Bennett, 232 U. S. 299, the power of the United States to tax a foreign-built yacht owned and used during the taxing period outside of the United States by a citizen domiciled in the United States was sustained. The tax passed on was imposed by a tariff act, but necessarily the power does not depend upon the form by which it is exerted.

We may make further exposition of the national power as the case depends upon it. It was illustrated at once in United States v. Bennett by a contrast with the power of a state. It was pointed out that there were limitations upon the latter that were not on the national power. The taxing power of a state, it was decided, encountered at its borders the taxing power of other states and was limited by them. There was no such limitation, it was pointed out, upon the national power, and that the limitation upon the states affords, it was said, no ground for constructing a barrier around the United States, "shutting that government off from the exertion of powers which inherently belong to it by virtue of its sovereignty."

The contention was rejected that a citizen's property without the limits of the United States derives no benefit from the United States. The contention, it was said, came from the confusion of thought in "mistaking the scope and extent of the sovereign power of the United States as a nation and its relations to its citizens and their relation to it." And that power in its scope and extent, it was decided, is based on the presumption that government by its very nature benefits the citizen and his property wherever found, and that opposition to it holds on to citizenship while it "belittles and destroys its advantages and blessings by denying the possession by government of an essential power required to make citizenship completely beneficial." In other words, the principle was declared that the government, by its very nature, benefits the citizen and his property wherever found, and therefore has the power to make the benefit complete. Or, to express it another way, the basis of the power to tax was not and cannot be made dependent upon the situs of the property in all cases, it being in or out of the United States, nor was not and cannot be made dependent upon the domicile of the citizen, that being in or out of the United States, but upon his relation as citizen to the United States and the relation of the latter to him as citizen. The consequence of the relations is that the native citizen who is taxed may have domicile, and the property from which his income is derived may have situs, in a foreign country and the tax be legal—the government having power to impose the tax.

Judgment affirmed.

MINOR v. HAPPERSETT.

1874. Supreme Court of the United States. 21 Wall. 162.

[Error to the Supreme Court of Missouri. Mrs. Minor brought an action in an inferior court of Missouri against a registrar of voters because of his refusal to register her as a voter at a general election in which presidential electors, a member of Congress and other officers were to be chosen. He relied for his refusal upon the constitution of Missouri which gave the privilege of voting only to male citizens of the United States. The Supreme Court of Missouri on appeal had affirmed a judgment for the defendant.]

Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

It is contended that the provisions of the constitution and laws of the State of Missouri which confine the right of suffrage and registration therefor to men, are in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore void. The argument is, that as a woman, born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is a citizen of the United States and of the state in which she resides, she has the right of suffrage as one of the privileges and immunities of her citizenship, which the state cannot by its laws or constitution abridge.

There is no doubt that women may be citizens. They are persons, and by the fourteenth amendment "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof" are expressly declared to be "citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside." But, in our opinion, it did not need this amendment to give them that position. Before its adoption the Constitution of the United States did not in terms prescribe who should be citizens of the United States or of the several states, yet there were necessarily such citizens without such provision. There cannot be a nation without a people. The very idea of a political community, such as a nation is, implies an association of persons for the promotion of their general welfare. Each one of the persons associated becomes a member of the nation formed by the association. He owes it allegiance and is entitled to its protection. Allegiance and protection are, in this connection, reciprocal obligations. The one is a compensation for the other; allegiance for protection and protection for allegiance.

For convenience it has been found necessary to give a name to this membership. The object is to designate by a title the person and the relation he bears to the nation. For this purpose the words "subject," "inhabitant," and "citizen" have been used, and the choice between them is sometimes made to depend upon the form of the government. Citizen is now more commonly employed, however, and as it has been considered better suited to the description of one living under a republican government, it was adopted by nearly all of the states upon their separation from Great Britain, and was afterwards adopted in the Articles of Confederation and in the Constitution of the United States. When used in this sense it is understood as conveying the idea of membership of a nation, and nothing more. * * *

The Constitution does not, in words, say who shall be natural-born citizens. Resort must be had elsewhere to ascertain that. At common-law, with the nomenclature of which the framers of the Constitution were familiar, it was never doubted that all children born in a country of parents who were its citizens became themselves, upon their birth, citizens also. These were natives, or natural-born citizens, as distinguished from aliens or foreigners. Some authorities go further and include as citizens children born within the jurisdiction without reference to the citizenship of their parents. As to this class there have been doubts, but never as to the first. For the purposes of this case it is not necessary to solve these doubts. It is sufficient for everything we have now to consider that all children born of citizen parents within the jurisdiction are themselves citizens. The words "all children" are certainly as comprehensive, when used in this connection, as "all persons," and if females are included in the last they must be in the first. That they are included in the last is not denied. In fact the whole argument of the plaintiffs proceeds upon that idea. * * * [After a brief review of the early statutes on naturalization the opinion continues:] From this it is apparent that from the commencement of the legislation upon this subject alien women and alien minors could be made citizens by naturalization, and we think it will not be contended that this would have been done if it had not been supposed that native women and native minors were already citizens by birth. * * * The Fourteenth Amendment did not affect the citizenship of women any more than it did of men. In this particular, therefore, the rights of Mrs. Minor do not depend upon the Amendment. She has always been a citizen from her birth, and entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizenship. The Amendment prohibited the state, of which she is a citizen, from abridging any of her privileges and immunities as a citizen of the United States; but it did not confer citizenship on her. That she had before its adoption.

If the right of suffrage is one of the necessary privileges of a citizen of the United States, then the constitution and laws of Missouri confining it to men are in violation of the Constitution of the United States, as amended, and consequently void. The direct question is, therefore, presented whether all citizens are necessarily voters.

The Constitution does not define the privileges and immunities of citizens. For that definition we must look elsewhere. In this case we need not determine what they are, but only whether suffrage is necessarily one of them.

It certainly is nowhere made so in express terms. The United States has no voters in the states, of its own creation. The elective officers of the United States are all elected directly or indirectly by state voters. The members of the House of Representatives are to be chosen by the people of the states, and the electors in each state must have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature. Senators are to be chosen by the legislatures of the states, and necessarily the members of the legislature required to make the choice are elected by the voters of the state. Each state must appoint in such manner, as the legislature thereof may direct, the electors to elect the President and Vice-President. * * *

The Amendment did not add to the privileges and immunities of a citizen. It simply furnished an additional guaranty for the protection of such as he already had. * * * This makes it proper to inquire whether suffrage was coextensive with the citizenship of the states at the time of its adoption. It if was, then it may with force be argued that suffrage was one of the rights which belonged to citizenship, and in the enjoyment of which every citizen must be protected. But if it was not, the contrary may with propriety be assumed.

When the federal Constitution was adopted, all the states, with the exception of Rhode Island and Connecticut, had constitutions of their own. These two continued to act under their charters from the Crown. Upon an examination of those constitutions we find that in no state were all citizens permitted to vote. [The various electoral qualifications of male sex, age, property-holding and tax-paying prescribed in those constitutions are here stated.] * * *

As has been seen, all the citizens of the states were not invested with the right of suffrage. * * * Besides this, citizenship has not in all cases been made a condition precedent to the enjoyment of the right of suffrage. Thus, in Missouri, persons of foreign birth, who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, may under certain circumstances vote. The same provision is to be found in the constitutions of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Kansas, Minnesota, and Texas.

Certainly, if the courts can consider any question settled, this is one. For nearly ninety years the people have acted upon the idea that the Constitution, when it conferred citizenship, did not necessarily confer the right of suffrage. If uniform practice long continued can settle the construction of so important an instrument as the Constitution of the United States confessedly is, most certainly it has been done here. * * *

Judgment affirmed.

GUINN AND BEAL v. UNITED STATES.

1915. Supreme Court of the United States. 238 U. S. 347.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the court.

This case is before us on a certificate drawn by the court below as the basis of two questions which are submitted for our solution in order to enable the court correctly to decide issues in a case which it has under consideration. Those issues arose from an indictment and conviction of certain election officers of the State of Oklahoma (the plaintiffs in error) of the crime of having conspired unlawfully, wilfully and fraudulently to deprive certain negro citizens, on account of their race and color, of a right to vote at a general election held in that state in 1910, they being entitled to vote under the state law and which right was secured to them by the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The prosecution was directly concerned with Sec. 5508,[7] Rev. Stat., now Sec. 19 of the Penal Code. * * *

The questions which the court below asks are these:

"1. Was the amendment to the constitution of Oklahoma, heretofore set forth, valid?

"2. Was that amendment void insofar as it attempted to debar from the right or privilege of voting for a qualified candidate for a member of Congress in Oklahoma, unless they were able to read and write any section of the constitution of Oklahoma, negro citizens of the United States who were otherwise qualified to vote for a qualified candidate for a member of Congress in that state, but who were not, and none of whose lineal ancestors was, entitled to vote under any form of government on January 1, 1866, or at any time prior thereto, because they were then slaves?"

As these questions obviously relate to the provisions concerning suffrage in the original constitution and the amendment to those provisions which forms the basis of the controversy, we state the text of both. The original clause so far as material was this:

"The qualified electors of the state shall be male citizens of the United States, male citizens of the state, and male persons of Indian descent native of the United States, who are over the age of twenty-one years, who have resided in the state one year, in the county six months, and in the election precinct thirty days, next preceding the election at which any such elector offers to vote."

And this is the amendment:

"No person shall be registered as an elector of this state or be allowed to vote in any election herein, unless he be able to read and write any section of the constitution of the state of Oklahoma; but no person who was, on January 1, 1866, or at any time prior thereto, entitled to vote under any form of government, or who at that time resided in some foreign nation, and no lineal descendant of such person, shall be denied the right to register and vote because of his inability to so read and write sections of such constitution. Precinct election inspectors having in charge the registration of electors shall enforce the provisions of this section at the time of registration, provided registration be required. Should registration be dispensed with, the provisions of this section shall be enforced by the precinct election officer when electors apply for ballots to vote."

Considering the questions in the light of the text of the suffrage amendment it is apparent that they are twofold because of the twofold character of the provisions as to suffrage which the amendment contains. The first question is concerned with that provision of the amendment which fixes a standard by which the right to vote is given upon conditions existing on January 1, 1866, and relieves those coming within that standard from the standard based on a literacy test which is established by the other provision of the amendment. The second question asks as to the validity of the literacy test and how far, if intrinsically valid, it would continue to exist and be operative in the event the standard based upon January 1, 1866, should be held to be illegal as violative of the Fifteenth Amendment. * * * Let us consider these subjects under separate headings.

1. The operation and effect of the Fifteenth Amendment. * * *
Beyond doubt the Amendment does not take away from the state governments in a general sense the power over suffrage which has belonged to those governments from the beginning * * *.

But it is equally beyond the possibility of question that the Amendment in express terms restricts the power of the United States or the states to abridge or deny the right of a citizen of the United States to vote on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. The restriction is coincident with the power and prevents its exertion in disregard of the command of the Amendment. But while this is true, it is true also that the Amendment does not change, modify or deprive the states of their full power as to suffrage except of course as to the subject with which the Amendment deals and to the extent that obedience to its command is necessary. * * *

While in the true sense, therefore, the Amendment gives no right of suffrage, it was long ago recognized that in operation its prohibition might measurably have that effect; that is to say, that as the command of the Amendment was self-executing and reached without legislative action the conditions of discrimination against which it was aimed, the result might arise that as a consequence of the striking down of a discriminating clause a right of suffrage would be enjoyed by reason of the generic character of the provision which would remain after the discrimination was stricken out. Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S. 651; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370. A familiar illustration of this doctrine resulted from the effect of the adoption of the Amendment on state constitutions in which at the time of the adoption of the Amendment the right of suffrage was conferred on all white male citizens, since by the inherent power of the Amendment the word white disappeared and therefore all male citizens without discrimination on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude came under the generic grant of suffrage made by the state. * * *

2. The standard of January 1, 1866, fixed in the suffrage amendment and its significance.

The inquiry of course here is, Does the amendment as to the particular standard which this heading embraces involve the mere refusal to comply with the commands of the Fifteenth Amendment as previously stated? This leads us for the purpose of the analysis to recur to the text of the suffrage amendment. Its opening sentence fixes the literacy standard which is all-inclusive since it is general in its expression and contains no word of discrimination on account of race or color or any other reason. This however is immediately followed by the provisions creating the standard based upon the condition existing on January 1, 1866, and carving out those coming under that standard from the inclusion in the literacy test which would have controlled them but for the exclusion thus expressly provided for. * * * It is true it contains no express words of an exclusion from the standard which it establishes of any person on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude prohibited by the Fifteenth Amendment, but the standard itself inherently brings that result into existence since it is based purely upon a period of time before the enactment of the Fifteenth Amendment and makes that period the controlling and dominant test of the right of suffrage. In other words, we seek in vain for any ground which would sustain any other interpretation but that the provision, recurring to the conditions existing before the Fifteenth Amendment was adopted and the continuance of which the Fifteenth Amendment prohibited, proposed by in substance and effect lifting those conditions over to a period of time after the Amendment to make them the bases of the right to suffrage conferred in direct and positive disregard of the Fifteenth Amendment. And the same result, we are of opinion, is demonstrated by considering whether it is possible to discover any basis of reason for the standard thus fixed other than the purpose above stated. We say this because we are unable to discover how, unless the prohibitions of the Fifteenth Amendment were considered, the slightest reason was afforded for basing the classification upon a period of time prior to the Fifteenth Amendment. Certainly it cannot be said that there was any peculiar necromancy in the time named which engendered attributes affecting the qualification to vote which would not exist at another and different period unless the Fifteenth Amendment was in view. * * *

3. The determination of the validity of the literacy test and the possibility of its surviving the disappearance of the 1866 standard with which it is associated in the suffrage amendment.

No time need be spent on the question of the validity of the literacy test considered alone since as we have seen its establishment was but the exercise by the State of a lawful power vested in it not subject to our supervision, and indeed, its validity is admitted. Whether this test is so connected with the other one relating to the situation on January 1, 1866, that the invalidity of the latter requires the rejection of the former is really a question of state law, but in the absence of any decision on the subject by the Supreme Court of the state, we must determine it ourselves. * * * [The court inferred that these clauses were intended to be inseparable.] * * *

We answer the first question, No, and the second question, Yes.[8]

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS took no part in the consideration and decision of this case.

[8] A substantially like statute of Maryland was held invalid in Myers v. Anderson (1915) 238 U. S. 368, 59 L. ed. 1349.

An act of Congress which denies the privilege of voting in a Territory to bigamists, polygamists and men cohabiting with more than one woman is valid. Murphy v. Ramsey (1885) 114 U. S. 15, 29 L. ed. 47 though the discrimination is made not as a punishment for crime but solely as a determination of qualification for voting. A state may require citizens of the United States who move into the state to make a declaration of intention to become citizens of the state one year before they may register as voters, and thus discriminate in granting the electoral privilege between those citizens who have and those who have not made the declaration. Pope v. Williams (1904) 193 U. S. 621, 48 L. ed. 817.

The disabilities imposed upon the states and the United States by the 15th and 19th Amendments confer correlatively upon citizens of the United States immunities from the types of discrimination therein prohibited. These immunities are conferred upon none but citizens and consequently these immunities constitute a part of the concept of citizenship of the United States, notwithstanding that the privilege of voting is not an element of such citizenship. "The Fifteenth Amendment does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one. It prevents the states, or the United States, however, from giving preference, in this particular, to one citizen of the United States over another on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Before its adoption, this could be done. It was as much within the power of a state to exclude citizens of the United States from voting on account of race, etc., as it was on account of age, property, or education. Now it is not. If citizens of one race having certain qualifications are permitted by law to vote, those of another having the same qualifications must be. Previous to this Amendment, there was no constitutional guaranty against this discrimination: now there is. It follows that the Amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right which is within the protecting power of Congress. That right is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. This, under the express provisions of the second section of the Amendment, Congress may enforce by 'appropriate legislation.'" Waite, C. J., in United States v. Reese (1876) 92 U. S. 214, 217-218, 23 L. ed. 563. "In United States v. Reese et al., we hold that the Fifteenth Amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is, exemption

Section 2.—Who are National Citizens?

UNITED STATES v. WONG KIM ARK.

1898. Supreme Court of the United States. 169 U. S. 649.

This was a writ of habeas corpus, issued October 2, 1895, by the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, to the collector of customs at the port of San Francisco, in behalf of Wong Kim Ark, who alleged that he was a citizen of the United States, of more than twenty-one years of age, and was born at San Francisco in 1873 of parents of Chinese descent and subjects of the Emperor of China, but domiciled residents at San Francisco; and that, on his return to the United States on the steamship Coptic in August, 1895, from a temporary visit to China, he applied to said collector of customs for permission to land, and was by the collector refused such permission, and was restrained of his liberty by the collector, and by the general manager of the steamship company acting under his direction, in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, not by virtue of any judicial order or proceeding, but solely upon the pretence that he was not a citizen of the United States. * * *

The court ordered Wong Kim Ark to be discharged, upon the from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. From this it appears that the right of suffrage is not a necessary attribute of national citizenship; but that exemption from discrimination in the exercise of that right on account of race, etc., is. The right to vote in the states comes from the states; but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. The first has not been granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States; but the last has been." Waite, C. J., in United States v. Cruikshank (1876) 92 U. S. 542, 555-556, 23 L. ed. 588.

May a state give resident white aliens the privilege of voting and deny it to resident aliens of other races? Can not the complete definition of citizenship as a concept of constitutional law be framed by bringing together all the rights, powers, privileges, immunities, eligibilities, duties and disabilities which a person who is a citizen of the United States has under the constitution by virtue solely of his being a citizen? The various clauses of the constitution may be examined, care being exercised to distinguish those rights which are peculiar to citizens. Cases in the other sections of this chapter will assist.

Regulation of Elections. On the distribution of powers between Congress and the states to regulate elections of representatives in Congress, senators and presidential electors and the history of legislation on these matters the leading cases are: United States v. ground that he was a citizen of the United States. 71 Fed. Rep. 382. The United States appealed to this court, and the appellee was admitted to bail pending the appeal. * * *

MR. JUSTICE GRAY, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

The question presented by the record is whether a child born in the United States, of parents of Chinese descent, who at the time of his birth are subjects of the emperor of China, but have a permanent domicile and residence in the United States, and are there carrying on business, and are not employed in any diplomatic or official capacity under the emperor of China, becomes at the time of his birth a citizen of the United States, by virtue of the first clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside."

I. In construing any act of legislation, whether a statute enacted by the legislature, or a Constitution established by the people as the supreme law of the land, regard is to be had, not only to all parts of the act itself, and of any former act of the same lawmaking power, of which the act in question is an amendment, but also to the condition and to the history of the law as previously existing, and in the light of which the new act must be read and interpreted.

The Constitution of the United States, as originally adopted, uses the words "citizen of the United States" and "natural-born citizen of the United States." By the original Constitution, every representative in congress is required to have been "seven years a citizen of the United States," and every senator to have been "nine years a citizen of the United States"; and "no person except a natural-born[1] citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of president." The Fourteenth Article of Amendment, besides declaring that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside," also declares that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." And the Fifteenth Article of Amendment declares that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

[1] "Natural-born subject" in the English law is said to mean a subject who is a subject at or from birth whether by the common-law rule as to birth within British dominions or by a statute which declares a person born abroad to be a subject at or from birth. Dicey, Conflict of Laws (1896) 173, 178; 4th ed. (1927) passim, 158-173. Prior to the statute 7 Anne, c. 5, there were no natural-born subjects (with negligible exceptions) who were not native-born, hence probably the tendency to use natural-born and native-born as synonyms. After that statute there were subjects to whom the former term applied and the latter did not.

The Constitution nowhere defines the meaning of these words, either by way of inclusion or of exclusion, except in so far as this is done by the affirmative declaration that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States." In this, as in other respects, it must be interpreted in the light of the common law, the principles and history of which were familiarly known to the framers of the Constitution. Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. 162; Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 422; Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616, 624, 625; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465. The language of the Constitution, as has been well said, could not be understood without reference to the common law. 1 Kent, Comm. 336; Bradley, J., in Moore v. U. S., 91 U. S. 270, 274. * * *

II. The fundamental principle of the common law with regard to English nationality was birth within the allegiance, also called "ligealty," "obedience," "faith," or "power," of the king. The principle embraced all persons born within the king's allegiance, and subject to his protection. Such allegiance and protection were mutual,—as expressed in the maxim, "Protectio trahit subjectionem, et subjectio protectionem,"—and were not restricted to natural-born subjects and naturalized subjects, or to those who had taken an oath of allegiance; but were predicable of aliens in amity, so long as they were within the kingdom. Children, born in England, of such aliens, were therefore natural-born subjects. But the children, born within the realm, of foreign ambassadors, or the children of alien enemies, born during and within their hostile occupation of part of the king's dominions, were not natural-born subjects, because not born within the allegiance, the obedience, or the power, or, as would be said at this day, within the jurisdiction, of the king.

This fundamental principle, with these qualifications or explanations of it, was clearly, though quaintly, stated in the leading case known as Calvin's Case, or the Case of the Postnati, decided in 1608, after a hearing in the Exchequer Chamber before the Lord Chancellor and all the judges of England, and reported by Lord Coke and by Lord Ellesmere. Calvin's Case, 7 Rep., 1, 4b-6a, 18a, 18b; Ellesmere, on Postnati, 62-64; s. c. 2 How. St. Tr. 559, 607, 613-617, 639, 640, 659, 679.

The English authorities ever since are to the like effect. Co. Litt. 8a, 128b; Lord Hale, in Harg. Law Tracts, 210, and in 1 Hale, P. C. 61, 62; 1 Bl. Comm. 366, 369, 370, 374; 4 Bl. Comm. 74, 92; Lord

Kenyon, in Doe v. Jones, 4 Term R. 300, 308; Cockburn, on Nationality, 7; Dicey, Conflict of Laws, [1896] pp. 173-177, 741. * * *

It thus clearly appears that by the law of England for the last three centuries, beginning before the settlement of this country, and continuing to the present day, aliens, while residing in the dominions possessed by the crown of England, were within the allegiance, the obedience, the faith or loyalty, the protection, the power, and the jurisdiction of the English sovereign; and therefore every child born in England[2] of alien parents was a natural-born subject, unless the child of an ambassador or other diplomatic agent of a foreign state, or of an alien enemy in hostile occupation of the place where the child was born.

III. The same rule was in force in all the English colonies upon this continent down to the time of the Declaration of Independence, and in the United States afterwards, and continued to prevail under the Constitution as originally established. * * *

In Inglis v. Sailors' Snug Harbor (1830) 3 Pet. 99, * * * Mr. Justice Story [said]: "Two things usually concur to create citizenship: First, birth locally within the dominions of the sovereign; and, secondly, birth within the protection and obedience, or, in other words, within the ligeance, of the sovereign. That is, the party must be born within a place where the sovereign is at the time in full possession and exercise of his power, and the party must also at his birth derive protection from, and consequently owe obedience or allegiance to, the sovereign, as such, de facto. There are some exceptions which are founded upon peculiar reasons, and which, indeed, illustrate and confirm the general doctrine. Thus, a person who is born on the ocean is a subject of the prince to whom his parents then owe allegiance; for he is still deemed under the protection of his sovereign, and born in a place where he has dominion in common with all other sovereigns. So the children of an ambassador are held to be subjects of the prince whom he represents, although born under the actual protection and in the dominions of a foreign prince." 3 Pet. 155. "The children of enemies, born in a place within the dominions of another sovereign, then occupied by them by conquest, are still aliens." 3 Pet. 156. "Nothing is better settled at the common law than the doctrine that the children, even of aliens, born in a country, while the parents are resident there under the protection of the government, and owing a temporary allegiance thereto, are subjects by birth." 3 Pet. 164. * * *

[2] "The doctrine as originally formulated was probably limited to the kingdom, or the realm: but even as early as the statute of Edward III, it took the more expanded form 'birth within the ligeance,' and it was on this basis that it was expounded in Calvin's Case (1608) 7 Co. Rep. 1a. From this it should follow that it is now correct to say that 'birth within the dominions' makes a person a British subject by the common law." Piggott, Nationality (1906) 205.

IV. It was contended by one of the learned counsel for the United States that the rule of the Roman law, by which the citizenship of the child followed that of the parent, was the true rule of international law as now recognized in most civilized countries, and had superseded the rule of the common law, depending on birth within the realm, originally founded on feudal considerations.

But at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States in 1789, and long before, it would seem to have been the rule in Europe generally, as it certainly was in France, that, as said by Pothier, "citizens, true and native-born citizens, are those who are born within the extent of the dominion of France," and "mere birth within the realm gives the rights of a native-born citizen, independently of the origin of the father or mother, and of their domicile"; and children born in a foreign country, of a French father who had not established his domicile there, nor given up the intention of returning, were also deemed Frenchmen, as Laurent says, by "a favor, a sort of fiction," and Calvo, "by a sort of fiction of exterritoriality, considered as born in France, and therefore invested with French nationality." * * * The Code Napoléon of 1807 changed the law of France, and adopted, instead of the rule of country of birth, jus soli, the rule of descent or blood, jus sanguinis, as the leading principle. * * *

The later modifications of the rule in Europe rest upon the Constitutions, laws, or ordinances of the various countries, and have no important bearing upon the interpretation and effect of the Constitution of the United States. The English naturalization act of 33 Vict. (1870) c. 14, and the commissioners' report of 1869, out of which it grew, both bear date since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution; and, as observed by Mr. Dicey, that act has not affected the principle by which any person who, whatever the nationality of his parents, is born within the British dominions, acquires British nationality at birth, and is a natural-born British subject. Dicey, Conflict of Laws, 741. At the time of the passage of that act, although the tendency on the continent of Europe was to make parentage, rather than birthplace, the criterion of nationality, and citizenship was denied to the native-born children of foreign parents in Germany, Switzerland, Sweden, and Norway, yet it appears still to have been conferred upon such children in Holland, Denmark, and Portugal, and, when claimed under certain specified conditions, in France, Belgium, Spain, Italy, Greece, and Russia. Cockburn on Nationality, 14-21.

There is, therefore, little ground for the theory that at the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States there was any settled and definite rule of international law generally recognized by civilized nations, inconsistent with the ancient rule of citizenship by birth within the dominion.

Nor can it be doubted that it is the inherent right of every independent nation to determine for itself, and according to its own Constitution and laws, what classes of persons shall be entitled to its citizenship.

Both in England and in the United States, indeed, statutes have been passed at various times enacting that certain issue born abroad of English subjects, or of American citizens, respectively, should inherit, to some extent at least, the rights of their parents. But those statutes applied only to cases coming within their purport, and they have never been considered, in either country, as affecting the citizenship of persons born within its dominion. * * *

By the statute of 7 Anne, (1708) c. 5, Sec. 3, "the children of all natural-born subjects, born out of the ligeance of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors"—explained by the statute of 4 Geo. II, (1731) c. 21, to mean all children born out of the ligeance of the Crown of England, "whose fathers were or shall be natural-born subjects of the Crown of England, or of Great Britain, at the time of the birth of such children respectively"—"shall be deemed, adjudged and taken to be natural-born subjects of this kingdom, to all intents, constructions and purposes whatsoever." That statute was limited to foreign-born children of natural-born subjects; and was extended by the statute of 13 Geo. III, (1773) c. 21, to foreign-born grandchildren of natural-born subjects, but not to the issue of such grandchildren; or, as put by Mr. Dicey, "British nationality does not pass by descent or inheritance beyond the second generation." See De Geer v. Stone, 22 Ch. D. 243. Dicey, Conflict of Laws, (1896) 742. * * *

It was enacted by the statute of February 10, 1855, c. 71, that "persons heretofore born, or hereafter to be born, out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, whose fathers were or shall be at the time of their birth citizens of the United States, shall be deemed and considered and are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States: provided, however, that the rights of citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers never resided in the United States."[4] 10 Stat. 604; Rev. St. § 1993 [U. S. C. Title 8, § 6].

[4] In Weedin v. Chin Bow (1927) 274 U. S. 657, 71 L. ed. 1284, it is held that in order that a father may transmit American citizenship to his child under this statute the father must have resided in the United States at some time prior to the birth of the child.

The race of the father is immaterial to the application of this statute. Quan Hing Sun v. White (1918) 254 Fed. 402. So also it seems that the race and alienage of the mother are immaterial, the father's citizenship and his having resided in the United States are the only necessary facts. It seems that the child may remain abroad all his life without thereby losing citizenship thus acquired. It is held that to retain his citizenship he need not come during his minority to reside in the United States. Ex parte Ng Doo Wong (1915) 230 Fed. 751. See (1916) 30 Op. Atty. Gen. 529, 532-537, to the effect that this

It thus clearly appears that, during the half century intervening between 1802 and 1855, there was no legislation whatever for the citizenship of children born abroad, during that period, of American parents who had not become citizens of the United States before the act of 1802; and that the act of 1855, like every other act of congress upon the subject, has, by express proviso, restricted the right of citizenship, thereby conferred upon foreign-born children of American citizens, to those children themselves, unless they became residents of the United States Here is nothing to countenance the theory that a general rule of citizenship by blood or descent has displaced in this country the fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within its sovereignty. * * *

The first section of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution begins with the words, "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside." As appears upon the face of the Amendment, as well as from the history of the times, this was not intended to impose any new restrictions upon citizenship, or to prevent any persons from becoming citizens by the fact of birth within the United States, who would thereby have become citizens according to the law existing before its adoption. It is declaratory in form, and enabling and extending in effect. Its main purpose doubtless was, as has been often recognized by this court, to establish the citizenship of free negroes, which had been denied in the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Taney in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857) 19 How. 393; and to put it beyond doubt that all blacks, as well as whites, born or naturalized within the jurisdiction of the United States, are citizens of the United States. Slaughter House Cases (1873) 16 Wall. 36, 73; Strauder v. West Virginia (1879) 100 U. S. 303, 306; Ex parte Virginia (1879) 100 U. S. 339, 345; Neal v. Delaware (1880) 103 U. S. 370, 386; Elk v. Wilkins (1884) 112 U. S. 94, 101. But the opening words, "All persons born," are general, not to say universal, restricted only by place and jurisdiction, and not by color or race, as was clearly recognized in all the opinions delivered in the Slaughter House Cases, above cited. * * *

retention of American citizenship is not dependent upon any declaration of intention, election at majority or oath of allegiance, construing the requirements of such acts made in the last two sentences of U. S. C. Title 8, § 6 to relate merely to protection, that is, American diplomatic officials may refuse protection to a foreign-born and foreign-residing citizen who neglects to comply with them. See also Weedin v. Chin Bow (1927) 274 U. S. 657, 668-669, 71 L. ed. 1284.

It seems that the statute by use of the word "father" does not permit citizenship to descend or be derived from a mother. It seems that it is sufficient that the father is a citizen by naturalization, the statute not being limited to fathers who are natural-born citizens; the similar British legislation prior to 1914 was so limited. Rex v. Albany Street Police Station Supt. (1915) 3 K. B. 716. The present British legislation is the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Acts of 1914 and 1922, printed and expounded in Dicey, Conflict of Laws (1927) 158-205.

Mr. Justice Miller, indeed, while discussing the causes which led to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, made this remark: "The phrase 'subject to its jurisdiction' was intended to exclude from its operation children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign states, born within the United States." 16 Wall. 73. This was wholly aside from the question in judgment, and from the course of reasoning bearing upon that question. It was unsupported by any argument, or by any reference to authorities; and that it was not formulated with the same care and exactness as if the case before the court had called for an exact definition of the phrase is apparent from its classing foreign ministers and consuls together—whereas it was then well settled law, as has since been recognized in a judgment of this court in which Mr. Justice Miller concurred, that consuls, as such, and unless expressly invested with a diplomatic character in addition to their ordinary powers, are not considered as intrusted with authority to represent their sovereign in his intercourse with foreign states, or to vindicate his prerogatives, or entitled by the law of nations to the privileges and immunities of ambassadors or public ministers, but are subject to the jurisdiction, civil and criminal, of the courts of the country in which they reside. 1 Kent, Comm. 44; Story, Confl. Laws, § 48; Wheat. Int. Law (8th Ed.) § 249; The Anne (1818) 3 Wheat. 435, 445, 446; Gittings v. Crawford (1838) Taney, 1, 10, Fed. Cas. No. 5,465; In re Baiz (1890) 135 U. S. 403, 424.

The only adjudication that has been made by this court upon the meaning of the clause, "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," in the leading provision of the Fourteenth Amendment, is Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S. 94, in which it was decided that an Indian born a member of one of the Indian tribes within the United States, which still existed and was recognized as an Indian tribe by the United States, who had voluntarily separated himself from his tribe, and taken up his residence among the white citizens of a state, but who did not appear to have been naturalized or taxed or in any way recognized or treated as a citizen, either by the United States or by the state, was not a citizen of the United States, as a person born in the United States, "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," within the meaning of the clause in question.

That decision was placed upon the grounds that the meaning of those words was, "not merely subject in some respect or degree to the jurisdiction of the United States, but completely subject to their political jurisdiction, and owing them direct and immediate allegiance"; that by the Constitution, as originally established, "Indians not taxed" were excluded from the persons according to whose numbers representatives in congress and direct taxes were apportioned among the several states, and Congress was empowered to regulate commerce, not only "with foreign nations," and among the several states, but "with the Indian tribes"; that the Indian tribes, being within the territorial limits of the United States, were not, strictly speaking, foreign states, but were alien nations, distinct political communities, the members of which owed immediate allegiance to their several tribes, and were not part of the people of the United States; that the alien and dependent condition of the members of one of those tribes could not be put off at their own will, without the action or assent of the United States; and that they were never deemed citizens, except when naturalized, collectively or individually, under explicit provisions of a treaty, or of an act of congress; and, therefore, that "Indians born within the territorial limits of the United States, members of, and owing immediate allegiance to, one of the Indian tribes (an alien, though dependent, power), although in a geographical sense born in the United States, are no more 'born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof,' within the meaning of the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment, than the children of subjects of any foreign government born within the domain of that government, or the children born within the United States of ambassadors or other public ministers of foreign nations." And it was observed that the language used, in defining citizenship, in the first section of the Civil Rights Act of 1866, by the very Congress which framed the Fourteenth Amendment, was "all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed." 112 U. S. 99-103. * * *

The decision in Elk v. Wilkins concerned only members of the Indian tribes within the United States, and had no tendency to deny citizenship to children born in the United States of foreign parents of Caucasian, African, or Mongolian descent, not in the diplomatic service of a foreign country.

The real object of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, in qualifying the words "all persons born in the United States" by the addition "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," would appear to have been to exclude, by the fewest and fittest words (besides children of members of the Indian tribes, standing in a peculiar relation to the national government, unknown to the common law), the two classes of cases,—children born of alien enemies in hostile occupation, and children of diplomatic representatives of a foreign state,—both of which, as has already been shown, by the law of England and by our own law, from the time of the first settlement of the English colonies in America, had been recognized exceptions to the fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within the country. Calvin's Case, 7 Rep., 1, 18b; Cockburn on Nationality, 7; Dicey, Conflict of Laws, 177; Inglis v. Sailors' Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. 99; 2 Kent. Comm. 39, 42. * * *

In the great case of The Exchange (1812) 7 Cranch, 116; the grounds upon which foreign ministers are, and other aliens are not, exempt from the jurisdiction of this country, were set forth by Chief Justice Marshall in a clear and powerful train of reasoning, of which it will be sufficient, for our present purpose, to give little more than the outlines. The opinion did not touch upon the anomalous case of the Indian tribes, the true relation of which to the United States was not directly brought before this court until some years afterwards, in Cherokee Nation v. Georgia (1831) 5 Pet. 1, 8 L. Ed. 25; nor upon the case of a suspension of the sovereignty of the United States over part of their territory by reason of a hostile occupation, such as was also afterwards presented in U. S. v. Rice, [4 Wheat. 246] above cited. But in all other respects it covered the whole question of what persons within the territory of the United States are subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

The Chief Justice first laid down the general principle: "The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of the restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in that power which could impose such restriction. All exceptions, therefore, to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories, must be traced up to the consent of the nation itself. They can flow from no other legitimate source. This consent may be either express or implied. In the latter case, it is less determinate, exposed more to the uncertainties of construction; but, if understood, not less obligatory." 7 Cranch, 136.

He then stated, and supported by argument and illustration, the propositions that "this full and absolute territorial jurisdiction, being alike the attribute of every sovereign, and being incapable of conferring extraterritorial power," has "given rise to a class of cases in which every sovereign is understood to waive the exercise of a part of that complete exclusive territorial jurisdiction which has been stated to be the attribute of every nation,"—the first of which is the exemption from arrest or detention of the person of a foreign sovereign entering its territory with its license, because "a foreign sovereign is not understood as intending to subject himself to a jurisdiction incompatible with his dignity and the dignity of his nation"; "a second case, standing on the same principles with the first, is the immunity which all civilized nations allow to foreign ministers"; "a third case, in which a sovereign is understood to cede a portion of his territorial jurisdiction, is where he allows the troops of a foreign prince to pass through his dominions"; and, in conclusion, that "a public armed ship, in the service of a foreign sovereign, with whom the government of the United States is at peace, and having entered an American port open for her reception, on the terms on which ships of war are generally permitted to enter the ports of a friendly power, must be considered as having come into the American territory, under an implied promise that while necessarily within it, and demeaning herself in a friendly manner, she should be exempt from the jurisdiction of the country." 7 Cranch, 137-139, 147. * * *

The reasons for not allowing to other aliens exemption "from the jurisdiction of the country in which they are found" were stated as follows: "When private individuals of one nation spread themselves through another as business or caprice may direct, mingling indiscriminately with the inhabitants of that other, or when merchant vessels enter for the purposes of trade, it would be obviously inconvenient and dangerous to society, and would subject the laws to continual infraction, and the government to degradation, if such individuals or merchants did not owe temporary and local allegiance, and were not amenable to the jurisdiction of the country. Nor can the foreign sovereign have any motive for wishing such exemption. His subjects thus passing into foreign countries are not employed by him, nor are they engaged in national pursuits. Consequently, there are powerful motives for not exempting persons of this description from the jurisdiction of the country in which they are found, and no one motive for requiring it. The implied license, therefore, under which they enter, can never be construed to grant such exemption." 7 Cranch, 144. * * *

These considerations confirm the view, already expressed in this opinion, that the opening sentence of the Fourteenth Amendment is throughout affirmative and declaratory, intended to allay doubts and to settle controversies which had arisen, and not to impose any new restrictions upon citizenship. * * *

This sentence of the Fourteenth Amendment is declaratory of existing rights, and affirmative of existing law, as to each of the qualifications therein expressed,—"born in the United States," "naturalized in the United States," and "subject to the jurisdiction thereof"—in short, as to everything relating to the acquisition of citizenship by facts occurring within the limits of the United States. But it has not touched the acquisition of citizenship by being born abroad of American parents; and has left that subject to be regulated, as it had always been, by Congress, in the exercise of the power conferred by the Constitution to establish an uniform rule of naturalization.[5]

[5] Query, since naturalization as a mode of acquiring citizenship or nationality is ordinarily contrasted with acquisition at birth (though naturalization may be without the consent of the person who is made citizen or national, as is common in "collective naturalization"), so Rev. St. § 1994 (now repealed) which declared an alien woman to be a citizen upon her marriage to a citizen regardless of her desire was a naturalization statute in this sense. Would not the provision of the

The effect of the enactments conferring citizenship on foreign-born children of American parents has been defined, and the fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within the dominion of the United States, notwithstanding alienage of parents, has been affirmed, in well-considered opinions of the executive departments of the government, since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution. * * * [Here follow quotations from these opinions, to the effect] that such statutes cannot, consistently with our own established rule of citizenship by birth in this country, operate extraterritorially so far as to relieve any person born and residing in a foreign country, and subject to its government, from his allegiance to that country. * * *

The foregoing considerations and authorities irresistibly lead us to these conclusions: The Fourteenth Amendment affirms the ancient and fundamental rule of citizenship by birth within the territory, in the allegiance and under the protection of the country, including all children here born of resident aliens, with the exceptions or qualifications (as old as the rule itself) of children of foreign sovereigns or their ministers, or born on foreign public ships, or of enemies within and during a hostile occupation of part of our territory, and with the single additional exception of children of members of the Indian tribes owing direct allegiance to their several tribes. The amendment, in clear words and in manifest intent, includes the children born within the territory of the United States[6] of all other persons, of whatever race or color, domiciled[7] within the United States. Every citizen, or subject of another country, while domiciled here, is within the allegiance and the protection, and consequently subject to the jurisdiction, of the United States. His allegiance to the United States is direct and immediate, and, although but local and temporary, continuing only so long as he remain within our territory, is yet, in the words of Lord Coke in Calvin's Case, 7 Rep. 6a, "strong enough to make a natural subject, for, if he hath issue here, that issue is a natural-born subject"; and his child, as said by Mr. Binney in his essay before quoted, "if born in the country, is as much a citizen as the natural-born child of a citizen, and by operation of the same principle." It can hardly be denied that an alien is completely subject to the political jurisdiction of the country in which he resides, seeing that, as said by Mr. Webster, when secretary of state, in his report to the president on Thrasher's Case in 1851, and since repeated by this court: "Independently of a residence with intention to continue such residence; independently of any domiciliation; independently of the taking of any oath of allegiance, or of renouncing any former allegiance,—it is well known that by the public law an alien, or a stranger born, for so long a time as he continues within the dominions of a foreign government, owes obedience to the laws of that government, and may be punished for treason or other crimes as a native-born subject might be, unless his case is varied by some treaty stipulations." It is true that Chinese persons born in China cannot be naturalized, like other aliens, by proceedings under the naturalization laws. But this is for want of any statute or treaty authorizing or permitting such naturalization, as will appear by tracing the history of the statutes, treaties, and decisions upon that subject, always bearing in mind that statutes enacted by Congress, as well as treaties made by the president and senate, must yield to the paramount and supreme law of the Constitution.

Act of 1855 above referred to, if not a naturalization statute, nevertheless be valid as an exercise of the power "resulting" to Congress from the grant to the central government of control of foreign relations, on the reasoning of United States v. Arjona, ante, p. 304, Nishimura Ekiu v. United States (1892) 142 U. S. 651, 35 L. ed. 1146? And see the reasoning in Mackenzie v. Hare, infra, p. 418.

The power, granted to Congress by the Constitution, "to establish an uniform rule of naturalization," was long ago adjudged by this court to be vested exclusively in Congress. Chirac v. Chirac (1817) 2 Wheat. 259. For many years after the establishment of the original Constitution, and until two years after the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress never authorized the naturalization of any one but "free white persons." * * * By the act of July 14, 1870, c. 254, § 7, for the first time, the naturalization laws were "extended to aliens of African nativity and to persons of African descent." 16 Stat. 256. This extension, as embodied in the Revised Statutes, took the form of providing that those laws should "apply to aliens [being free white persons, and to aliens] of African nativity and to persons of African descent"; and it was amended by the act of Feb. 18, 1875, c. 80, by inserting the words above printed in brackets. Rev. St. (2d Ed.) § 2169, 18 Stat. 318 [U. S. C. Title 8, § 359].[8] Those statutes were held, by the Circuit Court of the United States in California, not to embrace Chinese aliens. In re Ah Yup (1878) 5 Sawy. 155, Fed. Cas. No. 104. And by the act of May 6, 1882, c. 126, § 14, it was expressly enacted that, "hereafter no state court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship." 22 Stat. 61. * * *

S. 178, 67 L. ed. 199 (Japanese ineligible under any of our naturalization statutes); United States v.

The power of naturalization, vested in Congress by the Constitution, is a power to confer citizenship, not a power to take it away. * * * Congress having no power to abridge the rights conferred by the Constitution upon those who have become naturalized citizens by virtue of acts of Congress, a fortiori no act or omission of Congress, as to providing for the naturalization of parents or children of a particular race, can affect citizenship acquired as a birthright, by virtue of the Constitution itself, without any aid of legislation. The Fourteenth Amendment, while it leaves the power, where it was before, in Congress, to regulate naturalization, has conferred no authority upon Congress to restrict the effect of birth, declared by the Constitution to constitute a sufficient and complete right to citizenship. * * *

VII. Upon the facts agreed in this case, the American citizenship which Wong Kim Ark acquired by birth within the United States has not been lost or taken away by anything happening since his birth. No doubt he might himself, after coming of age, renounce this citizenship, and become a citizen of the country of his parents, or of any other country; for by our law, as solemnly declared by congress, "the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people," and "any declaration, instruction, opinion, order or direction of any officer of the United States, which denies, restricts, impairs or questions the right of expatriation, is declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the republic." DRED SCOTT v. SANDFORD.

1857. Supreme Court of the United States. 19 How. 393.

[Scott, held in Missouri as a slave by the defendant, brought suit in the circuit court of the United States to establish his freedom. He alleged that he was a citizen of Missouri and the defendant a citizen of New York. Defendant pleaded lack of jurisdiction alleging that plaintiff was a negro born of slave ancestry, asserting in effect that no such negro could be a citizen of a state within the diversity of citizenship clause, though born in the United States and free at time of suit. After judgment for plaintiff on this plea, defendant had judgment below on the merits, namely, that Scott was a slave, and the latter appealed. On the question of citizenship raised by the plea to the jurisdiction:]

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE TANEY. * * * In discussing this question, we must not confound the rights of citizenship which a state may confer within its own limits, and the rights of citizenship as a member of the Union. It does not by any means follow, because he has all the rights and privileges of a citizen of a state, that he must be a citizen of the United States. He may have all of the rights and privileges of the citizen of a state, and yet not be entitled to the rights and privileges of a citizen in any other state. For, previous to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, every state had the undoubted right to confer on whomsoever it pleased the character of citizen, and to endow him with all its rights. But this character of course was confined to the boundaries of the state, and gave him no rights or privileges in other states beyond those secured to him by the laws of nations and the comity of states. Nor have the several states surrendered the power of conferring these rights and privileges by adopting the Constitution of the United States. Each state may still confer them upon an alien, or any one it thinks proper, or upon any class or description of persons; yet he would not be a citizen in the sense in which that word is used in the Constitution of the United States, nor entitled to sue as such in one of its courts, nor to the privileges and immunities of a citizen in the other states. The rights which he would acquire would be restricted to the state which gave them. The Constitution has conferred on Congress the right to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and this right is evidently exclusive, and has always been held by this court to be so. Consequently, no state, since the adoption of the Constitution, can by naturalizing an alien invest him with the rights and privileges secured to a citizen of a state under the federal government, although, so far as the state alone was concerned, he would undoubtedly be entitled to the rights of a citizen, and clothed with all the rights and immunities which the Constitution and laws of the state attached to that character.

It is very clear, therefore, that no state can, by any act or law of its own, passed since the adoption of the Constitution, introduce a new member into the political community created by the Constitution of the United States. It cannot make him a member of this community by making him a member of its own. And for the same reason it cannot introduce any person, or description of persons, who were not intended to be embraced in this new political family, which the Constitution brought into existence, but were intended to be excluded from it.

The question then arises, whether the provisions of the Constitution, in relation to the personal rights and privileges to which the citizen of a state should be entitled, embraced the negro African race, at that time in this country, or who might afterwards be imported, who had then or should afterwards be made free in any state; and to put it in the power of a single state to make him a citizen of the United States, and endue him with the full rights of citizenship in every other state without their consent? Does the Constitution of the United States act upon him whenever he shall be made free under the laws of a state, and raised there to the rank of a citizen, and immediately clothe him with all the privileges of a citizen in every other state, and in its own courts?

The court think the affirmative of these propositions cannot be maintained. And if it cannot, the plaintiff in error could not be a citizen of the State of Missouri, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and, consequently, was not entitled to sue in its courts.

It is true, every person, and every class and description of persons, who were at the time of the adoption of the Constitution recognized as citizens in the several states, became also citizens of this new political body; but none other; it was formed by them, and for them and their posterity, but for no one else. And the personal rights and privileges guaranteed to citizens of this new sovereignty were intended to embrace those only who were then members of the several state communities, or who should afterwards by birthright or otherwise become members, according to the provisions of the Constitution and the principles on which it was founded. It was the union of those who were at that time members of distinct and separate political communities into one political family, whose power, for certain specified purposes, was to extend over the whole territory of the United States. And it gave to each citizen rights and privileges outside of his state which he did not before possess, and placed him in every other state upon a perfect equality with its own citizens as to rights of person and rights of property; it made him a citizen of the United States.

It becomes necessary, therefore, to determine who were citizens of the several states when the Constitution was adopted. And in order to do this, we must recur to the Governments and institutions of the thirteen colonies, when they separated from Great Britain and formed new sovereignties, and took their places in the family of independent nations. We must inquire who, at that time, were recognized as the people or citizens of a state, whose rights and liberties had been outraged by the English government; and who declared their independence and assumed the powers of government to defend their rights by force of arms.

In the opinion of the court, the legislation and histories of the times, and the language used in the Declaration of Independence, show, that neither the class of persons who had been imported as slaves, nor their descendants, whether they had become free or not, were then acknowledged as a part of the people, nor intended to be included in the general words used in that memorable instrument. * * *

The legislation of the States therefore shows, in a manner not to be mistaken, the inferior and subject condition of that race at the time the Constitution was adopted, and long afterwards, throughout the thirteen states by which that instrument was framed; and it is hardly consistent with the respect due to these states, to suppose that they regarded at that time, as fellow-citizens and members of the sovereignty, a class of beings whom they had thus stigmatized; whom, as we are bound, out of respect to the state sovereignties, to assume they had deemed it just and necessary thus to stigmatize, and upon whom they had impressed such deep and enduring marks of inferiority and degradation; or, that when they met in convention to form the Constitution, they looked upon them as a portion of their constituents, or designed to include them in the provisions so carefully inserted for the security and protection of the liberties and rights of their citizens. It cannot be supposed that they intended to secure to them rights, and privileges, and rank, in the new political body throughout the Union, which every one of them denied within the limits of its own dominion. More especially, it cannot be believed that the large slaveholding states regarded them as included in the word citizens, or would have consented to a Constitution which might compel them to receive them in that character from another state. For if they were so received, and entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens, it would exempt them from the operation of the special laws and from the police regulations which they considered to be necessary for their own safety. It would give to persons of the negro race, who were recognized as citizens in any one state of the Union, the right to enter every other state whenever they pleased, singly or in companies, without pass or passport, and without obstruction, to sojourn there as long as they pleased, to go where they pleased at every hour of the day or night without molestation, unless they committed some violation of law for which a white man would be punished; and it would give them the full liberty of speech in public and in private upon all subjects upon which its own citizens might speak, to hold public meetings upon political affairs, and to keep and carry arms wherever they went. And all of this would be done in the face of the subject race of the same color, both free and slaves, and inevitably producing discontent and insubordination among them, and endangering the peace and safety of the state.

It is impossible, it would seem, to believe that the great men of the slaveholding states, who took so large a share in framing the Constitution of the United States, and exercised so much influence in procuring its adoption, could have been so forgetful or regardless of their own safety and the safety of those who trusted and confided in them.

Besides, this want of foresight and care would have been utterly inconsistent with the caution displayed in providing for the admission of new members into this political family. For, when they gave to the citizens of each state the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, [Art. IV, Sec. 2] they at the same time took from the several states the power of naturalization, and confined that power exclusively to the federal government. No state was willing to permit another state to determine who should or should not be admitted as one its citizens, and entitled to demand equal rights and privileges with their own people, within their own territories. The right of naturalization was therefore, with one accord, surrendered by the states, and confided to the federal government. And this power granted to Congress to establish an uniform rule of naturalization is, by the well-understood meaning of the word, confined to persons born in a foreign country, under a foreign government. It is not a power to raise to the rank of a citizen any one born in the United States, who, from birth or parentage, by the laws of the country, belongs to an inferior and subordinate class. And when we find the states guarding themselves from the indiscreet or improper admission by other states of emigrants from other countries, by giving the power exclusively to Congress, we cannot fail to see that they could never have left with the states a much more important power—that is, the power of transforming into citizens a numerous class of persons, who in that character would be much more dangerous to the peace and safety of a large portion of the Union, than the few foreigners one of the states might improperly naturalize. The Constitution upon its adoption obviously took from the states all power by any subsequent legislation to introduce as a citizen into the political family of the United States any one, no matter where he was born, or what might be his character or condition; and it gave to Congress the power to confer this character upon those only who were born outside of the dominions of the United States. And no law of a state, therefore, passed since the Constitution was adopted, can give any right of citizenship outside of its own territory. * * *

But it is said that a person may be a citizen, and entitled to that character, although he does not possess all the rights which may belong to other citizens; as, for example, the right to vote, or to hold particular offices; and that yet, when he goes into another state, he is entitled to be recognized there as a citizen, although the state may measure his rights by the rights which it allows to persons of a like character or class resident in the state, and refuse to him the full rights of citizenship.

This argument overlooks the language of the provision in the Constitution of which we are speaking.

Undoubtedly, a person may be a citizen, that is, a member of the community who form the sovereignty, although he exercises no share of the political power, and is incapacitated from holding particular offices. Women and minors, who form a part of the political family, cannot vote; and when a property qualification is required to vote or hold a particular office, those who have not the necessary qualification cannot vote or hold the office, yet they are citizens.

So, too, a person may be entitled to vote by the law of the state, who is not a citizen even of the state itself. And in some of the states of the Union foreigners not naturalized are allowed to vote. And the state may give the right to free negroes and mulattoes, but that does not make them citizens of the state, and still less of the United States. And the provision in the Constitution [Art. IV, Sec. 2, Cl. 1] giving privileges and immunities in other states, does not apply to them.

Neither does it apply to a person who, being the citizen of a state, migrates to another state. For then he becomes subject to the laws of the state in which he lives, and he is no longer a citizen of the state from which he removed. And the state in which he resides may then, unquestionably, determine his status or condition and place him among the class of persons who are not recognized as citizens, but belong to an inferior and subject race; and may deny him the privileges and immunities enjoyed by its citizens.

But so far as mere rights of person are concerned, the provision in question is confined to citizens of a state who are temporarily in another state without taking up their residence there. It gives them no political rights in the state, as to voting or holding office, or in any other respect. For a citizen of one state has no right to participate in the government of another. But if he ranks as a citizen in the state to which he belongs, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, then, whenever he goes into another state, the Constitution clothes him, as to the rights of person, with all the privileges and immunities which belong to citizens of the state. And if persons of the African race are citizens of the state, and of the United States, they would be entitled to all of these privileges and immunities in every state, and the state could not restrict them; for they would hold these privileges and immunities under the paramount authority of the federal government, and its courts would be bound to maintain and enforce them, the Constitution and laws of the state to the contrary notwithstanding. And if the states could limit or restrict them, or place the party in an inferior grade, this clause of the Constitution would be unmeaning, and could have no operation; and would give no rights to the citizen when in another state. He would have none but what the state itself chose to allow him. This is evidently not the construction or meaning of the clause in question. It guaranties rights to the citizens, and the state cannot withhold them. And these rights are of a character and would lead to consequences which make it absolutely certain that the African race were not included under the name of citizens of a state, and were not in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution when these privileges and immunities were provided for the protection of the citizen in other states. * * *

Mr. Justice Curtis dissenting.

I dissent from the opinion pronounced by the Chief Justice. * * *

The answer is obvious. The Constitution has left to the states the determination what persons, born within their respective limits, shall acquire by birth citizenship of the United States; it has not left to them any power to prescribe any rule for the removal of the disabilities of alienage. This power is exclusively in Congress. * * *

Under the Constitution of the United States, each state has retained this power of determining the political status of its native-born inhabitants, and no exception thereto can be found in the Constitution. * * * But it does not allow to the states the power to make aliens citizens, or permit one state to take persons born on the soil of another state, and, contrary to the laws and policy of the state where they were born, make them its citizens, and so citizens of the United States. * * * The conclusions at which I have arrived on this part of the case are:

First. That the free native-born citizens of each state are citizens of the United States.

Second. That as free colored persons born within some of the states are citizens of those states, such persons are also citizens of the United States.

Third. That every such citizen, residing in any state, has the right to sue and is liable to be sued in the federal courts as a citizen of that state in which he resides. * * *

I dissent, therefore, from that part of the opinion of the majority of the court, in which it is held that a person of African descent cannot be a citizen of the United States. * * *[10]

[10] Extracts on the citizenship question only are given above. A majority refrained from expressing opinions on this subject. Wayne and Daniel, JJ., concurred in the above remarks of Taney, C. J., and Curtis, J., alone expressed views contrary to them. Notwithstanding that both Taney and Curtis referred to Taney's opinion as that of the court or of the majority it seems that on the citizenship question it must be regarded as the opinion of three judges. Only the concluding summary of Curtis' discussion is printed above.

Chief Justice Taney did not say that he regarded free negroes born in the United States as aliens, although he so regarded American born tribal Indians (see his opinion in the above case, 19 How. (U. S.) 404, 420). He did say, "The African race, however, born in the country, did owe allegiance to the government, whether they were slave or free." Ib. p. 420.

The storm of abuse directed at the Supreme Court (see Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History, ch. 26) was a protest against its holding in this decision that the Missouri Compromise Act of 1820 was unconstitutional, that is, the Act of Congress which forbade slavery in that part of the Louisiana purchase which lay north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude not including Missouri. The opinion that free negroes were not citizens did not excite much comment. In fact several northern states in the decade 1850-1860 prohibited migration of free negroes into their territory, assuming that they were not citizens within Art. IV, § 2, Cl. 1 of the Constitution.

If Justice Curtis was right in his view that (prior to Amendment XIV) state law determined acquisition of citizenship by birth, as distinguished from naturalization of alien born persons, and that persons became by birth in the United States citizens of the United States only if born in states that recognized them as acquiring state citizenship by such birth, then nearly all free negroes were not citizens as had been held in Amy v. Smith (Ky. 1822) 1 Litt. 326; State v. Claiborne (Tenn. 1838) Meigs 331; Pendleton v. State (1844) 6 Ark. 509; Cooper et al. v. Mayor (1848) 4 Ga. 68; Bryan v. Walton (1853) 14 Ga. 185; and see Crandall v. State (1834) 10 Conn. 339; Donovan v. Pitcher (1875) 53 Ala. 411, 25 Am. Rep. 634; Mitchell v. Nancy Wells (1859) 37 Miss. 235. Contra: State v. Manuel (1838) 4 Dev. & B. 26, 20 N. C. 144. In State v. Claiborne, supra, the court said:

"By whatever appellation we may designate free negroes, whether as perpetual inhabitants, or citizens of an inferior grade, we feel satisfied, that they are not citizens in the sense of the Constitution," i. e. in the sense of Art. IV, § 2, Cl. 1.

"At the close of the Civil war, when the problem of the emancipated slaves was before the nation, it might have left them in a condition of alienage, or established them as wards of the government like the Indian tribes, and thus retained for the nation jurisdiction over them, or it might, as it did, give them citizenship." Brewer, J., in Hodges v. United States (1906) 203 U. S. 1, 19, 51 L. ed. 65.

GONZALES v. WILLIAMS.

1904. Supreme Court of the United States. 192 U. S. 1.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal by Isabella Gonzales from an order of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, dismissing a writ of habeas corpus issued on her behalf, and remanding her to the custody of the United States Commissioner of Immigration at the Port of New York. 118 Fed. Rep. 941.

Isabella Gonzales, an unmarried woman, was born and resided in Porto Rico, and was an inhabitant thereof on April 11, 1899, the date of the proclamation of the Treaty of Paris; she arrived at the Port of New York from Porto Rico, August 24, 1902, when she was prevented from landing and detained by the Immigration Commissioner at that port as an "alien immigrant," in order that she might be returned to Porto Rico if it appeared that she was likely to become a public charge.

If she was not an alien immigrant within the intent and meaning of the act of Congress * * * approved March 3, 1891, 26 Stat. 1084, c. 551, the commissioner had no power to detain or deport her, and the final order of the Circuit Court must be reversed.

The act referred to contains these provisions:

"That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States, in accordance with the existing acts regulating immigration, other than those concerning Chinese laborers: All idiots, insane persons, paupers or persons likely to become a public charge * * * ."

* * * The treaty ceding Porto Rico to the United States was ratified by the Senate, February 6, 1899; Congress passed an act to carry out its obligations, March 2, 1899; and the ratifications were exchanged and the treaty proclaimed, April 11, 1899, 30 Stat. 1754. Then followed the act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved April 12, 1900. 31 Stat. 77, c. 191. The treaty provided:

"Article II.

"Spain cedes to the United States the island of Porto Rico and other islands now under Spanish sovereignty in the West Indies, and the island of Guam in the Marianas or Ladrones.

"Article III.

"Spain cedes to the United States the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands, and comprehending the islands lying within the following line. * * *"

"Article IX.

"Spanish subjects, natives of the Peninsula, residing in the territory over which Spain by the present treaty relinquishes or cedes her sovereignty, may remain in such territory or may remove therefrom, retaining in either event all their rights of property, including the right to sell or dispose of such property or of its proceeds; and they shall also have the right to carry on their industry, commerce and professions, being subject in respect thereof to such laws as are applicable to other foreigners. In case they remain in the territory they may preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain by making, before a court of record, within a year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, a declaration of their decision to preserve such allegiance; in default of which declaration they shall be held to have renounced it and to have adopted the nationality of the territory in which they may reside.

"The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress."

By the constitution of the Spanish monarchy, and the Spanish Civil Code, in force in Porto Rico when the treaty was proclaimed, persons born in Spanish territory were declared to be Spaniards, but Porto Ricans who were not natives of the Peninsula, remaining in Porto Rico, could not, according to the terms of the treaty, elect to retain their allegiance to Spain. By the cession their allegiance became due to the United States, which was in possession and had assumed the government, and they became entitled to its protection. The nationality of the island became American instead of Spanish, and by the treaty, Peninsulars, not deciding to preserve their allegiance to Spain, were to be "held to have renounced it and to have adopted the nationality of the territory in which they may reside."

Thereupon Congress passed the act of April 12, 1900. That act created a civil government for Porto Rico, with a Governor, Secretary, Attorney General, and other officers, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who, together with five other persons, likewise so appointed and confirmed, were constituted an executive council, at least five of whom should be "native inhabitants of Porto Rico"; and local legislative powers were vested in a legislative assembly, consisting of the executive council and a house of delegates to be elected. * * *

By section 7[11] the inhabitants of Porto Rico, who were Spanish subjects on the day the treaty was proclaimed, including Spaniards of the Peninsula who had not elected to preserve their allegiance to the Spanish Crown, were to be deemed citizens of Porto Rico, and they and citizens of the United States residing in Porto Rico were constituted a body politic under the name of The People of Porto Rico.

[11] "All inhabitants continuing to reside therein who were Spanish subjects on April 11, 1899, and then resided in Porto Rico, and their children born subsequent thereto, shall be deemed and held to be citizens of Porto Rico, and as such entitled to the protection of the United States, except such as shall have elected to preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain on or before April 11, 1900, in accordance with the provisions of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain entered into on April 11, 1899; and they, together with such citizens

Gonzales was a native inhabitant of Porto Rico and a Spanish subject, though not of the Peninsula, when the cession transferred her allegiance to the United States, and she was a citizen of Porto Rico under the act. And there was nothing expressed in the act, nor reasonably to be implied therefrom, to indicate the intention of Congress that citizens of Porto Rico should be considered as aliens, and the right of free access denied to them.

Counsel for the Government contends that the test of Gonzales' rights was citizenship of the United States and not alienage. We do not think so, and, on the contrary, are of opinion that if Gonzales were not an alien within the act of 1891, the order below was erroneous.

Conceding to counsel that the general terms "alien," "citizen," "subject," are not absolutely inclusive, or completely comprehensive, and that, therefore, neither of the numerous definitions of the term "alien" is necessarily controlling, we, nevertheless, cannot concede, in view of the language of the treaty and of the act of April 12, 1900, that the word "alien," as used in the act of 1891, embraces the citizens of Porto Rico.

We are not required to discuss the power of Congress in the premises; or the contention of Gonzales' counsel that the cession of Porto Rico accomplished the naturalization of its people; or that of Commissioner Degetau, in his excellent argument as amicus curiae, that a citizen of Porto Rico, under the act of 1900, is necessarily a citizen of the United States. The question is the narrow one whether Gonzales was an alien within the meaning of that term as used in the act of 1891.

The act excludes from admission into the United States, "in accordance with the existing acts regulating immigration other than those concerning Chinese laborers," certain classes of "aliens" and of "alien immigrants" arriving at any place within the United States, in respect of all of whom it is required that the commanding officer and agents of the vessel by which they come shall report the name, nationality, last residence and destination before any are landed.

of the United States as may reside in Porto Rico, shall constitute a body politic under the name of The People of Porto Rico, with governmental powers as hereinafter conferred, and with power to sue and be sued as such." Act April 12, 1900, c. 191, § 7, 31 Stat. 79.

ent of Immigration, whose action is subject to review by the Secretary of the Treasury; and all aliens who unlawfully come into the United States in violation of law shall be immediately, if practicable, sent back, or may be returned as by law provided.

We think it clear that the act relates to foreigners as respects this country, to persons owing allegiance to a foreign government, and citizens or subjects thereof; and that citizens of Porto Rico, whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States; who live in the peace of the dominion of the United States; the organic law of whose domicil was enacted by the United States, and is enforced through officials sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, are not "aliens," and upon their arrival by water at the ports of our mainland are not "alien immigrants," within the intent and meaning of the act of 1891. * * *

And in the present case, as Gonzales did not come within the act of 1891, the commissioner had no jurisdiction to detain and deport her by deciding the mere question of law to the contrary; and she was not obliged to resort to the Superintendent or the Secretary. * * *

Final order reversed and cause remanded with a direction to discharge Gonzales.[12]

TOYOTA v. UNITED STATES.

1925. Supreme Court of the United States. 268 U. S. 402.

Questions certified by the Circuit Court of Appeals, arising upon an appeal by Toyota from a decree of the District Court (290 Fed. 971) canceling his certificate of naturalization in a proceeding brought by the government for that purpose under the Naturalization Act.

Mr. Justice Butler delivered the opinion of the Court.

Hidemitsu Toyota, a person of the Japanese race, born in Japan, entered the United States in 1913. He served substantially all the time between November of that year and May, 1923, in the United

[12] The present status of Porto Ricans is defined by Act of March 2, 1917, c. 145, § 5, 39 Stat. 953, U. S. C. Title 8, § 5, as follows: "All citizens of Porto Rico as defined by section 7 of the Act of April 12, 1900 [supra, p. 410, footnote 11] * * * and all natives of Porto Rico who were temporarily absent from that island on April 11, 1899, and have since returned and are permanently residing in that island, and are not citizens of any foreign country, are declared and shall be deemed and held to be, citizens of the United States * * *."

Hawaiians: "All persons who were citizens of the Republic of Hawaii on August 12, 1898, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States and citizens of the Territory of Hawaii. And all citizens of the United States resident in the Hawaiian Islands who were resident there on or since August 12, 1898, and all the citizens of the United States who shall hereafter reside in the Territory of Hawaii for one year shall be citizens of the Territory of Hawaii." States Coast Guard Service. This was a part of the naval force of the United States nearly all of the time the United States was engaged in the recent war. He received eight or more honorable discharges, and some of them were for service during the war. May 14, 1921, he filed his petition for naturalization in the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts. The petition was granted, and a certificate of naturalization was issued to him. This case arises on a petition to cancel the certificate on the ground that it was illegally procured. Section 15, Act of June 29, 1906, c. 3592, 34 Stat. 596, 601 [U. S. C. Title 8, § 405]. It is agreed that if a person of the Japanese race, born in Japan, may legally be naturalized under the seventh subdivision of section 4 of the Act of June 29, 1906, as amended by the Act of May 9, 1918, c. 69, 40 Stat. 542 [U. S. C. Title 8, § 388] or under the Act of July 19, 1919, c. 24, 41 Stat. 222, Toyota is legally naturalized. The District Court held he was not entitled to be naturalized, and entered a decree canceling his certificate of citizenship. 290 Fed. 971. An appeal was taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals, and that court under section 239, Judicial Code [U. S. C. Title 28, § 346] certified to this court the following questions: (1) Whether a person of the Japanese race, born in Japan, may legally be naturalized under the seventh subdivision of section 4 of the Act of June 29, 1906, as amended by the Act of May 9, 1918; and (2) whether such subject may legally be naturalized under the Act of July 19, 1919. The material provisions of these enactments are printed in the margin.[13]

Any native-born Filipino of the age of twenty-one years and upward who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States and who has enlisted or may hereafter enlist in the United States Navy or Marine Corps or the Naval Auxiliary Service, and who, after service of not less than three years, may be honorably discharged therefrom, or who may receive an ordinary discharge with recommendation for reenlistment; or any alien, or any Porto Rican not a citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years and upward, who has enlisted or entered or may hereafter enlist in or enter the armies of the United States, * * * or in the United States Navy or Marine Corps, or in the United States Coast Guard, or who has served for three years on board of any vessel of the United States government, or for three years on board of merchant or fishing vessels of the United States of more than twenty tons burden, and while still in the service on a reenlistment or reappointment, or within six months after an honorable discharge or separation therefrom, or while on furlough to the Army Reserve or Regular Army Reserve after honorable service, may, on presentation of the required declaration of intention petition for naturalization without proof of the required five years' residence within the United States if upon examination * * * it is shown that such residence cannot be established; any alien serving in the military or naval service of the United States during the time this country is engaged in the present war may file his petition for naturalization without making the preliminary declaration of intention and without proof of the required five years' residence within the United States; * * * § 2 * * * Nothing in this act shall repeal or in any way enlarge section twenty-one hundred and sixty-nine of the Revised Statutes, except as specified in the seventh subdivision of this act and under the limitation therein defined. * * *" Act of May 9, 1918, c. 69, 40 Stat. 542, 547.

"Any person of foreign birth who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during the present war, after final examination and acceptance by

Until 1870, only aliens being free white persons were eligible to citizenship. In that year, aliens of African nativity and persons of African descent were made eligible. See Ozawa v. United States, 260 U. S. 178, 192. The substance of prior legislation is expressed in section 2169, Revised Statutes, which is:

"The provisions of this title [Naturalization] shall apply to aliens being free white persons and to aliens of African nativity and to persons of African descent

A person of the Japanese race, born in Japan, is not eligible under that section. Ozawa v. United States, supra, 198.

It has long been the rule that in order to be admitted to citizenship an alien is required, at least two years prior to his admission, to declare his intention to become a citizen, and to show that he has resided continuously in the United States for at least five years immediately preceding his admission. Revised Statutes, §§ 2165, 2170 [U. S. C. Title 8, § 361]; subdivision 1, § 4, c. 3592, 34 Stat. 596. But at different times, as to specially designated aliens serving in the armed forces of the United States, Congress modified and lessened these requirements. Section 2166, Revised Statutes (Act of July 17, 1862, § 21, c. 200, 12 Stat. 594, 597); Act of July 26, 1894, c. 165, 28 Stat. 123, 124; Act of June 30, 1914, c. 130, 38 Stat. 392, 395. In each of the first two of these acts, the phrase "any alien" is used as a part of the description of the person for whose benefit the act was passed. In the last, the language is "any alien * * * who may, under existing law, become a citizen of the United States." Prior to this act, it had been held that the phrase "any alien," used in the earlier acts, did not enlarge the classes defined in section 2169. In re Buntaro Kumagai (D. C. 1908) 163 Fed. 922; In re Knight (D. C. 1909) 171 Fed. 299; Bessho v. United States (1910) 178 Fed. 245; In re Alverto (D. C. 1912) 198 Fed. 688. The language used in the Act of 1914 merely expresses what was implied in the earlier provisions.

The seventh subdivision of section 4 of the Act of 1918 permits "any native-born Filipino" or "any alien, or any Porto Rican not a citizen of the United States" belonging respectively to the classes there described, on presentation of the required declaration of intention, to petition for naturalization without proof of five years' residence within the United States; and the act permits "any alien" serving in the forces of the United States "during the time this country is engaged in the present war" to file his petition for naturalization without making the preliminary declaration of in-the said military or naval authorities, and shall have been honorably discharged after such acceptance and service, shall have the benefits of the seventh subdivision of section 4 of the Act of June 29, 1906, * * * as amended, and shall not be required to pay any fee therefor; and this provision shall continue for the period of one year after all of the American troops are returned to the United States." Act of July 19, 1919, c. 24, 41 Stat. 222.

tention and without proof of five years' residence in the United States. The Act of 1919 gave "any person of foreign birth," there mentioned, the benefits of the seventh subdivision of section 4. Evidently, a principal purpose of these acts was to facilitate the naturalization of service men of the classes specified. There is nothing to show an intention to eliminate from the definition of eligibility in section 2169 the distinction based on color or race. Nor is there anything to indicate that, if the seventh subdivision stood alone, the words "any alien" should be taken to mean more than did the same words when used in the Acts of 1862 and 1894. But section 2 of the Act of 1918 [included in effect in U. S. C. Title 8, § 359] provides that nothing in the act shall repeal or in any way enlarge section 2169 "except as specified in the seventh subdivision of this act and under the limitation therein defined." This implies some enlargement of section 2169 in respect of color and race; but it also indicates a purpose not to eliminate all distinction based on color and race so long continued in the naturalization laws. If it was intended to make such change and to extend the privilege of naturalization to all races, the provision of section 2 so limiting the enlargement of section 2169 would be inappropriate. And if the phrase "any alien" in the seventh subdivision is read literally, the qualifying words "being free white persons" and "of African nativity" in section 2169 are without significance. See In re Geronimo Para (D. C.) 269 Fed. 643, 646; Petition of Easurk Emsen Charr (D. C.) 273 Fed. 207, 213.

When the Act of 1918 was passed, it was doubtful whether section 30 of the Act of 1906 [quoted in the next paragraph] extended the privilege of naturalization to all citizens of the Philippine Islands. They were held eligible for naturalization in Re Bautista (D. C.) 245 Fed. 765, and in Re Mallari (D. C.) 239 Fed. 416. And see 27 Op. Attys. Gen. 12. They were held not eligible in Re Alverto (D. C.) 198 Fed. 688, in Re Lampitoe (D. C.) 232 Fed. 382, and in Re Rallos (D. C.) 241 Fed. 686. But we hold[14] that until the passage of that act, Filipinos not being "free white persons" or "of African nativity" were not eligible, and that the effect of the Act of 1918 was to make eligible, and to authorize the naturalization of, native-born Filipinos of whatever color or race having the qualifications specified in the seventh subdivision of section 4.

Under the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain, December 10, 1898, 30 Stat. 1754, Congress was authorized to determine the civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the Philippine Islands. And by the Act of July 1, 1902, § 4, c. 1369, 32 Stat. 691, 692, it was declared that all inhabitants continuing to reside therein who were Spanish subjects on April 11, 1899, and then resided in the Islands and their children born subsequent thereto, "shall be deemed and held to be citizens of the Philippine Islands and as such entitled to the protection of the United States, except such as shall have elected to preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain," according to the treaty. The citizens of the Philippine Islands are not aliens.[15] See Gonzales v.

[15] NATIVE PEOPLES OF THE PHILIPPINES: Subsequent to the legislation referred to above Congress has made no declaration as to the status of the native peoples of the Philippines except the Act of Aug. 29, 1916, c. 416, § 2, 39 Stat. 546, which reiterates that they shall be deemed to be "citizens of the Philippine Islands."

The attitude of the executive and legislative departments of the United States doubtless remains the same as that stated by Attorney General Griggs on Feb. 19, 1901: "As to the native inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, no action has as yet been taken by Congress, and therefore those people remain in the same condition, in this respect, as they were when the treaty was ratified. * * * It may be taken, therefore, as undisputed that the executive, the treaty-making, and the legislative branches of the Government, regard these native inhabitants, * * * as not vested with the rights or admitted to the status of citizens of the United States in a domestic sense.

"With the correctness of this view, and this course of executive and legislative action, I fully agree; and until that view is judicially declared to be erroneous, all official action by the Executive Departments should conform to the same course heretofore followed. * * * That is to say, from the standpoint of our government they are not citizens of the United States in any sense. They are persons who are not subjects of any foreign power, and are, from an international standpoint, subjects of the United States, or, to use a term that has been suggested, 'nationals.' " * * * (1901) 23 Op. Atty. Gen. 401, 402. This opinion received some judicial confirmation in the individual opinion of Mr. Justice Brown in Downes v. Bidwell (1901) 182 U. S. 244, 279-280, 45 L. ed. 1088: "We are also of opinion that the power to acquire territory by treaty implies not only the power to govern such territory, but to prescribe upon what terms the United States will receive its inhabitants, and what their status shall be in what Chief Justice Marshall termed the 'American Empire.' There seems to be no middle ground between this position and the doctrine that if their inhabitants do not become, immediately upon annexation, citizens of the United States, their children thereafter born, whether savages or civilized, are such, and entitled to all the rights, privileges and immunities of citizens. If such be their status, the consequences will be extremely serious. Indeed, it is doubtful if Congress would ever assent to the annexation of territory upon the condition that its inhabitants, however foreign they may be to our habits, traditions and modes of life, shall become at once citizens of the United States. In all its treaties hitherto the treaty-making power has made special provision for this subject; in the cases of Louisiana and Florida, by stipulating that 'the inhabitants shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and admitted as soon as possible * * * to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States;' in the case of Mexico, that they should 'be incorporated into the Union, and be admitted at the proper time, (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States), to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States;' in the case of Alaska, that the inhabitants who remained three years, 'with the exception of uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights,' etc.; and in the case of Porto Rico and the Philippines, 'that the civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants * * * shall be determined by Congress.' In all these cases there is an implied denial of the right of the inhabitants to American citizenship until Congress by further action shall signify its assent thereto." See also Frederic R. Coudert, Jr., 3 Col. Law Rev. (1903) 13-32. Compare 11 Col. Law Rev. (1911) pp. 337-347, where the native peoples of the Philippines were characterized as having qualified or partial citizenship. Perhaps it is better to say that they have American nationality but not citizenship. See the last cited essay for suggested answers to these questions:—Is a child born in the Philippines since American acquisition, of parents who were born in continental United States or who were naturalized citizens of the United States, merely an American national,—not a citizen? Is a child born

Williams, 192 U. S. 1, 13. They owe no allegiance to any foreign government. They were not eligible for naturalization under section 2169 because not aliens and so not within its terms. By section 30 of the Act of 1906, it is provided:

"That all the applicable provisions of the naturalization laws of the United States shall apply to and be held to authorize the admission to citizenship of all persons not citizens who owe permanent allegiance to the United States, and who may become residents of any state or organized territory of the United States, with the following modifications: The applicant shall not be required to renounce allegiance to any foreign sovereignty; he shall make his declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States at least two years prior to his admission; and residence within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing such permanent allegiance, shall be regarded as residence within the United States within the meaning of the five years' residence clause of the existing law." 34 Stat. 606.

in continental United States of parents who are "native inhabitants" of the Philippines merely a national or is he in addition a citizen of the United States?

AMERICAN INDIANS: See the statement of the case of Elk v. Wilkins (1884) 112 U. S. 94, 28 L. ed. 643, in the opinion in United States v. Wong Kim Ark, supra, p. 395. That statement cautiously confines the decision to the facts of Elk's case. It followed that members of existing tribes, in the absence of special legislation, were not citizens. What was the status of these non-citizen native-born Indians? A tribe as such, that is, a tribe collectively, was characterized as a "domestic dependent nation." The Cherokee Nation v. Georgia (U. S. 1831) 5 Pet. 1, 17, 8 L. ed. 25. There was some slight dicta that tribal Indians individually were aliens. Elk v. Wilkins, supra, and see Cherokee Nation v. Georgia (U. S. 1831) 5 Pet. 1, 16, 8 L. ed. 25; Taney, C. J., in Dred Scott v. Sandford (U. S. 1857) 19 How. 393, 404, 15 L. ed. 691. A favorite and vague designation of the relation between the United States and individual tribal Indians was that of guardian and ward. By special acts of Congress from time to time the members of particular tribes were declared citizens of the United States. See Van Dyne, Citizenship of the United States (1904) 235 ff. Did this naturalization convert persons who had been nationals into citizens, or was this a change from alienage to citizenship? Note that Indians whether native or foreign born were not and are not eligible to naturalization upon petition under our general naturalization statute because they are neither "white" nor of "African descent." 1 Moore's Dig. of Inter. Law 33; In re Camille (1880) 6 Fed. 256; In re Burton (1900) 1 Alaska 111; In re Geronimo Para (1919) 269 Fed. 643. In 1905, Brewer, J., said: "Of late years a new policy has found expression in the legislation of Congress—a policy which looks to the breaking up of tribal relations, the establishing of the separate Indians in individual homes, free from national guardianship and charged with all the rights and obligations of citizens of the United States. Of the power of the Government to carry out this policy there can be no doubt. It is under no constitutional obligation to perpetually continue the relationship of guardian and ward." Matter of Heff (1905) 197 U. S. 488, 499, 49 L. ed. 848. He referred particularly to the Lands in Severalty Act of Feb. 8, 1887, § 6, 24 Stat. 390, for breaking up tribal land and its allotment to the members severally. Each Indian allottee was declared to become a citizen. Citizenship was also conferred by that Act upon the following Indians other than allottees: "Every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States who has voluntarily taken up, within said limits, his residence separate and apart from any tribe of Indians therein, and has adopted the habits of civilized life." The remnants left by this and other piece-meal legislation have been definitely given citizen status. "All non-citizen Indians born within the territorial limits of the United States be, and they are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States." Act of June 2, 1924, c. 233, 43 Stat. 253.

Section 26 of that act repeals certain sections of title 30 of the Revised Statutes, but leaves section 2169 in force. It is to be applied as if it were included in the Act of 1906. Plainly, the element of alienage included in section 2169 did not apply to the class made eligible by section 30 of the Act of 1906. The element of color and race included in that section is not specifically dealt with by section 30, and, as it has long been the national policy to maintain the distinction of color and race, radical change is not lightly to be deemed to have been intended. "Persons not citizens who owe permanent allegiance to the United States, and who may become residents of any state," may include Malays, Japanese, and Chinese, and others not eligible under the distinction as to color and race. As under section 30 all the applicable provisions of the naturalization laws apply, the limitations based on color and race remain; and the class made eligible by section 30 must be limited to those of the color and race included by section 2169. As Filipinos are not aliens and owe allegiance to the United States, there are strong reasons for relaxing as to them the restrictions which do not exist in favor of aliens who are barred because of their color and race. And in view of the policy of Congress to limit the naturalization of aliens to white persons and to those of African nativity or descent the implied enlargement of section 2169 should be taken at the minimum. The legislative history of the act indicates that the intention of Congress was not to enlarge section 2169, except in respect of Filipinos qualified by the specified service. Senate Report No. 388, pp. 2, 3, 8; House Report No. 502, pp. 1, 4, Sixty-Fifth Congress, Second Session. See, also, Congressional Record, vol. 56, part 6, pp. 6000-6003. And we hold that the words "any alien" in the seventh subdivision are limited by section 2169 to aliens of the color and race there specified. We also hold that the phrase "any person of foreign birth" in the Act of 1919 is not more comprehensive than the words "any alien" in the Act of 1918. It follows that the questions certified must be answered in the negative.

The answer to the first question is: No.

The answer to the second question is: No.

The CHIEF JUSTICE [Taft] dissents.

MACKENZIE v. HARE.

1915. Supreme Court of the United States. 239 U. S. 299.

[On writ of error to review a judgment of the Supreme Court of California, 165 Cal. 776, which denied Mrs. Mackenzie's application made in 1913 for a writ of mandate to be directed to the Board of Election Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco to register her as a voter of the city and county. She was born in and ever since had resided in California. In 1909 she married Gordon Mackenzie, a British subject. She and her husband continued to reside in California to the date of her application and there was no evidence that either intended a change of residence. It was admitted that she had done no act to terminate her American citizenship unless the marriage so operated. The state court based its denial on the ground that she was not a citizen of the United States and therefore ineligible to vote under the constitution and statutes of the state.]

MR. JUSTICE MCKENNA delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

The constitution of the state gives the privilege of suffrage to "every native citizen of the United States," and it is contended that under the Constitution of the United States every person born in the United States is a citizen thereof. The latter must be conceded, and if plaintiff has not lost her citizenship by her marriage she has the qualification of a voter prescribed by the constitution of the state of California. The question then is, Did she cease to be a citizen by her marriage?

On March 2, 1907, c. 2534, 34 Stat. 1228, that is, prior to the marriage of plaintiff in error. Congress enacted a statute the third section of which provides "That any American woman who marries a foreigner shall take the nationality of her husband. At the termination of the marital relation she may resume her American citizenship, if abroad, by registration as an American citizen within one year with a consul of the United States, or by returning to reside in the United States, or, if residing in the United States at the termination of the marital relation, by continuing to reside therein."

Plaintiff contends that "such legislation, if intended to apply to her, is beyond the authority of Congress." * * *

An earnest argument is presented to demonstrate its invalidity. Its basis is that the citizenship of plaintiff was an incident to her birth in the United States, and, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, it became a right, privilege and immunity which could not be taken away from her except as a punishment for crime or by her voluntary expatriation.

The argument to support the contention and the argument to oppose it take a wide range through the principles of the common law and international law and their development and change. Both plaintiff and defendants agree that under the common law originally allegiance was immutable. They do not agree as to when the rigidity of the principle was relaxed. Plaintiff in error contests the proposition which she attributes to defendants in error "that the doctrine of perpetual allegiance maintained by England was accepted by the United States," but contends "that the prevalent doctrine of this country always has been that a citizen had a right to expatriate himself," and cites cases to show that expatriation is a natural and inherent right. * * *

But plaintiff says, "Expatriation is evidenced only by emigration, coupled with other acts indicating an intention to transfer one's allegiance." And all the acts must be voluntary, "the result of a fixed determination to change the domicile and permanently reside elsewhere, as well as to throw off the former allegiance, and become a citizen or subject of a foreign power."

The right and the condition of its exercise being thus defined, it is said that the authority of Congress is limited to giving its consent. This is variously declared and emphasized. "No act of the legislature," plaintiff says, " 'can denationalize a citizen without his concurrence,' " citing Burkett v. McCarty, 73 Kentucky (10 Bush), 758. "And the sovereign cannot discharge a subject from his allegiance against his consent except by disfranchisement as a punishment for crime," citing Ainslie v. Martin, 9 Mass. 454. "The Constitution does not authorize Congress to enlarge or abridge the rights of citizens," citing Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 737. "The power of naturalization vested in Congress by the Constitution is a power to confer citizenship, not a power to take it away. * * * The Fourteenth Amendment, while it leaves the power where it was before, in Congress, to regulate naturalization, has conferred no authority upon Congress to restrict the effect of birth declared by the Constitution to constitute a complete right of citizenship," citing United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S. at p. 703.

It will thus be seen that plaintiff's contention is in exact antagonism to the statute. Only voluntary expatriation, as she defines it, can divest a woman of her citizenship, she declares; the statute provides that by marriage with a foreigner she takes his nationality.

It would make this opinion very voluminous to consider in detail the argument and the cases urged in support of or in attack upon the opposing conditions [positions]. Their foundation principles, we may assume, are known. The identity of husband and wife is an ancient principle of our jurisprudence. It was neither accidental nor arbitrary and worked in many instances for her protection. There has been, it is true, much relaxation of it but in its retention as in its origin it is determined by their intimate relation and unity of interests, and this relation and unity may make it of public concern in many instances to merge their identity, and give dominance to the husband. It has purpose, if not necessity, in purely domestic policy; it has greater purpose and, it may be, necessity, in international policy. And this was the dictate of the act in controversy. Having this purpose, has it not the sanction of power?

Plaintiff contends, as we have seen, that it has not, and bases her contention upon the absence of an express gift of power. But there may be powers implied, necessary or incidental to the expressed powers. As a government, the United States is invested with all the attributes of sovereignty. As it has the character of nationality it has the powers of nationality, especially those which concern its relations and intercourse with other countries. We should hesitate long before limiting or embarrassing such powers. But monition is not necessary in the present case. There need be no dissent from the cases cited by plaintiff; there need be no assertion of very extensive power over the right of citizenship or of the imperative imposition of conditions upon it. It may be conceded that a change of citizenship cannot be arbitrarily imposed, that is, imposed without the concurrence of the citizen. The law in controversy does not have that feature. It deals with a condition voluntarily entered into, with notice of the consequences. We concur with counsel that citizenship is of tangible worth, and we sympathize with plaintiff in her desire to retain it and in her earnest assertion of it. But there is involved more than personal considerations. As we have seen, the legislation was urged by conditions of national moment. And this is an answer to the apprehension of counsel that our construction of the legislation will make every act, though lawful, as marriage, of course, is, a renunciation of citizenship. The marriage of an American woman with a foreigner has consequences of like kind, may involve national complications of like kind, as her physical expatriation may involve. Therefore, as long as the relation lasts it is made tantamount to expatriation. This is no arbitrary exercise of government. It is one which, regarding the international aspects, judicial opinion has taken for granted would not only be valid but demanded. It is the conception of the legislation under review that such an act may bring the Government into embarrassments and, it may be, into controversies. It is as voluntary and distinctive as expatriation and its consequence must be considered as elected.

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS is of opinion that this court is without jurisdiction, and that, therefore, this writ of error should be dismissed.

[16] An Act of February 10, 1855, 10 Stat. 604, declared that marriage of an alien woman to an American citizen made her a citizen provided she was a person who was racially eligible to naturalization, Kelly v. Owen (U. S. 1869) 7 Wall. 496, 19 L. ed. 283, but prior to the Act of March 2, 1907 (considered in the above case) there was no statute to determine the effect of marriage of a citizen woman to an alien. The courts assumed that the common law controlled and the weight of authority was that such marriage of itself did not terminate the woman's American citizenship. Shanks v. Dupont (U. The present statutory law is as follows:

"A woman citizen of the United States shall not cease to be a citizen of the United States by reason of her marriage, unless she makes a formal renunciation of her citizenship before a court having jurisdiction over naturalization of aliens: Provided, That any woman citizen who marries an alien ineligible to citizenship shall cease to be a citizen of the United States. If at the termination of the marital status she is a citizen of the United States she shall retain her citizenship regardless of her residence. If during the continuance of the marital status she resides continuously for two years in a foreign State of which her husband is a citizen or subject, or for five years continuously outside the United States, she shall thereafter be subject to the same presumption as is a naturalized citizen of the United States under section 17 of this title. Nothing herein shall be construed to repeal or amend the provisions of section 15 of this title or of section 17 with reference to expatriation." [And further to the effect that the repeal of the statute quoted in Mackenzie v. Hare "shall not restore citizenship lost thereunder, nor terminate citizenship resumed thereunder."] U. S. C. Title 8, § 369 for short cut to naturalization of women embraced within the bracketed clause, provided they are racially eligible to naturalization and married racially eligible husbands.

"Any woman who marries a citizen of the United States after September 22, 1922, or any woman whose husband is naturalized after that date, shall not become a citizen of the United States by reason of such marriage or naturalization; but, if eligible to citizenship, she may be naturalized upon full and complete compliance with all requirements of the naturalization laws, with the following exceptions:

(a) No declaration of intention shall be required;

(b) In lieu of the five-year period of residence within the United States and the one-year period of residence within the State or Territory where the naturalization court is held, she shall have resided continuously in the United States, Hawaii, Alaska, or Porto Rico for at least one year immediately preceding the filing of the petition." tering and abiding in the United States, and hence of entering and abiding in any state in the Union. See Gegiow v. Uhl, Commissioner, 239 U. S. 3. Being lawfully an inhabitant of Arizona, the complainant is entitled under the Fourteenth Amendment to the equal protection of its laws. The description—"any person within its jurisdiction"—as it has frequently been held, includes aliens. "These provisions," said the court in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 369 (referring to the due process and equal protection clauses of the Amendment), "are universal in their application, to all persons within the territorial jurisdiction, without regard to any differences of race, of color, or of nationality; and the equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws." See also Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U. S. 228, 242; United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S. 649, 695. The discrimination defined by the act does not pertain to the regulation or distribution of the public domain, or of the common property or resources of the people of the state, the enjoyment of which may be limited to its citizens as against both aliens and the citizens of other states. Thus in McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, 396, the restriction to the citizens of Virginia of the right to plant oysters in one of its rivers was sustained upon the ground that the regulation related to the common property of the citizens of the state, and an analogous principle was involved in Patsone v. Pennsylvania, 232 U. S. 138, 145, 146, where the discrimination against aliens upheld by the court had for its object the protection of wild game within the states with respect to which it was said that the state could exercise its preserving power for the benefit of its own citizens if it pleased. The case now presented is not within these decisions, or within those relating to the devolution of real property (Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483; Blythe v. Hinckley, 180 U. S. 333, 341, 342); and it should be added that the act is not limited to persons who are engaged on public work or receive the benefit of public moneys. The discrimination here involved is imposed upon the conduct of ordinary private enterprise.

The act, it will be observed, provides that every employer (whether corporation, partnership, or individual) who employs more than five workers at any one time "regardless of kind or class of work, or sex of workers" shall employ "not less than eighty per cent. qualified electors or native born citizens of the United States or some subdivision thereof." It thus covers the entire field of industry with the exception of enterprises that are relatively very small. Its application in the present case is to employment in a restaurant the business of which requires nine employees. The purpose of an act must be found in its natural operation and effect (Henderson v. Mayor, 92 U. S. 259, 268; Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 244), and the purpose of this act is not only plainly shown by its provisions, but it is frankly revealed in its title. It is there described as "An act to protect the citizens of the United States in their employment against non-citizens of the United States, in Arizona." As the appellants rightly say, there has been no subterfuge. It is an act aimed at the employment of aliens, as such, in the businesses described. Literally, its terms might be taken to include with aliens those naturalized citizens who by reason of change of residence might not be at the time qualified electors in any subdivision of the United States, but we are dealing with the main purpose of the statute, definitely stated, in the execution of which the complainant is to be forced out of his employment as a cook in a restaurant, simply because he is an alien.

It is sought to justify this act as an exercise of the power of the state to make reasonable classifications in legislating to promote the health, safety, morals and welfare of those within its jurisdiction. But this admitted authority, with the broad range of legislative discretion that it implies, does not go so far as to make it possible for the state to deny to lawful inhabitants, because of their race or nationality, the ordinary means of earning a livelihood. It requires no argument to show that the right to work for a living in the common occupations of the community is of the very essence of the personal freedom and opportunity that it was the purpose of the Amendment to secure. Butchers' Union Co. v. Crescent City Co., 111 U. S. 746, 762; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 31; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, supra; Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 589, 590; Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U. S. 1, 14. If this could be refused solely upon the ground of race or nationality, the prohibition of the denial to any person of the equal protection of the laws would be a barren form of words. It is no answer to say, as it is argued, that the act proceeds upon the assumption that "the employment of aliens unless restrained was a peril to the public welfare." The discrimination against aliens in the wide range of employments to which the act relates is made an end in itself and thus the authority to deny to aliens, upon the mere fact of their alienage, the right to obtain support in the ordinary fields of labor is necessarily involved. It must also be said that reasonable classification implies action consistent with the legitimate interests of the state, and it will not be disputed that these cannot be so broadly conceived as to bring them into hostility to exclusive federal power. The authority to control immigration—to admit or exclude aliens—is vested solely in the Federal Government.[1] Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149

[1] EXCLUSION AND DEPORTATION OF ALIENS: "It is an accepted maxim of international law, that every sovereign nation has the power, as inherent in sovereignty, and essential to self-preservation, to forbid the entrance of foreigners within its dominions, or to admit them only in such cases and upon such conditions as it may see fit to prescribe. * * * In the United States this power is vested in the national government, to which the Constitution has committed the entire control of international relations, in peace as well as in war. It belongs to the political department of the government, and may be exercised either through treaties made by the President and Senate, or through statutes

U. S. 698, 713. The assertion of an authority to deny to aliens the opportunity of earning a livelihood when lawfully admitted to the state would be tantamount to the assertion of the right to deny them entrance and abode, for in ordinary cases they cannot live where they cannot work. And, if such a policy were permissible, the practical result would be that those lawfully admitted to the country under the authority of the acts of Congress, instead of enjoying in a substantial sense and in their full scope the privileges conferred by the admission, would be segregated in such of the states as chose to offer hospitality.

It is insisted that the act should be supported because it is not "a total deprivation of the right of the alien to labor"; that is, the restriction is limited to those businesses in which more than five workers are employed, and to the ratio fixed. It is emphasized that the employer in any line of business who employs more than five workers may employ aliens to the extent of twenty per cent. of his employees. But the fallacy of this argument at once appears. If the state is at liberty to treat the employment of aliens as in itself a peril requiring restraint regardless of kind or class of work, it cannot be denied that the authority exists to make its measures to that end effective. Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606; Silz v. Hesterburg, 211 U. S. 31; Purity Co. v. Lynch, 226 U. S. 192. If the restriction to twenty per cent. now imposed is maintainable the state undoubtedly has the power if it sees fit to make the percentage less. We have nothing before us to justify the limitation to twenty per cent. save the judgment expressed in the enactment, and if that is sufficient, it is difficult to see why the apprehension and conviction thus evidenced would not be sufficient were the restriction extended so as to permit only ten per cent. of the employees to be aliens or even a less percentage, or were it made applicable to all businesses in which more than three workers were employed instead of applying to those employing more than five. We have frequently said that enacted by Congress." Gray, J., in Nishimura Ekiu v. United States (1892) 142 U. S. 651, 659, 35 L. ed. 1146.

In Fong Yue Ting v. United States (1893) 149 U. S. 698, 707, 711, 37 L. ed. 905, it was said that the national government on like grounds has power to expel or deport aliens, "to expel all aliens, or any class of aliens, absolutely or upon certain conditions, in war or in peace." Prior to the Act of May 6, 1882, c. 126, Chinese laborers might lawfully enter and settle in the United States. That act prohibited further immigration of such persons. An act of May 5, 1892, c. 60, provided for the deportation of alien Chinese laborers who were found to be in the United States unlawfully, and as an aid in enforcement of this provision, the statute further provided (section 6) that "All Chinese laborers within the limits of the United States at the time of the passage of this act, and who are entitled to remain" should obtain within a year certificates of residence and identification under penalty of deportation if found in the United States thereafter without such certificates. In the cited case section 6 was sustained. There has been much subsequent legislation increasing the classes of aliens ineligible to immigration and the causes for which aliens shall be deported, and much litigation over the methods prescribed for enforcement but the powers of the national government to exclude and to deport by proper methods were settled in the above cases.

the legislature may recognize degrees of evil and adapt its legislation accordingly (St. Louis Consol. Coal Co. v. Illinois, 185 U. S. 203, 207; McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U. S. 539, 551; Miller v. Wilson, 236 U. S. 373, 384); but underlying the classification is the authority to deal with that at which the legislation is aimed. The restriction now sought to be sustained is such as to suggest no limit to the state's power of excluding aliens from employment if the principle underlying the prohibition of the act is conceded. No special public interest with respect to any particular business is shown that could possibly be deemed to support the enactment, for as we have said it relates to every sort. The discrimination is against aliens as such in competition with citizens in the described range of enterprises and in our opinion it clearly falls under the condemnation of the fundamental law.

The question of rights under treaties was not expressly presented by the bill, and, although mentioned in the argument, does not require attention in view of the invalidity of the act under the Fourteenth Amendment.

Order affirmed.

ASAKURA v. CITY OF SEATTLE ET AL.

1924. Supreme Court of the United States. 265 U. S. 332.

MR. JUSTICE BUTLER delivered the opinion of the court.

Plaintiff in error is a subject of the emperor of Japan, and since 1904 has resided in Seattle, Washington. Since July, 1915, he has been engaged in business there as a pawnbroker. The city passed an ordinance, which took effect July 2, 1921, regulating the business of pawnbroker, and repealing former ordinances on the same subject. It makes it unlawful for any person to engage in the business unless he shall have a license, and the ordinance provides "that no such license shall be granted unless the applicant be a citizen of the United States." Violations of the ordinance are punishable by fine or imprisonment or both. Plaintiff in error brought this suit in the superior court of King county, Washington, against the city, its comptroller, and chief of police, to restrain them from enforcing the ordinance against him. He attacked the ordinance on the ground that it violates the treaty between the United States and the Empire of Japan, proclaimed April 5, 1911, 37 Stat. 1504; violates the constitution of the State of Washington, and also the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. He declared his willingness to comply with any valid ordinance relating to the business of pawnbroker. It was shown that he had about $5,000 invested in his business, which would be broken up and destroyed by the enforcement of the ordinance. The superior court granted the relief prayed. On appeal, the supreme court of the state held the ordinance valid and reversed the decree. The case is here on writ of error under § 237 of the Judicial Code.

Does the ordinance violate the treaty? Plaintiff in error invokes and relies upon the following provisions: "The citizens or subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall have liberty to enter, travel and reside in the territories of the other to carry on trade, wholesale and retail, to own or lease and occupy houses, manufactories, warehouses and shops, to employ agents of their choice, to lease land for residential and commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade upon the same terms as native citizens or subjects, submitting themselves to the laws and regulations there established. * * * The citizens or subjects of each * * * shall receive, in the territories of the other, the most constant protection and security for their persons and property, * * *."

A treaty made under the authority of the United States "shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." Const. Art. VI, § 2.

The treaty-making power of the United States is not limited by any express provision of the Constitution, and, though it does not extend "so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids," it does extend to all proper subjects of negotiation between our government and other nations. Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258, 266, 267; In re Ross, 140 U. S. 453, 463; Missouri v. Holland, 252 U. S. 416. The treaty was made to strengthen friendly relations between the two nations. As to the things covered by it, the provision quoted establishes the rule of equality between Japanese subjects while in this country and native citizens. Treaties for the protection of citizens of one country residing in the territory of another are numerous,[2] and make for good understanding between nations. The treaty is binding within the State of Washington. Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S. 678, 682, 683. The rule of equality established by it cannot be rendered nugatory in any part of the United States by municipal ordinances or state laws. It stands on the same footing of supremacy as do the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States. It operates of itself, without the aid of any legislation, state or national; and it will be applied and given authoritative effect by the courts. Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253, 314; Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, 598; Chew Heong v. United States, 112 U. S. 536, 540; Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U. S. 190, 194; Maiorano v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., 213 U. S. 268, 272.

The purpose of the ordinance complained of is to regulate, not to prohibit, the business of pawnbroker. But it makes it impossible for aliens to carry on the business. It need not be considered whether the state, if it sees fit, may forbid and destroy the business generally. Such a law would apply equally to aliens and citizens, and no question of conflict with the treaty would arise. The grievance here alleged is that plaintiff in error, in violation of the treaty, is denied equal opportunity.

It remains to be considered whether the business of pawnbroker is "trade" within the meaning of the treaty. Treaties are to be construed in a broad and liberal spirit, and, when two constructions are possible, one restrictive of rights that may be claimed under it and the other favorable to them, the latter is to be preferred. Hauenstein v. Lynham, 100 U. S. 483, 487; Geofroy v. Riggs, supra, 271; Tucker v. Alexandroff, 183 U. S. 424, 437. The ordinance defines "pawnbroker" to "mean and include every person whose business or occupation it is to take and receive by way of pledge, pawn, or exchange, goods, wares, or merchandise, or any kind of personal property whatever, for the repayment or security of any money loaned thereon, or to loan money on deposit of personal property;" and defines "pawnshop" to "mean and include every place at which the business of pawnbroker is carried on." The language of the treaty is comprehensive. The phrase "to carry on trade" is broad. That it is not to be given a restricted meaning is plain. The clauses "to * * * own or lease * * * shops, * * * to lease land * * * for * * * commercial purposes, and generally to do anything incident to or necessary for trade," and "shall receive * * * the most constant protection and security for their * * * property * * *" all go to show the intention of the parties that the citizens or subjects of either shall have liberty in the territory of the other to engage in all kinds and classes of business that are or reasonably may be embraced within the meaning of the word "trade," as used in the treaty.

By definition contained in the ordinance, pawnbrokers are regarded as carrying on a "business." * * * In this country, the practice of pledging personal property for loans dates back to early colonial times, and pawnshops have been regulated by state laws for more than a century. We have found no state legislation abolishing or forbidding the business. Most, if not all, of the states provide for licensing pawnbrokers and authorize regulation by municipalities. While regulation has been found necessary in the public interest, the business is not, on that account, to be excluded from the trade and commerce referred to in the treaty. Many worthy occupations and lines of legitimate business are regulated by state and federal laws for the protection of the public against fraudulent and dishonest practices. There is nothing in the character of the business of pawnbroker which requires it to be excluded from the field covered by the above-quoted provision, and it must be held that such business is "trade" within the meaning of the treaty. The ordinance violates the treaty. * * * We need not consider other grounds upon which it is attacked.

Decree reversed.

TERRACE v. THOMPSON.

1923. Supreme Court of the United States. 263 U. S. 197.

[A statute of the State of Washington prohibited ownership by aliens (except those who had in good faith declared intention to become citizens of the United States) of any legal or equitable interest in any land (except for a few specified purposes). Terrace, a land owner, and Nakatsuka, an alien Japanese, who desired that the former should lease the land to the latter for farming (a forbidden purpose) joined in a suit in the District Court of the United States to enjoin the attorney general of the state from enforcing the statute, and appealed from a dismissal of the suit.]

Mr. Justice Butler delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

This brings us to a consideration of appellants' contention that the act contravenes the equal protection clause. That clause secures equal protection to all in the enjoyment of their rights under like circumstances. In re Kemmler, supra; Giozza v. Tiernan, 148 U. S. 657, 662. But this does not forbid every distinction in the law of a state between citizens and aliens resident therein. In Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U. S. 312, at page 337, this court said:

"In adjusting legislation to the need of the people of a state, the legislature has a wide discretion and it may be fully conceded that perfect uniformity of treatment of all persons is neither practical nor desirable, that classification of persons is constantly necessary. * * * Classification is the most inveterate of our reasoning processes. We can scarcely think or speak without consciously or unconsciously exercising it. It must therefore obtain in and determine legislation; but it must regard real resemblances and real differences between things, and persons, and class them in accordance with their pertinence to the purpose in hand."

The rights, privileges and duties of aliens differ widely from those of citizens; and those of alien declarants differ substantially from those of nondeclarants. Formerly in many of the states the right to vote and hold office was extended to declarants, and many important offices have been held by them. But these rights have not been granted to nondeclarants. By various acts of Congress, declarants have been made liable to military duty, but no act has imposed that duty on nondeclarants. The fourth paragraph of article 1 of the treaty (37 Stat. 1504), invoked by the appellants, provides that the citizens or subjects of each shall be exempt in the territories of the other from compulsory military service either on land or sea, in the regular forces, or in the national guard, or in the militia; also from all contributions imposed in lieu of personal service, and from all forced loans or military exactions or contributions. The alien's formally declared bona fide intention to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to the sovereignty to which he lately has been a subject, and to become a citizen of the United States and permanently reside therein markedly distinguishes him from an ineligible alien or an eligible alien who has not so declared.

By the statute in question all aliens who have not in good faith declared intention to become citizens of the United States, as specified in section 1 (a), are called "aliens," and it is provided that they shall not "own" "land," as defined in clauses (d) and (b) of section 1 respectively. The class so created includes all, but is not limited to, aliens not eligible to become citizens. Eligible aliens who have not declared their intention to become citizens are included, and the act provides that unless declarants be admitted to citizenship within seven years after the declaration is made, bad faith will be presumed. This leaves the class permitted so to own land made up of citizens and aliens who may, and who intend to, become citizens, and who in good faith have made the declaration required by the naturalization laws. The inclusion of good faith declarants in the same class with citizens does not unjustly discriminate against aliens who are ineligible or against eligible aliens who have failed to declare their intention. The classification is based on eligibility and purpose to naturalize. Eligible aliens are ✓ free white persons and persons of African nativity or descent. Congress is not trammeled, and it may grant or withhold the privilege of naturalization upon any grounds or without any reason, as it sees fit. But it is not to be supposed that its acts defining eligibility are arbitrary or unsupported by reasonable consideration of public policy.

The state properly may assume that the considerations upon which Congress made such classification are substantial and reasonable. Generally speaking, the natives of European countries are eligible. Japanese, Chinese and Malays are not. Appellants' contention that the state act discriminates arbitrarily against Nakatsuka and other ineligible aliens because of their race and color is without foundation. All persons of whatever color or race who have not declared their intention in good faith to become citizens are prohibited from so owning agricultural lands. Two classes of aliens inevitably result from the naturalization laws—those who may and those who may not become citizens. The rule established by Congress on this subject, in and of itself, furnishes a reasonable basis for classification in a state law withholding from aliens the privilege of land ownership as defined in the act. We agree with the court below (274 Fed. 841, 849) that:

"It is obvious that one who is not a citizen and cannot become one lacks an interest in, and the power to effectually work for the welfare of, the state, and, so lacking, the state may rightfully deny him the right to own and lease real estate within its boundaries. If one incapable of citizenship may lease or own real estate, it is within the realm of possibility that every foot of land within the state might pass to the ownership or possession of noncitizens."

And we think it is clearly within the power of the state to include nondeclarant eligible aliens and ineligible aliens in the same prohibited class. Reasons supporting discrimination against aliens who may but who will not naturalize are obvious.

Truax v. Raich, supra, does not support the appellant's contention. * * *

In the case before us, the thing forbidden is very different. It is not an opportunity to earn a living in common occupations of the community, but it is the privilege of owning or controlling agricultural land within the state. The quality and allegiance of those who own, occupy and use the farm lands within its borders are matters of highest importance and affect the safety and power of the state itself.

The Terraces, who are citizens, have no right safeguarded by the Fourteenth Amendment to lease their land to aliens lawfully forbidden to take or have such lease. The state act is not repugnant to the equal protection clause and does not contravene the Fourteenth Amendment.

The state act, in our opinion, is not in conflict with the treaty between the United States and Japan. * * *

The decree of the District Court is affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS and MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS think there is no justiciable question involved and that the case should have been dismissed on that ground.

MR. JUSTICE SUTHERLAND took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

NOTE.

The constitutional requirement of equal protection of the laws (Fourteenth Amendment) does not require the same treatment to be given everyone regardless of circumstances, conditions or personal qualification. A hospital would not be charged with wrongful discrimination if it gave liquid diet to one patient and roast beef to another. That would depend upon the diseases and weaknesses of the patients. This thought has been applied by the courts in getting at the meaning of the equal protection of laws provision. To give the same privileges to all or to impose the same burdens upon all, regardless of differences of condition, would in fact be denying equal protection. The rich and the poor cannot be taxed equally in amount without the most unjust inequality of burden. The states are permitted to classify persons with reference to privileges and burdens. All persons within a state may be divided into two classes (1) those with color-blind eyes and (2) those whose eyes are not, if the purpose is to determine who may be permitted to drive locomotive engines, because of the use of colors in traffic regulations. So a classification can be made between the educated and the uneducated in determining who may be school teachers, or a state statute may exclude from the practice of medicine all but graduates of approved medical colleges.

The rule is well settled, however, that classification "must always rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is proposed, and can never be made arbitrarily, and without any such basis."[3]

"It must be based on substantial distinctions which make real differences; it must be germane to the purposes of the law."[4]

"Thus the legislature may fix the age at which persons shall be deemed competent to contract for themselves, but no one will claim that competency to contract can be made to depend upon stature or color of the hair."[5]

To what purposes would a classification putting aliens on the one side and citizens on the other be germane? To what purposes would such a distinction bear a reasonable and just relation? Obviously the Supreme Court of the United States does not consider such a classification a just one for the purpose of determining who may pursue any of the common callings.

The Court of Appeals of New York and the Supreme Court of the United States have sustained[6] a New York statute which reads as follows:

"In the construction of public works by the state or a municipality, or by persons contracting with the state or such municipality, only citizens of the United States shall be employed; and in all cases where laborers are employed on any such public works, preference shall be given citizens of the State of New York."

The reasons assigned for these decisions would equally justify exclusion from employment on the public works of a state the citizens of another state, that is, citizens of the United States who have their homes in other states.[7]

The dominant thought in both courts was that the state in contracting for work is like any private contractor entitled to choose its employees.

In one of the opinions it is said, "It must also be evident that nothing in this opinion gives countenance to the view that the government may deny to aliens the right to engage in any private trade or calling."[8]

Two of the New York judges could not restrain themselves from commenting adversely upon the policy of the statute, though that was, as they said, for the legislature to determine.

McCall (1915) 239 U. S. 180, 60 L. ed. 209, though no specific comment is made on it in the Supreme Court's opinion. See the reasoning of Cardozo, J., 214 N. [8] People v. Crane (1915) 214 N. Y. 154, 168, 108 N. E. 427.

It seems to the present writer that a forceful point against holding such a statute constitutional is the discrimination involved between two tax-payers, resident alien and resident citizen. It seems that both should be equally eligible for employment, non-political in its nature, where the work is paid for from a fund contributed to by both. This contention seems not to have been made by counsel.

Of course it is undoubted law that aliens may be denied political rights, the privilege of voting and eligibility to office. It has been said that the equal protection of laws clause was intended to embrace only civil, not political rights.[9] Even from the standpoint of reasonable classification, however, it is apparent that alienage is a just basis for these discriminations. It is also universally considered sound constitutionally to exclude aliens from jury service, which is a sort of public office; and to exclude aliens from the practice of law, lawyers being considered officers of the courts, a quasi-public participation in the administration of the law.[10]

A rather extraordinary decision of the United States Supreme Court should not be overlooked. Mischievous inferences might be drawn from it if not properly understood. It held that resident aliens may be forbidden shooting wild game within the state.[11] It rests partly upon the view that wild game is the common property of the citizens of the state, as is recognized in decisions holding that even citizens of other states[12] may be forbidden to kill or capture it, or subjected to discriminating fees for hunting and fishing licenses; and partly on the idea that the state may forbid the killing or capturing of it absolutely and hence, it is said, may exercise an arbitrary power to permit without any reason one class of persons and deny others, a "special power of the state over the subject-matter."[13]

The last reason was relied upon by state courts in holding valid statutes that made aliens ineligible to sell intoxicating liquor.[14]

This technically logical reasoning, that where a state has power to prohibit without qualification it may handle the matter in a manner that otherwise would be obnoxious to constitutional limitations, has recently received a severe jolt in the Supreme Court. In one line of cases it has been finally repudiated.[15]

It should be noted that the justice who delivered the opinion of the court in the Patsone Case was long the stalwart supporter of the repudiated doctrine. Whether or not the Patsone Case will survive for the narrow point ruled upon, it is highly likely that the Supreme Court of the United States will narrowly restrict its implications.

GASSIES v. BALLON.

1832. United States Supreme Court. 6 Pet. 761.

Error to the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana, by an alien, a citizen of France.

The defendant was described on the record as "now residing in the parish of West Baton Rouge, where the said Pierre Gassies caused himself to be naturalized an American citizen."

The defendant prosecuted this writ of error.

Marshall, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court.

In this case, the court is of opinion that the jurisdiction can be sustained. The defendant in error is alleged in the proceedings to be a citizen of the United States, naturalized in Louisiana, and residing there. This is equivalent to an averment that he is a citizen of that state. A citizen of the United States, residing in any state of the Union, is a citizen of that state. * * *

CITY OF MINNEAPOLIS v. REUM.

1893. Circuit Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit. 56 Fed. 576.

On October 7, 1891, Frederick Reum, the defendant in error, brought this action against the city of Minneapolis, the plaintiff in error, for a personal injury that resulted from its negligence. He recovered judgment, to reverse which this writ of error was sued out. In his complaint he alleged that he was an alien, and a subject of the king of Saxony, and this allegation was denied by the defendant. The evidence disclosed these facts: The plaintiff was born in the kingdom of Saxony in 1859. His father and mother were natives of that kingdom, and the former resided there until he died, in the infancy of the plaintiff. In 1863, after his father's death, the plaintiff and his mother came to the state of Minnesota, where they have since resided. In 1885 he was married, and has since that time owned and occupied a farm in that state. On October 25, 1890, he made a declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the circuit court for the district of Minnesota; but he has never been admitted, or applied to be admitted, to citizenship under the second and third paragraphs of section 2165 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or under any provision of the acts of Congress. The State of Minnesota has conferred upon all foreign subjects resident within its borders who have declared their intention to become citizens the elective franchise, the privilege of holding any office within its gift, and practically all of the privileges of citizenship in the power of that state to confer. In November, 1890, the plaintiff voted for a member of Congress and for state and county officers in Minnesota. At the close of the evidence the defendant moved the court to dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction, on the ground that the evidence failed to establish the allegation that the plaintiff was an alien. The court denied the motion, and this ruling is the supposed error assigned.

SANBORN, CIRCUIT JUDGE, (after stating the facts as above.) In Lanz v. Randall, 4 Dill. 425, Mr. Justice Miller, who was then presiding in the circuit court for the district of Minnesota, held that a state could not make the subject of a foreign government a citizen of the United States, and that a resident of Minnesota who was born a subject of the grand duke of Mecklenburg, had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States many years before he brought his suit, had resided in the State of Minnesota for 15 years, had several times voted at elections held in that state where the constitution of the state authorizes such residents to do so without naturalization, but had never applied to be or been admitted to citizenship under the federal naturalization laws, was still an alien, and a subject of the grand duke of Mecklenburg. This decision has been followed by the courts, and acquiesced in by the profession. It is now vigorously challenged by counsel for plaintiff in error.

Section 2, Art. III, of the Constitution of the United States provides that the judicial power of the nation shall extend to "controversies between a state or the citizens thereof and foreign states, citizens, or subjects;" and the acts of congress of March 3, 1887, 24 Stat. 552, and of August 13, 1888, 25 Stat. 433, confer jurisdiction of all these controversies in cases involving over $2,000 upon the circuit courts. Every person at his birth is presumptively a citizen or subject of the state of his nativity, and where, as in the case at bar, his parents were then both subjects of that state, the presumption is conclusive. To the land of his birth he owes support and allegiance, and from it he is entitled to the civil and political rights and privileges of a citizen or subject. This relation, imposed by birth, is presumed to continue until a change of nationality is proved. Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. 162, 167; Vatt. Law Nat. p. 101; Morse, Nat. 61, 125. A change of nationality cannot be made by the individual at will. Each nation has the right to refuse to grant the rights and privileges of citizenship to all persons not born upon its soil, and, if it determines to admit them to those rights and privileges, it may fix the terms on which they shall be conferred upon them. Naturalization is the admission of a foreign subject or citizen into the political body of a nation, and the bestowal upon him of the quality of a citizen or subject.

The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside." As the plaintiff was born in the kingdom of Saxony, of parents who at the time of his birth were subjects of the king of Saxony, he is not a citizen of the United States unless he has been naturalized therein. The United States, in the exercise of their undoubted right, have prescribed the conditions upon compliance with which an alien may become a citizen of this nation. * * * The plaintiff has complied with none of these terms. He has not even applied to any court to be admitted to citizenship. * * * The conclusive answer to the argument here urged is that the declaration of an intention to enter into a new relation for which parties are qualified does not establish the relation. * * *

A single argument remains to be noticed, and that is that the State of Minnesota has conferred on plaintiff the elective franchise, the right to hold any office in its gift, and, in reality, all the rights and privileges of citizenship in its power to bestow; and therefore it is said he is a citizen of that state, and not a foreign subject, and the federal court has no jurisdiction of this action. It may be conceded that a state may confer on foreign citizens or subjects all the rights and privileges it has the power to bestow, but, when it has done all this, it has not naturalized them. They are foreign citizens or subjects still, within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the jurisdiction of the federal courts over controversies between them and citizens of the states is neither enlarged nor restricted by the acts of the state. The power to naturalize foreign subjects or citizens was one of the powers expressly granted by the states to the national government. By Section 8, Art. 1, of the constitution of the United States, it was provided that "the Congress shall have the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." Congress has exercised this power, established the rule, and expressly declared that foreign-born residents may be naturalized by a compliance with it, and not otherwise. This power, like the power to regulate commerce among the states, was carved out of the general sovereign power held by the states when this nation was formed and granted by the Constitution to the Congress of the United States. It thus vested exclusively in Congress, and no power remained in the states to change or vary the rule of naturalization Congress established, or to authorize any foreign subject to denationalize himself, and become a citizen of the United States, without a compliance with the conditions Congress had prescribed. Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 393, 405; Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 73; Minor v. Happersett, 21 How. 162; Boyd v. Nebraska, 143 U. S. 135, 160, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 375.

In like manner, the states granted to the judiciary of the nation the power to determine a controversy between a state or citizens thereof and foreign states, citizens, or subjects, (Const. U. S. Art. III, Sec. 2,) and Congress conferred that power upon the circuit courts. The extent of the jurisdiction of those courts is measured by the Constitution and the acts of Congress. A foreign-born resident, who has not been naturalized according to the acts of Congress, is not a "citizen" of the United States or of a state, within the definition given by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, but remains a foreign subject or citizen; and any controversy between him and a citizen of a state which involves a sufficient amount is thus clearly within the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, under any fair construction of the Constitution and laws of the United States. The jurisdiction thus conferred it is not in the power of any state, by its legislative or other action, to take away, restrict, or enlarge, and the action of the state of Minnesota regarding the citizenship of the plaintiff was not material in this case. Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. 300, 328; Cowles v. Mercer Co., 7 Wall. 118; Railway Co. v. Whitton, 13 Wall. 270, 286; Phelps v. Oaks, 117 U. S. 236, 239, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 714; O'Connell v. Reed, 56 Fed. Rep. 531.

The result is that the power granted to Congress by Article I, Sec. 8, of the Constitution of the United States, to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, is exclusive; and the naturalization laws enacted by Congress in the exercise of this power constitute the only rule by which a foreign subject may become a citizen of the United States or of a state, within the meaning of the federal Constitution and laws. It is not in the power of a state to denationalize a foreign subject who has not complied with the federal naturalization laws, and constitute him a citizen of the United States or of a state, so as to deprive the federal courts of jurisdiction over a controversy between him and a citizen of a state, conferred upon them by Article III, Sec. 2, of the Constitution of the United States, and the acts of Congress. * * *

The court below was right in denying the motion to dismiss this action for want of jurisdiction, and the judgment below is affirmed, with costs.

GILBERT v. DAVID.

1915. United States Supreme Court. 235 U. S. 561.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court.

This case is here upon writ of error and certificate presenting the question of jurisdiction of the District Court. It comes under Sec. 238 of the judicial code, and presents to this court the question of jurisdiction only. The suit was begun on November 5, 1904, in the United States Circuit Court for the District of Connecticut. * * * The object of the suit was to recover for alleged breaches of a certain indemnity contract set forth in the complaint. * * * After the taking effect of the Judicial Code on January 1, 1912, the case was transferred to the District Court of the United States for the District of Connecticut. On August 26, 1912, a jury was impanelled, and the case came on for trial. The court directed that the trial should proceed upon the question of jurisdiction. Thereupon the parties proceeded to offer testimony upon the question of plaintiff's residence. At the conclusion of this testimony, the court found that the plaintiff and defendants were citizens of the State of Connecticut at the time the action was begun, and accordingly dismissed the suit upon the sole ground of want of jurisdiction, and ordered the jury discharged from further consideration of the case. * * *

It is also insisted that the court erred in itself considering the testimony and in not submitting the issue to the jury. But while the court might have submitted the question to the jury, it was not bound to do so, the parties having adduced their testimony, pro and con, it was the privilege of the court, if it saw fit, to dispose of the issue upon the testimony which was fully heard upon that subject. Wetmore v. Rymer, 169 U. S. 115. * * *

As the record brings up the testimony upon which the court below decided the question, it becomes the duty of this court to consider it and determine whether the court rightly found that the plaintiff at the beginning of the suit was not a citizen of the State of Michigan. Wetmore v. Rymer, supra. If the plaintiff was domiciled in the State of Michigan when this suit was begun, he was a citizen of that state within the meaning of the Judicial Code. Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U. S. 315. Williamson v. Osenton, 232 U. S. 619, 624. In this case it clearly appears that for some years prior to 1890 the plaintiff lived in Menominee, in the State of Michigan. He had there a home, and exercised the ordinary duties and privileges of citizenship. In February, 1890, his uncle died in Connecticut, and the plaintiff immediately went to Danbury, in that state, where he remained practically all the time until his death in 1911.

The question is, Had he lost his domicile in Michigan and acquired one in Connecticut, so that he was at the beginning of the suit in 1904 in reality a citizen of the last-mentioned State?

This matter of domicile has been often before this court, and was last under consideration in the case of Williamson v. Osenton, 232 U. S. 619, supra. In that case the definition of domicile, as defined by Mr. Dicey, in his book on "Conflict of Laws," 2d ed., 111, is cited with approval. There change of domicile is said to arise where there is a change of abode and "the absence of any present intention to not reside permanently or indefinitely in the new abode." Or, as Judge Story puts it in his work on "Conflict of Laws," 7th ed., 346, page 41, "If a person has actually removed to another place, with an intention of remaining there for an indefinite time, and as a place of fixed present domicile, it is to be deemed his place of domicile, notwithstanding he may entertain a floating intention to return at some future period." "The requisite animus is the present intention of permanent or indefinite residence in a given place or country, or, negatively expressed, the absence of any present intention of not residing there permanently or indefinitely." Price v. Price, 156 Pa. St. 617, 626.

Applying these definitions to the conduct of plaintiff, we have no doubt that the court was right in holding that he had acquired a new domicile in the State of Connecticut. He removed there with his family, and occupied a house to which he held the title. He owned other real estate in Connecticut, inherited from his uncle. He took a letter from his church in Michigan to a church in Danbury, Connecticut. For about ten years he was not back in Michigan, except for a short time, and then for a temporary purpose. The Michigan homestead and much of the furniture used there were sold upon the removal to Connecticut. For more than ten years he resided continuously with his family in the same house in Danbury, Connecticut. While the plaintiff did not vote in Connecticut, as far as the record shows, it is in evidence that he declared to another his intention of becoming a voter there. To some witnesses he declared his purpose to reside in Connecticut. As against this testimony, it appears that he left his desk with his brother-in-law in Michigan, which he declared was for the purpose of "holding his residence there." To some witnesses he declared his intention to live in Michigan and expressed his preference for that state as a dwelling-place. He continued to pay membership dues to orders to which he belonged in Michigan.

It is apparent from all the testimony that the plaintiff may have had, and probably did have, some floating intention of returning to Michigan after the determination of certain litigation and the disposition of his property in Connecticut should he succeed in disposing of it for what he considered it worth. But as we have seen, a floating intention of that kind was not enough to prevent the new place, under the circumstances shown, from becoming his domicile. It was his place of abode which he had no present intention of changing, that is the essence of domicile.

We find no error in the conclusion of the District Court upon the question of jurisdiction, and its judgment is therefore

Affirmed.

HAMMERSTEIN v. LYNE.

1912. District Court, W. D. Missouri, W. D. 200 Fed. 165.

[In equity to restrain the defendant from appearing in musical and operatic productions in violation of a contract to perform exclusively under the management of the plaintiff. The bill alleged that plaintiff was a citizen of the United States and resided in New York, and that defendant was a citizen of the United States and resident of the Western Division of the Western District of Missouri.]

Van Valkenburgh, District Judge: From these proofs it appears that the defendant was born at Slater, in this division and district of Missouri; that she subsequently lived in Kansas City with her parents; that on or about August 12, 1907, she disposed of all her property and effects, except such as she took with her, and left Kansas City, with her mother, for Paris, France, for the purpose of completing her musical education and entering upon an operatic career; that she remained in Paris three years, revisiting this country in August, 1910, during which time she sang under the management of the complainant in New York and Philadelphia, and made a brief visit to her grandparents in Kansas City; that she returned to Paris, where she remained until the 20th of September of the same year, and then she went to London and took up her residence there, where she still lives, her address being No. 1 Hay Hill, Berkely Square; that she remained there continuously until September 12, 1912, when she sailed for the United States for the purpose of giving the concert in Kansas City referred to in the bill of complaint. On the occasion of her first visit, she signed, at the port of New York, a nonresident's declaration and entry, declaring herself to be a resident of Paris. On her second visit she signed a similar nonresident's declaration and entry, declaring herself to be a resident of England. Her mother has been with her continuously, and her father now resides in Pennsylvania. None of the family have either home or property in the state of Missouri, but have relatives living in Kansas City. The defendant declares that, when she left Kansas City in August, 1907, she did so with the purpose of changing her domicile, and with no intention of returning here to live. On the contrary, it was her intention to take up a residence abroad in the pursuit of her chosen profession; that she first established a residence in Paris, and afterwards her present residence in London, with the intention of remaining there for an indefinite period, and that such should be her principal and permanent residence; that she has not now, and has not had since her departure, any intention of returning to Missouri. She has not, however, taken any steps to alter her status as a national citizen of this country, nor is it her intention so to do. On the contrary, she explicitly asserts that she is, and considers herself to be, a citizen of the United States. Under this state of facts, defendant submits that this court has no jurisdiction over her in this case. The complainant contends that she is still a citizen of the state of Missouri, and a resident of the Western division of the Western district thereof.

The Constitution of the United States (Article III, Sec. 2) provides: "The judicial power shall extend to * * * controversies * * * between citizens of different states * * *."

Defining the jurisdiction of the District Courts, the Judicial Code (chapter 2, sec. 24) provides:

"The District Courts shall have original jurisdiction as follows: First. Of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, brought by the United States, or by any officer thereof authorized by law to sue, or between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants from different states; or, where the matter in controversy exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of three thousand dollars, and (a) arises under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, or (b) is between citizens of different states, or (c) is between citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens or subjects."

The jurisdiction of this court must exist, if at all, because the case at bar belongs to one of the classes named, and more specifically to "b" or "c" above described. The complainant is admitted to be a citizen of the state of New York. Then, to confer jurisdiction upon this court, in any view, the defendant must be a citizen of some other state, or she must be an alien. It is not and cannot be claimed that she is a citizen of any state other than Missouri.

It is first necessary to inquire whether, upon the testimony before us, the defendant can be held to be a citizen of any state, and in determining this we must remember that the citizenship with which we are now concerned is that contemplated by the Judiciary Act. Citizenship in this country is a dual one—national and state—and the distinction between national and state citizenship has been frequently pointed out.

The first section of the fourteenth article of amendment to the federal Constitution provides that:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside."

Concerning the definition of citizenship therein contained, the Supreme Court of the United States has said: "The distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a state is clearly recognized and established. Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a state, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the state to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union. It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States, and a citizenship of a state, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual." Slaughter-house Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 73, 74, 21 L. ed. 394.

In Cooper v. Galbraith, No. 3193, 6 Fed. Cas. 473, Mr. Justice Washington said: "Citizenship, when spoken of in the Constitution in reference to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, means nothing more than residence. The citizens of each state are entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states; but to give jurisdiction to the courts of the United States, the suit must be between citizens residing in different states, or between a citizen and an alien."

Of course, the residence here spoken of means permanent residence animo manendi. This appears from his language used in Butler v. Farnsworth, No. 2240, 4 Fed. Cas. 902, wherein he says: "In order to give jurisdiction to the courts of the United States, the citizenship of the party must be founded on a change of domicile and permanent residence in the state to which he may have removed from another state. Mere residence is prima facie evidence of such change, although, when it is explained and shown to have been for temporary purposes, the presumption is destroyed."

* * * What constitutes citizenship in another state, in the sense of the Constitution and Judiciary Act, with reference to the jurisdiction of the federal courts was discussed by Circuit Justice Marshall in Prentiss v. Barton, No. 11,384, 19 Fed. Cas. 1276. He said: "In the sense of the Constitution and of the Judiciary Act, he who is incorporated into the body of the state, by permanent residence therein, so as to become a member of it, must be a citizen of that state, although born in another. Or, to use the phrase more familiar in the books, a citizen of the United States must be a citizen of that state in which his domicile is placed."

He points out that state citizenship cannot depend entirely upon birth; that the rights so conferred, as respects suits in the courts of the United States, may be changed by a change of residence.

In Prentiss v. Brennan, No. 11,385, 19 Fed. Cas. 1278, Mr. Justice Nelson says: "A person may be a citizen of the United States, and not a citizen of any particular state. This is the condition of citizens residing in the District of Columbia, and in the territories of the United States, or who have taken up a residence abroad, and others that might be mentioned. A fixed or permanent residence or domicile in a state is essential to the character of citizenship that will bring the case within the jurisdiction of the federal courts."

It is apparent that state citizenship, under our system and as used in the Constitution and Judiciary Act, is essentially different from national citizenship. The latter is defined to be the relation of allegiance and protection between individuals and their country. It is the antithesis of alienage, and involves a national right or condition. As was said in Lynch v. Clarke, 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 583: "It pertains to the confederated sovereignty—the United States—and not to the individual states."

A citizen of the United States owes his primary and highest allegiance to the general government, and not to his particular state. On the other hand, state citizenship is the practical equivalent of domicile.

"That place is properly the domicile of a person in which he has voluntarily fixed his abode, not for a mere special or temporary purpose, but with a present intention of making it his permanent home." 14 Cyc. 833.

Generally speaking, and especially with reference to the Judiciary Act, it must involve national citizenship. Although a state may, by its Constitution and laws, confer certain privileges of citizenship on foreign subjects, it cannot make them citizens within the meaning of this act. City of Minneapolis v. Reum, 6 C. C. A. 31, 56 Fed. 576. Nevertheless, such state citizenship or domicile is not at all essential to national citizenship.

It would appear conclusively from the facts presented, from the uniform views expressed by the courts, and from the definitions universally accepted, that the defendant in this case has established a domicile in London, England. She lives there. She declares it to be her home, and that it is her intention to remain there indefinitely. She has abandoned her former home in Missouri for an indefinite and uncertain period, with no present intention of returning. Her present visit is a temporary one. It is her purpose to return to England, and she would have executed that purpose before this, had it not been for the pendency of this suit. Ennis et al. v. Smith et al., 14 How. 400-423, 14 L. Ed. 472; Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U. S. 315-328, 9 Sup. Ct. 289, 32 L. Ed. 690; 14 Cyc. 833. Under such circumstances she is not and cannot be a citizen of Missouri within the meaning of the Judiciary Act conferring jurisdiction upon the federal courts of controversies between citizens of different states.

Is she, then, a citizen of the United States, or is she an alien? Because, if the latter, she can be sued in this court, if found in this jurisdiction, by the complainant, who is a citizen of the state of New York. It being admitted that she is by birth a citizen of the United States, the burden is upon the complainant to show that she has renounced or otherwise abandoned or lost that citizenship. She herself asserts it. What must we conclude from the facts appearing in testimony?

There has been no act of naturalization, nor any step in that direction. If she has lost her citizenship at all, it must be through some act of expatriation. What is essential to bring about that result? It will hardly be contended that mere change of residence, even with intention never to return, can have that effect. Miller, Circuit Justice, in Lanz v. Randall, No. 8,080, 14 Fed. Cas. 1131. * * * We have seen that citizens and subjects of one country may acquire a domicile in a foreign country without such forfeiture. There has been in this case no such act, coupled with intention, as would operate to convert this defendant into an alien within the meaning of the law now under consideration.

It follows that, inasmuch as Miss Lyne is neither a citizen of a state, nor an alien, within the meaning of the Judiciary Act, this court is without original jurisdiction to entertain this action. That this may have the practical effect of denying complainant the right to litigate the differences between himself and the defendant in any federal court cannot alter the situation. * * *

The plea to the jurisdiction must be sustained; and it is so ordered.

PANNILL v. ROANOKE TIMES CO.

1918. District Court, W. D. Virginia. 252 Fed. 910.

At law. Actions by one Pannill and by one Jerrick against the Roanoke Times Company, consolidated for trial. Action by plaintiff Pannill dismissed for want of jurisdiction, and plaintiff Jerrick permitted to take a voluntary nonsuit.

McDowell, District Judge: 1. These actions for libel were consolidated for trial, without objection from any party, as both cases grew out of the same publication. The first case was, after some of the plaintiffs' evidence had been heard, dismissed without prejudice for want of diversity of citizenship, which ruling was excepted to by both Pannill and the defendant. The defendant is a corporation created by the state of Virginia. The plaintiff was born in West Virginia, and in his early manhood went to Oklahoma, where he bought a farm near Lawton, and was living there with the intention of residing in that state permanently. In 1910 he met with an accident which resulted in almost entire paralysis. His own means were shortly exhausted in efforts to be cured, and as he was and had been before his injury a member of the Lawton local lodge of Elks, he applied through his local lodge to the Grand Lodge of Elks for assistance. It developed that the Grand Lodge had no fund applicable to the relief of any but superannuated members, and Pannill is even now apparently under 40 years of age. He then undertook to visit a number of the local lodges of Elks in several of the Western states in an effort to have them send delegates to the next Grand Lodge convention instructed to have a fund created for the assistance of members in his condition. In undertaking this journey, according to his own evidence, Pannill left Oklahoma with no intention of returning to that state, but with the expectation of living in California if he succeeded in his endeavor. The result of this campaign was temporarily successful. The Grand Lodge agreed to pay a certain sum monthly for Pannill's support, on condition that the Lawton lodge would also pay a specified part of the expense. This arrangement having been made, Pannill went to California, intending to stay there, as he said, "for the remainder of my life."

Some few months after Pannill had established himself in California, the Lawton lodge found itself unable to raise from its few members the share of the expenses it had undertaken to contribute, which resulted in a refusal by the Grand Lodge to continue its contributions. Thereupon Pannill left California and commenced a tour of the United States in an effort to induce the Elks to establish a fund for his support without reference to contributions from the Lawton lodge, which had surrendered its charter. Pannill testified that when he left California he had the intention of never returning to that state at any time, and all the facts adduced substantiated this statement. His intention was, if successful in his quest, to take up his abode in Florida or Texas. He had no plans based on the possibility of entire want of success of this last campaign among the Elks. He left Calfornia in 1915, and had been traveling since then, making short stops in many cities and towns, and had covered about 40,000 miles. The expenses of Pannill and his nurse had been mainly obtained from local lodges of Elks, from individual members of that order, and in some cases transportation had been obtained from other charitable organizations. The plaintiffs had come to Virginia a few weeks before these actions were instituted, not intending to stay permanently, but only to stay long enough to institute, and possibly to bring to a conclusion, a suit by Pannill against the Grand Lodge on what he conceives to be a valid cause of action against that body.

As has been said, Pannill's case was ordered dismissed for want of jurisdiction. As the term at which the order of dismissal was made has not been brought to an end, and as the question of Pannill's citizenship is to me novel and rather perplexing, I have taken advantage of the first opportunity to give it further consideration.

(a) It would seem that Pannill cannot be regarded as a citizen of Virginia. He was at the institution of this action residing in this state, but with no intention of remaining here permanently. His intent was and is to stay here only long enough to finish the business which brought him here and to then go to some other state. As Virginia is not the state of his birth, as his residence here is not animo manendi, I cannot satisfactorily class him as a citizen of this state. It is true that he is not here with intent to return to either California or to West Virginia, and he intends to stay here for a somewhat indefinite time. But the fact which is necessary to convert mere residence into citizenship is the intent to remain permanently.

(b) It is, I take it, entirely settled that a domicile of choice, once acquired, is not lost until a new domicile has been acquired. Story, Conflict of Laws (2d ed.) Sec. 47; Wharton, Conflict of Laws (2d ed.) Sec. 55; 14 Cyc. 851; Mitchell v. United States, 21 Wall. 350, 352, 353; Desmare v. United States, 93 U. S. 605, 610.

If ascertaining the domicile of a citizen of the United States always ascertains his state citizenship, we have arrived at a simple solution of the question before us. However, domicile and citizenship are, as I think, not always synonymous. Where domicile means home, where it describes the state in which a citizen of the United States has his home, or what he regards as his home, and to which he intends to return, if absent therefrom, it is usually, if not always, equivalent to state citizenship. But when (no new domicile in fact having been acquired) domicile exists only by legal fiction, and describes the state in which a citizen of the United States once had his home, but to which he intends never to return, I cannot see that domicile and citizenship are synonymous. It has in some cases been said that domicile is synonymous with state citizenship. But in every case in which this has been said, so far as I have found, the court had in mind a domicile, to which the party, if absent therefrom, intended ultimately to return. In Williamson v. Osenton, 232 U. S. 619, 624, the agreed facts, as construed by the court, showed an actual domicile in Virginia—a residence with intent to remain permanently. In Prentiss v. Barton, Fed. Cas. No. 11384, Chief Justice Marshall said:

"In the sense of the Constitution and of the Judicial Act, he who is incorporated into the body of the state, by permanent residence therein, so as to become a member of it, must be a citizen of that state, although born in another. Or, to use the phrase more familiar in the books, a citizen of the United States must be a citizen of that state in which his domicile is placed."

But here, also, the court was dealing with a case of actual domicile and an intent to return to it. In Collins v. City of Ashland (D. C.) 112 Fed. 175, 177, it is said that "citizenship depends upon domicile." But in that case the evidence showed a domicile in Ohio, a merely temporary residence in Kentucky, and a clear intent to return to Ohio. In Harding v. Standard Oil Co. (C. C.) 182 Fed. 421, 426, it is said that domicile is usually coextensive in meaning with citizenship; but in this case also (pages 428 and 430) the court finds that the plaintiff, after his departure from Illinois, always had the intention to return to that state, and consequently the case is not one in which, as in the case at bar, the departure from the state of domicile was with intent never to return there. In Hammerstein v. Lyne (D. C.) 200 Fed. 165, 170, it is said that state citizenship is the practical equivalent of domicile. But here again the court had in view an actual domicile animo revertendi.

It must be borne in mind that the grant of jurisdiction to the federal courts is not of controversies between citizens of the United States domiciled in different states, but of controversies between citizens of different states. Beyond any doubt a question of domicile (in fact) is often determinative of the question of citizenship (Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U. S. 315, 328); but it is a very different thing to assert that a mere theoretical domicile, existing with intent never to return to it, is the same thing as citizenship. In the case before us the plaintiff at the institution of the suit did not reside in California, he had no place of abode there, and he intended never to return there. Assuredly it is very difficult to reconcile any theory of citizenship or any definition of the word "citizen" with such facts. Citizenship implies membership in a political society, the relation of allegiance and protection, identification with the state, and a participation in its functions. While a temporary absence may suspend the relation between a state and its citizen, the latter's identification with the former remains because of his intention to return. If A, a citizen of California, sells his home and with his family takes up his residence in Virginia, for a temporary purpose, intending to return to California, he undoubtedly retains his domicile and citizenship in California; and his case may bear close resemblance to the case at bar. A may also be said to have only a theoretical domicile in California. But the essential difference between A's status and that of Pannill is that A intends to return to California and Pannill does not; California is A's home, and it is not in any sense Pannill's home. A has only temporarily surrendered his membership in the political society of California and his participation in its functions; while Pannill has permanently ended his connection with that state.

It is true that a citizen of the United States, who is a mere homeless wanderer and not a citizen of any state, would encounter the same risk of local prejudice in the state courts that would be encountered by citizens of other states. But so would citizens of the District of Columbia. The latter are not included in the grant of jurisdiction, and the most satisfactory conclusion I can reach is that Pannill is not included. In both cases the exclusion is due simply to the wording of the grant. Its language is not broad enough to include a citizen of the District of Columbia or a citizen of the United States who is not a citizen of any state. In Prentiss v. Brennan, 2 Blatchf. 162, 19 Fed. Cas. 1279, 1280, Mr. Justice Nelson said:

"A person may be a citizen of the United States, and not a citizen of any particular state. This is the condition of citizens residing in the District of Columbia, and in the territories of the United States, or who have taken up a residence abroad, and others that might be mentioned. A fixed and permanent residence or domicile in a state is essential to the character of citizenship that will bring the case within the jurisdiction of the federal courts."

As has been said, citizens of the District of Columbia were not granted the privilege of litigating in the federal courts on the ground of diversity of citizenship. Possibly no better reason for this fact exists than that such citizens were not thought of when the judiciary article of the federal Constitution was drafted. It is even more probable that citizens of the United States, occupying the very unusual status that Pannill does, were also not thought of; but in any event a citizen of the United States, who is not a citizen of any state, is not within the language of the Constitution. And to my mind Pannill is not a citizen of California, simply because he never intends to return to that state, and has finally severed his connection with that state. The theoretical domicile which is equivalent to state citizenship is always one which exists animo revertendi. The theoretical domicile which clings to a homeless wanderer, who never intends to return, has its uses in deciding rights of succession to property, in respect to taxation and to the administration of pauper laws, but is not, I think, equivalent to citizenship in the sense in which the word "citizen" is used in the Judiciary Act. While domicile, in some sense, may not be lost by mere departure with intent not to return, state citizenship is thus lost. In other words, where the word "domicile" is used as meaning home, where absence from domicile is animo revertendi, domicile may be equivalent to state citizenship; but where domicile exists merely by legal fiction, and absence is accompanied by intent never to return to the state of domicile, the word is not synonymous with citizenship.

Section 5.—Interstate Privileges and Immunities of State Citizens. Art. IV, Sec. 2, Cl. 1.

BARRELL v. BENJAMIN.

1819. Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. 15 Mass. 354.

This was an action of assumpsit; and while on trial before the jury, the question arose whether this court had jurisdiction of the suit. In order to have this question settled by the whole court, the parties agreed on the following statement of facts:—

Barrell, the plaintiff, is a native citizen of the United States, having been born within this commonwealth but at the time when this action was commenced, and long before, he lived in the town of Norwich in the State of Connecticut.

The defendant, Benjamin, is a native citizen of the State of Connecticut; but more than twenty years past has had, and still has, his domicile in Demerara; although when this action was commenced, he ~~was in Boston~~, on his way to Demerara; and the plaintiff's writ was served by arresting his body.

The plaintiff and defendant were partners in a house in Demerara, jointly carrying on commerce there as partners for many years before the year 1807, when their copartnership was dissolved. This action was commenced and prosecuted to recover the balance supposed to be due, from the defendant to the plaintiff, on settlement of their accounts. When the British took possession of the colony of Demerara, in the year 1803, the said Benjamin took an oath of allegiance to that government.

If the court should be of opinion that they ought to hold jurisdiction of the action, it was agreed that the defendant should be holden to render his account, and that auditors should be appointed to audit the same. But if the court should be of a different opinion, the plaintiff was to become nonsuit, and the defendant recover his costs.

Hubbard, for the defendant, contended that the plaintiff was to be considered merely as a foreigner, having no other rights than any alien friend, anything in the Constitution or laws of the United States notwithstanding. The defendant is also a foreigner and in the event of a war between the United States and Great Britain he would be an alien enemy. Both parties being foreigners, their being accidentally in this commonwealth cannot give jurisdiction to its courts, who were not appointed to determine controversies in which its citizens have no interest.

The court cannot take cognizance of the contract attempted to be enforced in this action, which was not made here, nor to be executed or performed here, nor with reference to our laws. If the court should entertain jurisdiction of the cause, it must be tried and determined by the law of the country where it was made, and where it was to be executed. * * *

PARKER, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

It will be found upon examining the Constitution of the United States that a controversy between two foreigners who are private subjects is not enumerated as within the judicial power of the United States.

But the jurisdiction of this court, as a court of common law, is unlimited; and all cases cognizable by any of the courts of common law in England are cognizable here.

Personal contracts are said to have no situs or locality but follow the person of the debtor wherever he may go and there seems to be no good reason why courts of any country may not lend their aid to enforce such contracts, especially since it is a well-known principle that, in construing such contracts, the law of the place where they are made will be administered. So that the objection made in this case of the possible difference between the laws of Demerara and this commonwealth can have no influence on the question.

It is true that the debtor may be put to inconvenience by being obliged to answer in a foreign country. But the creditor may also be put to inconvenience if he should be denied the privilege of suing in a foreign court for the debtor may withdraw his person and effects from the place of his business and if he cannot be pursued may defraud his creditor of his due.

It seems, however, to be admitted in the argument, that if the defendant resided here there would be no objection to the action, the complaint being that he was arrested within this state when here only for the purpose of embarking for Demerara. But we see no way of upholding the distinction and there is nothing to be found in the books to support it. A debtor coming here merely for the purpose of embarking may be detained several months before he procures a passage; he may have all his effects about him; and he may never return to the place where he transacted his business. If the creditor cannot take him here, he may lose his chance of securing his debt. On the score of inconvenience there is nothing in favor of the defendant's argument.

But, for the decision of this particular case, we need not go into any general reasoning. The plaintiff is a citizen of the United States, having his domicile in Connecticut. By the second section of the Fourth Article of the Constitution of the United States, it is provided that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." Since the adoption of the Constitution, the citizens of Connecticut, or any other state in the Union, cannot be considered as foreigners; and indeed are not so considered practically in any courts of law. Citizens of different states may change their domicile from one state to another and enjoy all the privileges of citizenship wherever they may go.

It will be admitted that a citizen of Massachusetts has the privilege to sue any foreigner who may come within this state, whether he come to embark for a foreign country, or to reside here for the purposes of business. If so, a citizen of Connecticut has the same privilege secured to him by the Constitution and arguments, which might be plausible if used against a foreigner, cannot avail against a plaintiff who has none of the disabilities of a foreigner attending him.

According to the agreement of the parties, there must be judgment that the defendant account and auditors must be appointed.[1]

In a few instances the refusal to try suits brought by nonresident plaintiffs (though in the particular case the plaintiff is a nonresident who is a citizen of another state) is justified on the ground that discrimination favoring all residents as against all nonresidents is not in fact a discrimination against citizens of other states, see infra, p. 467, n. 7. Robinson v. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. (1889) 112 N. Y. 315, 19 N. E. 625, 2 L. R. A. 636; Loftus v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1923) 107 Ohio St. 352, 140 N. The Supreme Court of the United States has not decided the question though there are broad dicta such as: "This [Article IV, Sec. 2, Cl. 1] secures citizens of one state the right to resort to the courts of another, equally with the citizens of the latter state; but where the citizens of the latter states are not given a process for reaching foreign corporations, it is not apparent how noncitizens can claim it."—Taft, C. J., in Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Clarendon Boat Oar Co. (1922) 257 U. S. 533, 535, 66 L. ed. 354.

"The right to sue and defend in the courts is the alternative of force. In an organized society it is the right conservative of all other rights, and lies at the foundation of orderly government. It is one of the highest and most essential privileges of citizenship, and must be allowed by each state to the citizens of all other states to the precise extent that it is allowed to its own citizens."—Moody, J., in Chambers v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. (1907) 207 U. S. 142, 148, 52 L. ed. 143. See also Blake v. McClung, infra, at p. 465.

Distinguish the above cases from those in which an alien or a foreign corporation is plaintiff (neither of which is included within Art. IV, § 2, Cl. 1) and courts though having jurisdiction also have a discretion, which they sometimes exercise, to decline to entertain suits, more commonly where the defendant is a nonresident and the cause of action has arisen outside the state. That the action is transitory does not preclude denial in such cases. Distinguish also non-transitory causes of action arising outside the state which the courts of a state ordinarily refuse to try even where a citizen of the state is plaintiff. The situations referred to in this paragraph turn on so-called comity and are discussed in courses and treatises on Conflict of Laws.

of presenting the petition, were confined in a certain house in Carlisle Street in that city. * * *

I understand the effect of these statements to be that Mrs. Lemmon, being the owner of these slaves, desired to take them from her residence in Norfolk to the State of Texas; and, as a means of effecting that purpose, she embarked, in the steamship mentioned, for New York, with a view to secure a passage from thence to her place of destination. As nothing is said of any stress of weather, and no marine casualty is mentioned, the necessity of landing, which is spoken of, refers, no doubt, to the exigency of that mode of prosecuting her journey. If the ship in which she arrived was not bound for the Gulf of Mexico, she would be under the necessity of landing at New York to re-embark in some other vessel sailing for that part of the United States; and this, I suppose, is what it was intended to state. The necessity or accident which is mentioned as having compelled her to embark at Norfolk in the "City of Richmond," is understood to refer to some circumstance which prevented her making a direct voyage from Virginia to Texas. The question to be decided is whether the bringing the slaves into this state under these circumstances entitled them to their freedom.

The intention, and the effect, of the statutes of this state bearing upon the point are very plain and unequivocal. [The revised statutes of 1830 as amended in 1841 read:] "§ 1. No person held as a slave shall be imported, introduced or brought into this state on any pretense whatsoever, * * *. Every such person shall be free. Every person held as a slave who hath been introduced or brought in this state contrary to the laws in force at the time, shall be free."

* * * If, therefore, the legislature had the constitutional power to enact this statute, the law of the state precisely meets the case of the persons who were brought before the judge on the writ of habeas corpus, and his order discharging them from constraint was unquestionably correct. Every sovereign State has a right to determine by its laws the condition of all persons who may at any time be within its jurisdiction; to exclude therefrom those whose introduction would contravene its policy, or to declare the conditions upon which they may be received, and what subordination or restraint may lawfully be allowed by one class or description of persons over another. Each State has, moreover, the right to enact such rules as it may see fit respecting the title to property, and to declare what subjects shall, within the State, possess the attributes of property, and what shall be incapable of a proprietary right. These powers may of course be variously limited or modified by its own constitutional or fundamental laws; but independently of such restraints (and none are alleged to exist affecting this case) the legislative authority of the State over these subjects is without limit or control, except so far as the State has voluntarily abridged her jurisdiction by arrangements with other States. There are, it is true, many cases where the conditions impressed upon persons and property by the laws of other friendly States may and ought to be recognized within our own jurisdiction. These are defined, in the absence of express legislation, by the general assent and by the practice and usage of civilized countries, and being considered as incorporated into the municipal law, are freely administered by the courts. They are not, however, thus allowed on account of any supposed power residing in another State to enact laws which should be binding on our tribunals, but from the presumed assent of the law-making power to abide by the usages of other civilized States. Hence it follows that where the legislature of the State, in which a right or privilege is claimed on the ground of comity, has by its laws spoken upon the subject of the alleged right, the tribunals are not at liberty to search for the rule of decision among the doctrines of international comity, but are bound to adopt the directions laid down by the political government of their own State. We have not, therefore, considered it necessary to inquire whether by the law of nations, a country where negro slavery is established has generally a right to claim of a neighboring State, in which it is not allowed, the right to have that species of property recognized and protected in the course of a lawful journey taken by the owner through the last-mentioned country, as would undoubtedly be the case with a subject recognized as property everywhere; and it is proper to say that the counsel for the appellant has not urged that principle in support of the claim of Mrs. Lemmon.

What has been said as to the right of a sovereign State to determine the status of persons within its jurisdiction applies to the states of this Union, except as it has been modified or restrained by the Constitution of the United States. Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Pet. 419; Moore v. The People of Illinois, 14 How. 13; City of New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 131, 139. There are undoubtedly reasons, independently of the provisions of the federal Constitution, for conciliatory legislation on the part of the several states, towards the polity, institutions and interests of each other, of a much more persuasive character than those which prevail even between the most friendly States unconnected by any political union; but these are addressed exclusively to the political power of the respective states * * *. The provision respecting the return of fugitives from service [Art. IV, Sec. 2, Cl. 3] * * * declares that no person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, etc. * * * But the provision of the Constitution extended no further than the case of fugitives. * * * It has been decided that the fugitive clause does not extend beyond the case of the actual escape of a slave from one state to another. Ex parte Simmons, 4 Wash. C. C. R. 396. But the provision is plainly so limited by its own language.

The Constitution declares that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states. Art. IV, § 2. No provision in that instrument has so strongly tended to constitute the citizens of the United States one people as this. Its influence in that direction cannot be fully estimated without a consideration of what would have been the condition of the people if it or some similar provision had not been inserted. Prior to the adoption of the Articles of Confederation, the British colonies on this continent had no political connection, except that they were severally dependencies of the British crown. Their relation to each other was the same which they respectively bore to the other English colonies, whether on this continent or in Europe or Asia. When, in consequence of the Revolution, they severally became independent and sovereign states, the citizens of each state would have been under all the disabilities of alienage in every other, but for a provision in the compacts into which they entered whereby that consequence was avoided. The articles adopted during the Revolution formed essentially a league for mutual protection against external force; but in passing them it was felt to be necessary to secure a community of intercourse which would not necessarily obtain even among closely allied states. This was effected by the fourth article of that instrument, which declared that the free inhabitants of each of the states (paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted) should be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several states, and that the people of each state should have free ingress and egress to and from any other state, and should enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof, respectively. The Constitution organized a still more intimate union, constituting the states, for all external purposes and for certain enumerated domestic objects, a single nation; but still the principle of state sovereignty was retained as to all subjects, except such as were embraced in the delegations of power to the general government or prohibited to the states. The social status of the people, and their personal and relative rights as respects each other, the definition and arrangements of property, were among the reserved powers of the states. The provision conferring rights of citizenship upon the citizens of every state in every other state, was inserted substantially as it stood in the Articles of Confederation. The question now to be considered is, how far the state jurisdiction over the subjects just mentioned is restricted by the provision we are considering; or, to come at once to the precise point in controversy, whether it obliges the state governments to recognize, in any way, within their own jurisdiction, the property in slaves which the citizens of states in which slavery prevails may lawfully claim within their own states —beyond the case of fugitive slaves. The language is that they shall have the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states. In my opinion the meaning is, that in a given state, every citizen of every other state shall have the same privileges and immunities—that is, the same rights—which the citizens of that state possess. In the first place, they are not to be subjected to any of the disabilities of alienage. They can hold property by the same titles by which every other citizen may hold it, and by no other. Again, any discriminating legislation which should place them in a worse situation than a proper citizen of the particular state would be unlawful. * * * But where the laws of the several states differ, a citizen of one state asserting rights in another, must claim them according to the laws of the last-mentioned state, not according to those which obtain in his own.

The position that a citizen carries with him, into every state into which he may go, the legal institutions of the one in which he was born, cannot be supported. A very little reflection will show the fallacy of the idea. Our laws declare contracts depending upon games of chance or skill, lotteries, wagering policies of insurance, bargains for more than 7 per cent per annum of interest, and many others, void. In other states such contracts, or some of them, may be lawful. But no one would contend that if made within this state by a citizen of another state where they would have been lawful, they would be enforced in our courts. Certain of them, if made in another state and in conformity with the laws there, would be executed by our tribunals upon the principles of comity; and the case would be the same if they were made in Europe or in any other foreign country. The clause has nothing to do with the doctrine of international comity. That doctrine, as has been remarked, depends upon the usage of civilized nations and the presumed assent of the legislative authority of the particular state in which the right is claimed; and an express denial of the right by that authority is decisive against the claim. How then, is the case of the appellant aided by the provision under consideration? * * * But my opinion is that she has no more right to the protection of this property than one of the citizens of this state would have upon bringing them here under the same circumstances, and that the clause of the Constitution referred to has no application to the case. * * *

Upon the whole case, I have come to the conclusion that there is nothing in the national Constitution or the laws of Congress to preclude the state judicial authorities from declaring these slaves thus introduced into the territory of this state, free, and setting them at liberty, according to the direction of the statute referred to. For the foregoing reasons, I am in favor of affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court.

CORFIELD v. CORYELL.

1825. Circuit Court of the United States. 4 Wash. C. C. 371.

This was an action of trespass for seizing * * * a certain vessel, the property of the plaintiff. [The defendant justified by showing seizure in accordance with a statute of New Jersey, as follows:—"it shall not be lawful for any person who is not at the time an actual inhabitant and resident in this state, to rake or gather clams, oysters, or shells, in any of the rivers, bays or waters in this state, on board of any * * * vessel, not wholly owned by some person, inhabitant of and actually residing in this state," under penalty of $10 fine and forfeiture of the vessel. The plaintiff pleaded the invalidity of this statute under Art. IV, Sec. 2, Cl. 1 of the Constitution of the United States.]

Washington, J., delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

2. The next question is, whether this act infringes that section of the Constitution which declares that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states"? The inquiry is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are, in their nature, fundamental; which belong, of right, to the citizens of all free governments; and which have, at all times,

[2] In Bank of Augusta v. Earle (U. S. 1839) 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274 it was held that a corporation is not a citizen within Art. IV, Sec. 2, Cl. 1, and this has been regarded as settled since Paul v. Virginia (U. S. 1869) 8 Wall. 168, 180-182, 19 L. ed. 357, where it was reasoned that state A is not required by this clause to permit citizens of state B to act as a corporation in state A though in state B they are incorporated in accordance with the laws thereof. Thus this clause does not require a state not to exclude a corporation formed under the laws of another state. This power to exclude "foreign" corporations does not extend to excluding "foreign" corporations from engaging in foreign or interstate commerce in the state, this exception being due to interpretation of the Commerce Clause, Article I, § 8, Cl. 3. "And undoubtedly a corporation of one state, employed in the business of the general government, may do such business in other states without obtaining a license from them. Thus, * * * 'if Congress should employ a corporation of shipbuilders to construct a man-of-war, they would have the right to purchase the necessary timber and iron in any state of the Union,' and, we may add, without the permission and against the prohibition of the state. Stockton v. Baltimore and New York Railroad Co., 32 Fed. Rep. 9, 14."—Field, J., in Pembina Mining Co. v. Penn. (1888) 125 U. S. 181, 186, 31 L. ed. 650. The position of a foreign corporation under the Constitution is dealt with in the later chapter on Foreign Corporations.

A state is not required to permit a person to practice law therein merely because he is a citizen of another state in which he is licensed. In re Rodgers (1899) 194 Pa. 161, 46 Atl. 668. See further, Attorney and Client, 6 C. J. p. 6, §§ 19-20.

been enjoyed by the citizens of the several states which compose this Union, from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are, it would perhaps be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: protection by the government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; subject nevertheless to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole. The right of a citizen of one state to pass through, or to reside in any other state,[3] for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of the state; to take, hold and dispose of property, either real or personal; and an exemption from higher taxes or impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the state; may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens, which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental; to which may be added, the elective franchise, as regulated and established by the laws or Constitution of the state in which it is to be exercised. These, and many others which might be mentioned, are, strictly speaking, privileges and immunities, and the enjoyment of them by the citizens of each state, in every other state, was manifestly calculated (to use the expressions of the preamble of the corresponding provision in the old Articles of Confederation) "the better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different states of the Union."

[3] PROBLEM: If a state may not prevent aliens migrating into it from another state (see Truax v. Raich, ante, p. 422) and can not prevent citizens of other states from so migrating, may it prevent "citizens" of Hawaii, of the Philippines, or citizens of the United States domiciled in the District of Columbia from doing so? (Compare Crandall v. Nevada (U. S. 1868) 6 Wall. 35, 18 L. ed. 745, holding that a state may not make leaving the state a taxable privilege). May a state make discriminations against these last three classes of persons that it may not make against citizens of other states?

In Estate of Johnson (1903) 139 Cal. 532, 539, 73 Pac. 424, 96 Am. St. 161, it is said that "citizens of Territories, of the District of Columbia, and of our new possessions, as well as aliens" are not within the protection of Art. IV, § 2, Cl. 1, and that an attempt of a state to tax legacies given to nonresidents while exempting legacies given to residents would be invalid as to legacies to nonresidents who were citizens of other states but valid as to legacies to nonresidents of these four classes.

Compare a converse situation in Haavik v. Alaska Packers Assn. (1924) 263 U. S. 510, 515, 68 L. ed. 414, where McReynolds, J., for the court after referring to Art. IV, § 2, Cl. 1, said that the court found nothing in the Constitution forbidding Congress or a Territorial legislature to give residents of the Territory preferences over citizens of the states.

Consider the possibilities of interpretation. Thus, where a state statute gave an action for damages against anyone who denied to any "citizen" full privileges of, or equal treatment in, a theatre except for good cause applicable alike to "citizens" of every color or race, it was held that "citizen" in this context meant any person and that it was not necessary for plaintiff to show that he was a citizen of the United States or of the state in the technical senses of those expressions. Prowd v. Gore (1922) 57 Cal. App. 458, 207 Pac. 490.

Article IV, § 2, Cl. 1, is not the only anti-discrimination clause in the Constitution. Even if the words, "citizens of each state" in that clause are authoritatively construed not to include "citizens" of the District of Columbia, of the Territories, and of the Philippines, yet as to such persons while they are within a state's jurisdiction (meaning geographical limits?) they derive some immunity from discrimination by virtue of Amendment XIV, "nor [shall any state] deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." While this clause and Art. IV, § 2, Cl. 1, to some extent overlap they are not coextensive. Also note that the Commerce Clause gives all persons including corporations immunity from state prevention of ingress for the conduct of interstate and foreign commerce within a state.

But we cannot accede to the proposition which was insisted on by the counsel, that, under this provision of the Constitution, the citizens of the several states are permitted to participate in all the rights which belong exclusively to the citizens of any other particular state, merely upon the ground that they are enjoyed by those citizens; much less, that in regulating the use of the common property of the citizens of such state, the legislature is bound to extend to the citizens of all the other states the same advantages as are secured to their own citizens. A several fishery, either as the right to it respects running fish, or such as are stationary, such as oysters, clams, and the like, is as much the property of the individual to whom it belongs, as dry land, or land covered by water; and is equally protected by the laws of the state against the aggressions of others, whether citizens or strangers. Where those private rights do not exist to the exclusion of the common right, that of fishing belongs to all the citizens or subjects of the state. It is the property of all; to be enjoyed by them in subordination to the laws which regulate its use. They may be considered as tenants in common of this property; and they are so exclusively entitled to the use of it, that it cannot be enjoyed by others without the tacit consent, or the express permission of the sovereign who has the power to regulate its use. * * *

That this exclusive right of taking oysters in the waters of New Jersey has never been ceded by that state, in express terms, to the United States, is admitted by the counsel for the plaintiff; and having shown, as we think we have, that this right is a right of property, vested either in certain individuals, or in the state, for the use of the citizens thereof; it would, in our opinion, be going quite too far to construe the grant of privileges and immunities of citizens, as amounting to a grant of a co-tenancy in the common property of the state, to the citizens of all the other states. Such a construction would, in many instances, be productive of the most serious public inconvenience and injury, particularly, in regard to those kind of fish, which, by being exposed to too general use, may be exhausted. The oyster beds belonging to a state may be abundantly sufficient for the use of the citizens of that state, but might be totally exhausted and destroyed if the legislature could not so regulate the use of them as to exclude the citizens of the other states from taking them, except under such limitations and restrictions as the laws may prescribe.

[The court also concluded that the plaintiff, though owner of the vessel, having leased it for a definite term unexpired at the time of the seizure, did not have possession or immediate right to possession, essential to maintain an action of trespass.]

[4] Accord: State v. Tower (1892) 84 Maine 444, 24 Atl. 898; Commonwealth v. Hilton (1899) 174 Mass. 29, 54 N. E. 362, 45 L. R. A. 475; State v. Corson (1901) 67 N. J. L. 178, 50 Atl. 780; State v. Ashman (1911) 123 Tenn. 654, 135 S. W. 325 (fresh water shell fish); Allen v. Wyckoff (1886) 48 N. J. L. 90, 2 Atl. 659, 57 Am. Rep. 548 (wild game), and on wild game see Geer v. Connecticut (1896) 161 U. S. 519, 528-530, 40 L. ed. 793. In McCready v. Virginia (1877) 94 U. S. 391, 24 L. ed. 248, it was held that planting of oysters in tidal waters within the state might be confined to citizens of the state, and the court said, "If Virginia had by law provided for the sale of its once vast public domain, and a division of the proceeds among its own people, no one, we venture to say, would contend that the citizens of other states had a constitutional right to the enjoyment of this privilege of Virginia citizenship. Neither if, instead of selling, the state had appropriated the same property to be used as a common by its people for the purposes of agriculture, could the citizens of other states avail themselves of such a privilege."

Compare this concept of "state" ownership of public land, which states have practiced selling to private persons, with the vague "property" in wild game and fish which semble the state has no such ownership of as would support sale of it to individual members, its ownership being that of a trustee for its members in common who may become individual owners by capture. Rossmiller v. State (1902) 114 Wis. 169, 181, 89 N. W. 839, 58 L. R. A. 93, 91 Am. St. 910.

See State v. Catholic (1915) 75 Ore. 367, 147 Pac. 372, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 913, for discussion of a compact and legislation based upon the idea that salmon in the Columbia River are common property of all citizens of Oregon, Washington and Idaho to the exclusion of citizens of other states.

In Hess v. Muir (1886) 65 Md. 586, 610, 5 Atl. 540, 6 Atl. 673, it is held that a nonresident may be excluded from oyster planting even though he is an owner of land bordering upon the shore line.

A state may forbid the drawing off of water from lakes or rivers wholly within the state to supply inhabitants of other states. McCarter v. Hudson County Water Co. (1906) 70 N. J. Eq. 695, 65 Atl. 489, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 197, 118 Am. St. 754, 10 Ann. Cas. 116, affd. in Hudson County Water Co. v. McCarter (1908) 209 U. S. 349, 52 L. ed. 828, 14 Ann. Cas. 560. As to ice on such waters it has been held that the collectivity called "state" cannot charge its members ten cents a ton for ice cut and shipped out of the state by them, and semble every person within the borders of the state (irrespective of citizenship?) share equally in a common right to take ice for personal use or for sale inside or outside the state. Rossmiller v. State, supra.

A state statute has been sustained which restricted the letting by counties of contracts for public printing and stationery to residents of the state. The reasoning of the opinion is that a state may elect with whom it will contract, and that the Commerce Clause, 14th Amendment and Art. IV, § 2, Cl. 1, impose no restraint in respect thereto. State ex rel. Collins v. Senatobia Blank Book & Stationery Co. (1917) 115 Miss. 254, 76 So. 258, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 953. On like grounds was sustained a Colorado statute requiring in all contracts for public work preference to be given to Colorado products. City and County of Denver v. Bossie (1928) 83 Colo. 329, 266 Pac. 214. Would a state statute be valid that required private contractors employed to do public work for the state to hire as laborers only citizens of the state? See the reasoning in People v. Crane (1915) 214 N. Y. 154, 108 N. E. 427, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1254, and in Heim v. McCall (1915) 239 U. S. 175, 60 L. ed. 206, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 287. See ante, p. 432 and note 7 thereto.

BLAKE ET AL. v. McCLUNG.

1898. Supreme Court of the United States. 172 U. S. 239.

[On writ of error to the Supreme Court of Tennessee. The Embreeville Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for mining and manufacturing purposes complied in 1890 with the requirements of the statutes of Tennessee for doing business in that state and engaged in business therein. In 1893 McClung and other creditors, citizens of Tennessee, applied to a Tennessee court to appoint a receiver of the corporation's property in Tennessee, the corporation being insolvent. Other creditors intervened, among them Blake, a resident of and citizen of Ohio, the firm of Rogers, Brown & Company, the members of which were also residents of and citizens of Ohio, and the Hull Coal and Coke Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Virginia. There also were creditors who were residents of Great Britain. A Tennessee statute provided that the property of foreign mining and manufacturing corporations admitted to do business in the state should be liable for their debts and that "creditors who may be residents of this state shall have a priority in the distribution of assets, or subjection of the same, or any part thereof, to the payment of debts over all simple contract creditors, being residents of any other country or countries." On issues involving priority among the creditors the case went on appeal to the Supreme Court of Tennessee which partly modifying the decree below decreed that all the creditors "who resided in the State of Tennessee" were entitled to priority over all of the other creditors whether residents of other states of the United States or of the Kingdom of Great Britain.]

MR. JUSTICE HARLAN delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

The suggestion is made that, as the statute refers only to "residents," there is no occasion to consider whether it is repugnant to the provision of the national Constitution relating to citizens. We cannot accede to this view. * * * Looking at the purpose and scope of the Tennessee statute, it is plain that the words "residents of this state" refer to those whose residence in Tennessee was such as indicated that their permanent home or habitation was there, without any present intention of removing therefrom, and having the intention, when absent from that state, to return thereto,—such residence as appertained to or inhered in citizenship. And the words, in the same statute, "residents of any other country or countries," refer to those whose respective habitations were not in Tennessee, but who were citizens, not simply residents, of some other state or country. It is impossible to believe that the statute was intended to apply to creditors of whom it could be said that they were only residents of other states, but not to creditors who were citizens of such states. The state did not intend to place creditors, citizens of other states, upon an equality with creditors, citizens of Tennessee, and to give priority only to Tennessee creditors over creditors who resided in, but were not citizens of, other states. The manifest purpose was to give to all Tennessee creditors priority over all creditors residing out of that state, whether the latter were citizens or only residents of some other state or country. Any other interpretation of the statute would defeat the object for which it was enacted. * * *

Beyond question, a state may, through judicial proceedings, take possession of the assets of an insolvent foreign corporation within its limits, and distribute such assets or their proceeds among creditors according to their respective rights. But may it exclude citizens of other states from such distribution until the claims of its own citizens shall have been first satisfied? In the administration of the property of an insolvent foreign corporation by the courts of the state in which it is doing business, will the Constitution of the United States permit discrimination against individual creditors of such corporaton because of their being citizens of other states, and not citizens of the state in which such administration occurs?

These questions are presented for our determination. Let us see how far they have been answered by the former decisions of this court.

This court has never undertaken to give any exact or comprehensive definition of the words "privileges and immunities," in Article IV of the Constitution of the United States. Referring to this clause, Mr. Justice Curtis, speaking for the court in Conner v. Elliot, 18 How. 591, 593, said: "We do not deem it needful to attempt to define the meaning of the word 'privileges' in this clause of the Constitution. It is safer, and more in accordance with the duty of a judicial tribunal, to leave its meaning to be determined, in each case, upon a view of the particular rights asserted and denied therein. And especially is this true when we are dealing with so broad a provision, involving matters not only of great delicacy and importance, but which are of such a character that any merely abstract definition could scarcely be correct; and a failure to make it so would certainly produce mischief." Nevertheless, what has been said by this and other courts upon the general subject will assist us in determining the particular questions now pressed upon our attention. * * * [Here Justice Harlan referred to the "observations of Mr. Justice Washington," quoting the long paragraph of the latter's opinion, ante, pp. 457-459. He also referred to McCready v. Virginia, ante, p. 460, n. 4 as resting upon the same common property concept as Corfield v. Coryell, and quoted from Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 180.]

Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 430, involved the validity of a statute of Maryland requiring all traders, not being permanent residents[5] of the state, to take out licenses for the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise in Maryland, other than agricultural products and articles there manufactured. This court said: "Attempt will not be made to define the words 'privileges and immunities,' or to specify the rights which they are intended to secure and protect, beyond what may be necessary to the decision of the case before the court. Beyond doubt, those words are words of very comprehensive meaning, but it will be sufficient to say that the clause plainly and unmistakably secures and protects the right of a citizen of one state to pass into any other state of the Union, for the purpose of engaging in lawful commerce, trade, or business, without molestation, to acquire personal property, to take and hold real estate, to maintain actions in the courts of the states, and to be exempt from any higher taxes or excises than are imposed by the state upon its own citizens. Comprehensive as the power of the states is to lay and collect taxes and excises, it is nevertheless clear, in the judgment of the court, that the power cannot be exercised to any extent in a manner forbidden by the Constitution; and, inasmuch as the Constitution provides that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, it follows that the defendant might lawfully sell or offer or expose for sale within the district described in the indictment, any goods which the permanent residents of the state might sell or offer or expose for sale in that district, without being subjected to any higher tax or excise than that exacted by law of such permanent residents."

In the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 77, the court, referring to what was said in Paul v. Virginia, above cited, in reference to the scope and meaning of Section 2 of Article IV of the Constitution, said: "The constitutional provision there alluded to did not create those rights which it called privileges and immunities of citizens of the states. It threw around them in that clause no security for the citizen of the state in which they were claimed or exercised. Nor did it profess to control the power of the state governments over the rights of its own citizens. Its sole purpose was to declare to the several states, that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify, or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other states within your jurisdiction."

In Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 113, 114, this court cited with approval the language of Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, to the effect that the object of the constitutional guaranty was to confer on the citizens of the several states "a general citizenship, and to communicate all the privileges and immunities which the citizens of the same state would be entitled to under like circumstances, and this includes the right to institute actions."

[5] Counsel in that case said of the statute involved: "It makes the discrimination rest upon the very fact which alone determines, in the case of citizens of the United States, whether a person is or is not a citizen of one state or another, to wit, permanent residence in a state." 12 Wall. (U. S.) at p. 421.

These principles have not been modified by any subsequent decision of this court.

The foundation upon which the above cases rest cannot, however, stand, if it be adjudged to be in the power of one state, when establishing regulations for the conduct of private business of a particular kind, to give its own citizens essential privileges connected with that business which it denies to citizens of other states. By the statute in question the British company was to be deemed and taken to be a corporation of Tennessee, with authority to carry on its business in that state. It was the right of citizens of Tennessee to deal with it, as it was their right to deal with corporations created by Tennessee. And it was equally the right of citizens of other states to deal with that corporation. The state did not assume to declare, even if it could legally have declared, that that company, being admitted to do business in Tennessee, should transact business only with citizens of Tennessee, or should not transact business with citizens of other states. No one would question the right of the individual plaintiffs in error, although not residents of Tennessee, to sell their goods to that corporation upon such terms in respect of payment as might be agreed upon, and to ship them to the corporation as its place of business in that state.

But the enjoyment of these rights is materially obstructed by the statute in question; for that statute, by its necessary operation, excludes citizens of other states from transacting business with that corporation upon terms of equality with citizens of Tennessee. By force of the statute alone, citizens of other states, if they contracted at all with the British corporation, must have done so subject to the onerous condition that, if the corporation became insolvent, its assets in Tennessee should first be applied to meet its obligations to residents of that state, although liability for its debts and engagements was "to be enforced in the manner provided by law for the application of the property of natural persons to the payment of their debts, engagements, and contracts." But, clearly, the state could not in that mode secure exclusive privileges to its own citizens in matters of business. If a state should attempt, by statute regulating the distribution of the property of insolvent individuals among their creditors, to give priority to the claims of such individual creditors as were citizens of that state over the claims of individual creditors citizens of other states, such legislation would be repugnant to the Constitution, upon the ground that it withheld from citizens of other states, as such, and because they were such, privileges granted to citizens of the state enacting it. Can a different principle apply, as between individual citizens of the several states, when the assets to be distributed are the assets of an insolvent private corporation lawfully engaged in business, and having the power to contract with citizens residing in states other than the one in which it is located? * * *

We hold such discrimination against citizens of other states to be repugnant to the second section of the Fourth Article of the Constitution of the United States, although, generally speaking, the state has the power to prescribe the conditions upon which foreign corporations may enter its territory for purposes of business. Such a power cannot be exerted with the effect of defeating or impairing rights secured to citizens of the several states by the supreme law of the land. Indeed, all the powers possessed by a state must be exercised consistently with the privileges and immunities granted or protected by the Constitution of the United States. * * *

We must not be understood as saying that a citizen of one state is entitled to enjoy in another state every privilege that may be given in the latter to its own citizens. There are privileges that may be accorded by a state to its own people in which citizens of other states may not participate except in conformity to such reasonable regulations as may be established by the state. For instance, a state cannot forbid citizens of other states from suing in its courts, that right being enjoyed by its own people; but it may require a nonresident, although a citizen of another state, to give bond for costs, although such bond be not required of a resident. Such a regulation of the internal affairs of a state cannot reasonably be characterized as hostile to the fundamental rights of citizens of other states. So, a state may, by rule uniform in its operation as to citizens of the several states, require residence within its limits for a given time before a citizen of another state, who becomes a resident thereof, shall exercise the right of suffrage or become eligible to office. It has never been supposed that regulations of that character materially interfered with the enjoyment by citizens of each state of the privileges and immunities secured by the Constitution to citizens of the several states. The Constitution forbids only such legislation[6] affecting citizens of the respective states as will substantially or practically put a citizen of one state in a condition of alienage when he is within or when he removes to another state, or when asserting in another state the rights that commonly appertain to those who are part of the political community known as the People of the United States, by and for whom the government of the Union was ordained and established.

[6] Is not the immunity given by this clause broader than immunity from discriminatory legislation? Does it not include also immunity from similar harms emanating from executive, administrative and judicial organs of government? On the other hand it has been said that, like the Fourteenth Amendment (see Civil Rights Cases, ante, at p. 313), this clause gives no immunity from adverse discrimination practiced by unofficial persons acting without authority or color of authority, from government. Consequently it has been held that Congress though it may legislate to punish invasions of immunities given by the Constitution can not provide for punishing private persons who without color of state authority eject from a state citizens of another state. United States v. Wheeler

Nor must we be understood as saying that a state may not, by its courts, retain within its limits the assets of a foreign corporation, in order that justice may be done to its own citizens, nor, by appropriate action of its judicial tribunals, see to it that its own citizens are not unjustly discriminated against by reason of the administration in other states of the assets there of an insolvent corporation doing business within its limits. For instance, if the Embreeville Company had property in Virginia at the time of its insolvency, the Tennessee court administering its assets in that state could take into account what a Virginia creditor, seeking to participate in the distribution of the company's assets in Tennessee, had received or would receive from the company's assets in Virginia, and make such an order touching the assets of the company in Tennessee as would protect Tennessee creditors against wrongful discrimination arising from the particular action taken in Virginia for the benefit of creditors residing in that commonwealth.

It may be appropriate to observe that the objections to the statute of Tennessee do not necessarily embrace enactments that are found in some of the states requiring foreign insurance corporations, as a condition of their coming into the state for purposes of business, to deposit with the state treasurer funds sufficient to secure policy holders in its midst. Legislation of that character does not present any question of discrimination against citizens forbidden by the Constitution. Insurance funds set apart in advance for the benefit of home policy holders of a foreign insurance company doing business in the state are a trust fund of a specific kind, to be administered for the exclusive benefit of certain persons. Policy holders in other states know that those particular funds are segregated from the mass of property owned by the company, and that they cannot look to them to the prejudice of those for whose special benefit they were deposited. The present case is not one of that kind. The statute of Tennessee did not make it a condition of the right of the British corporation to come into Tennessee for purposes of business that it should, at the outset, deposit with the state

(1920) 254 U. S. 281, 65 L. ed. 270. While thus denying that there is any constitutional immunity from such ejection, the court added, "Nothing that we have stated must be considered as implying a want of power in the United States to restrain acts which, although involving ingress or egress into or from a state, have for their direct and necessary effect an interference with the performance of duties which it is incumbent upon the United States to discharge, as illustrated in the Crandall Case." a fixed amount, to stand exclusively or primarily for the protection of its Tennessee creditors. * * *

We adjudge that when the general property and assets of a private corporation lawfully doing business in a state are in course of administration by the courts of such state, creditors who are citizens of other states are entitled, under the Constitution of the United States, to stand upon the same plane with creditors of like class who are citizens of such state, and cannot be denied equality of right simply because they do not reside in that state, but are citizens residing in other states of the Union. The individual plaintiffs in error were entitled to contract with this British corporation, lawfully doing business in Tennessee, and deemed and taken to be a corporation of that state; and no rule in the distribution of its assets among creditors could be applied to them as resident citizens of Ohio, and because they were not residents of Tennessee, that was not applied by the courts of Tennessee to creditors of like character who were citizens of Tennessee. * * *

[The court held that the decree below was not invalid in so far as it adversely affected the Hull Coal and Coke Company, a Virginia corporation. See ante, p. 457, n. 2, and, in due course, the chapter on Foreign Corporations.]

MR. JUSTICE BREWER, with whom MR. CHIEF JUSTICE FULLER concurred, dissenting. * * * Neither the statute, the pleadings nor the decree [below] raise any question of citizenship, or give any priority of right to the citizens of Tennessee over citizens of other states, but only discriminate between residents,[7] and give residents

[7] In some cases courts have upheld statutes which in terms discriminate between "residents" and "non-residents" purporting to find that the word "resident" as thus used in the statute does not mean permanent resident and that, since in the favored class there may be some citizens of other states who are temporarily "residing" in the state and in the disfavored class some citizens of the state temporarily "residing" out of the state, the statute does not discriminate between citizens of the state and citizens of other states. Cummings v. Wingo (1889) 31 S. Car. 427, 435-436, 10 S. E. 107; Robinson v. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. (1889) 112 N. Y. 315, 324, 19 N. E. 625, 2 L. R. A. 636. So in holding valid a state inheritance tax law which gave a larger exemption where the decedent was a "resident" than where he was a "non-resident," a court has said: "This classification * * * is not based on citizenship, but on residence, and embraces all who come within it, whether citizens of this state or of other states. Citizenship (of a state) is synonymous with domicile, but not with residence, and a person may be a resident of one state and a citizen of another." Enochs v. State ex rel. Roberson (1923) 133 Miss. 107, 144, 97 So. 534.

In La Tourette v. McMaster (1919) 248 U. S. 465, 469, 63 L. ed. 362, involving the validity of a South Carolina statute which discriminated between "residents" and "nonresidents" in granting licenses to act as insurance brokers in the state, the Supreme Court of the United States accepted an interpretation of the above sort put upon the statute by the Supreme Court of North Carolina, and concluded that as so interpreted the statute did not discriminate between citizens of the state and citizens of other states. But in holding that New York could not collect income taxes from "nonresidents" which were assessed under a state statute allowing them lesser exemptions than it allowed residents in otherwise like circumstances, the court by Pitney, J., said, "Of course the terms 'resident' and 'citizen' are not synonymous, and in some cases the distinction is important (La Tourette v. McMaster, 248 U. S. 465, 470); but a of the state a priority. * * * It is not necessary in this court to refer to the difference between residence and citizenship. Neither is synonymous with the other, and neither includes the other. A British subject or a citizen of Ohio may be a resident of Tennessee, and entitled to the benefit of this statute. A citizen of Tennessee may, like these plaintiffs in error, be a resident of and doing business in Ohio and not entitled to its benefit. It will be time enough to consider the question discussed in the opinion when it appears that a state has attempted to discriminate between its own citizens and citizens of other states, and the courts of the state have affirmed the validity of such discrimination. * * *

general taxing scheme such as the one under consideration, if it discriminates against all non-residents, has the necessary effect of including in the discrimination those who are citizens of other states; and, if there be no reasonable ground for the diversity of treatment, it abridges the privileges and immunities to which such citizens are entitled." Travis v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co. (1920) 252 U. S. 60, 78-79, 64 L. ed. 460.

An Ohio statute fixed the venue of tort actions against railroads in the county in which the tort occurred or in the county where the plaintiff resided when the tort occurred. Plaintiff, a citizen of Pennsylvania, brought an action in the common pleas court of Cuyahoga County, Ohio, alleging an injury by the defendant through a wrongful act done in Pennsylvania. Held, that the above statute though construed to prevent plaintiff from maintaining his suit in any Ohio court was valid, notwithstanding Art. IV, § 2, Cl. 1. The court said: "A state statute does not violate this constitutional mandate if there be no manifest intent to discriminate in favor of a particular class of citizens to the exclusion of others similarly circumstanced and the provisions of the restrictive act be in fact open alike to all citizens who may bring themselves within its terms. Thus, if a citizen of Pennsylvania is a resident of Ohio, or if such citizen is sojourning in or traveling through the state of Ohio, and is injured in person or property within the state, the courts are open to him; and, on the other hand, if a citizen of Ohio is a resident of Pennsylvania and is injured in person or property in that state, the courts of Ohio are denied to him. The statute is based upon residence without regard to citizenship." Loftus v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1923) 107 Ohio St. 352, 363, 140 N. E. 94. See also Douglas v. New York, N. H. &c. R. Co. (1929) 279 U. S. —, 73 L. ed. 25.

Compare the above classification with the following: The Supreme Court of Tennessee described a statute of that state as follows: "The determining feature in the legislation quoted is the having of one's chief office in this state. Any citizen of this state, as well as any citizen of a foreign state, who has his chief office out of the state, must pay the $100 tax; so of any domestic corporation, as well as foreign corporation, having its chief office out of the state. Any foreign corporation or citizen of another state, or firm, as well as domestic corporations, citizens of this state, and firms of this state having its or their chief office in this state, are all alike entitled to carry on a railroad construction business here on the payment of $25. There is no discrimination at all." The Supreme Court of the United States, in holding the statute invalid as applied to a natural person who was a citizen and resident of Alabama with his chief office therein, said: "As the chief office of an individual is commonly in the state of which he is a citizen, Tennessee citizens engaged in constructing railroads in that state will ordinarily have their chief offices therein, while citizens of other states so engaged will not. Practically, therefore, the statute under consideration would produce discrimination against citizens of other states by imposing higher charges against them than citizens of Tennessee are required to pay. We can find no adequate basis for taxing individuals according to the location of their chief office—the classification, we think is arbitrary and unreasonable. Under the federal Constitution a citizen of one state is guaranteed the right to enjoy in all other states equality of commercial privileges with their citizens; but he cannot have his chief office in every one of them." Chalker v. Birmingham & N. W. Ry. Co. (1919) 249 U. S. 522, 526, 527, 63 L. ed. 748.

SMITH v. LOUGHMAN.

1927. Court of Appeals of New York. 245 N. Y. 486.

[In accordance with the transfer tax law of New York the state tax commission assessed the gifts by will made by Mary J. Smith to her four children of personal and real property located in New York at the time of her death. At that time she was a resident of Connecticut. The amount assessed was $589.98. If she had been a resident of New York the assessment would have been $94.90. The statute contained separate schemes, one applicable to estates of "residents," the other to estates of "nonresidents," which would produce the diversities set forth in the opinion. The validity of the statute was challenged with reference to U. S. Const. Art. IV, Sec. 2, Cl. 1.]

Cardozo, Ch. J. * * * True, of course, it is that with changes in the class of donees or in the value of the gift, the comparative results will differ. For illustration, the tax on a legacy of $5,000 to a father, mother, husband, wife, or child is $100 for a nonresident, and for a resident nothing; on a legacy of $10,000, $200 for a nonresident, and for a resident $50; on one of $50,000, $1,000 for a nonresident, and for a resident $650; on one of $100,000, $2,000 for a nonresident, and $1,650 for a resident; on one of $250,000, $4,000 for a nonresident, and $4,600 for a resident. On the other hand, the tax on a legacy of $500 to a friend is $10 for a nonresident, and nothing for a resident; on one of $10,000, $200 for a nonresident, and $500 for a resident; on one of $100,000, $2,000 for a nonresident, and for a resident $5,750. The nonresident suffers in the intimate and lower schedules and gains in the remote and upper ones. Such is the setting of fact in which the legal problem is imbedded.

The state does not establish the validity of this act by showing that from certain points of view or in aid of certain purposes a classification discriminating between residents or nonresidents has a basis, not wholly illusory, in policy or reason. There is no occasion to inquire whether such a showing would suffice if we were dealing with the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and nothing else. We deal in fact with something more. "The power of a state to make reasonable and natural classifications for purposes of taxation is clear and not questioned; but neither under form of classification nor otherwise can any state enforce taxing laws which in their practical operation materially abridge or impair the equality of commercial privileges secured by the federal Constitution, to citizens of the several states." Chalker v. Birmingham & N. W. Ry. Co., 249 U. S. 522, 526. Classification may be supported by many considerations of expediency or fairness and, none the less, may be illegal if it denies to the citizens of any state the privileges and immunities that belong to citizens of another. To put it differently, equality in such circumstances is itself the highest policy, to which other policies must bow. The Constitution so commands. Few of its commands, if any, have had an influence more profound upon the attainment and preservation of the unity of the nation. Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 180; Travis v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co., 252 U. S. 60, 78. Cf. Hanover Fire Ins. Co. v. Carr, 272 U. S. 494.

By the Tax Law of this state, an act that in any case is one and the same—the transfer of a parcel of real estate by will—is subjected to burdens of taxation that differ fundamentally, and not occasionally or in points of detail, according as the doer of the act is a citizen of one state or another. The distinction in form is between resident and nonresident; "but a general taxing scheme such as the one under consideration, if it discriminates against all nonresidents, has the necessary effect of including in the discrimination those who are citizens of other states" (Travis v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co., supra, at page 79), and will stand or fall accordingly. In some instances, the burden for the nonresident is vastly heavier than for the resident. It is so in this case. It is so, as we have seen, whenever the gift is to a child or a parent or a husband or wife, unless the value is very high. In other instances, as in many where the gift is to a stranger to the blood, the burden for the nonresident may be lower than for the resident. Whether these inequalities will balance one another in the long run as applied to nonresidents generally, we can do little more than guess. What is certain is that the inequalities will not balance, but will inevitably persist, whenever certain classes of nonresidents—e. g., children or parents—are compared with like classes of residents. What is also certain is that nonresidence without more has been made the basis for the divergent burdens of one class and another. The citizen of New Jersey or Connecticut who is the owner of property in New York, and who wishes to dispose of it by will, finds a body of law in New York applicable to citizens of New Jersey or Connecticut fundamentally at variance with the body applicable in like conditions to citizens of New York. He may not act upon equal terms with his neighbor who lives on the other side of the state line. The exactions for the two classes have a different operation as to each, not by accident, but of set purpose. At times heavier and at times lighter, they are never the same.

A state is not at liberty to establish varying codes of law, one for its own citizens and another, governing the same conduct, for citizens of sister states. Of course, one may not press this principle to "a drily logical extreme." Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 110. At times, the character of the act may be so affected by the residence of the actor as to call for varying regulation with a view to the attainment in the end of a truer level of equality. Thus, nonresidents resorting to our courts may be compelled to give security for costs[8] (Canadian Northern Ry. Co. v. Eggen, 252 U. S. 553, 561, 562; Robinson v. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co., 112 N. Y. 315, 324, 325), and travelers using our highways for motor cars may be required to submit to appropriate regulations for the service of process if accident results as an incident of travel (Hess v. Pawloski, 274 U. S. 352). In these and like cases, the effect of the apparent discrimination is not to cast upon the nonresident a burden heavier in its ultimate operation than the one falling upon residents, but to restore the equilibrium by withdrawing an unfair advantage.[9] "It makes no hostile discrimination against nonresidents, but tends to put them on the same footing as residents. Literal and precise equality in respect of this matter is not attainable; it is not required." Hess v. Pawloski, supra. Instances of a like order can be found in statutes prescribing the form and measure of taxation. Resident stockholders in Connecticut were paying a tax upon the value of their shares with deduction allowed for the value of real estate. Such a deduction was not allowed to nonresidents. The inequality was only apparent, for the residents were taxed in other ways. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Connecticut, 185 U. S. 364. Domestic corporations in Louisiana paid a tax upon oil. Nonresidents paid a heavier tax. Again the discrimination was only apparent, for the tax upon the foreign corporation was declared to be in lieu of others. General American Tank Car Corp. v. Day, 270 U. S. 367, a case involving, however, the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the guaranty under Article IV of the equal privileges of citizens. In these and like cases, the difference in treatment, whatever it may have been, was made necessary by conditions inseparably interwoven with difference of residence, and was proportioned to the necessity. Only for this was it upheld.

[9] Some differentiations in judicial procedure have been held valid not all of which fall clearly within the above principle. Campbell v. Morris (1797) 3 Har. & McH. (Md.) 491, 1 Am. Dec. 380 (attachment of property of nonresident debtors only); Pyrolusite Manganese Co. v. Ward (1884) 73 Ga. 491 (same); Manley v. Mayer (1904) 68 Kans. 377, 75 Pac. 550, 1 Ann. Cas. 825 (attachment of decedent's property in suit against executor only if latter is a nonresident); Marsh v. Steele (1879) 9 Nebr. 96, 1 N. W. 869, 31 Am. Rep. 406 (judgment creditor attaching property in execution must give bond only in attaching property of resident); Head v. Daniels (1887) 38 Kans. 1, 15 Pac. 911 (same); Frost v. Brisbane (1837) 19 Wend. 11 (transiently present and temporarily resident persons only arrestable for debt); Baker v. Wise (1861) 16 Grat. (57 Va.) 139 (departing vessels of nonresidents only searchable for escaping slaves); Kincaid v. Francis (1812) 3 Tenn. 49 (only citizens may attach non-citizens' property); Pratt v. Hawley (1921) 297 Ill. 244, 250, 130 N. E. 793 (notice of probate in common form given residents only); White v. Walker (1915) 136 La. 464, 67 So. 332 (suit in forma pauperis allowed only to citizens of the state). See also Canadian Northern R. Co. v. Eggen, infra, p. 487, and Chemung Canal Bank v. Lowery, infra, p. 489, n. 18.

Cf. State ex rel. Cronkhite v. Belden (1927) 193 Wis. 145, 211 N. W. 916, 214 N. W. 460 (holding invalid a discrimination in the length of time for which continuances may be granted).

The statute now before us does not use its discriminations to establish measure and proportion, its discords as a means to harmony. Something more is here than a failure to attain equality "with mathematical exactness" (per Stone, J., in General American Tank Car Corp. v. Day, supra); more than an "occasional or accidental inequality due to circumstances personal to the taxpayer" (Pitney, J., in Travis v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co., supra, at p. 80). What is here is an inequality that is purposed and pervasive. The Supreme Court held in Travis v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co., supra, that a state income tax was void in its application to nonresidents for failure to accord to them the exemption of $2,000 accorded by the same state to residents. Deeper by far and wider is the difference of treatment here. To discrimination in respect of exemption there is added discrimination in respect of rates. A special burden laid upon the members of a group as the price of a given act does not cease to be discrimination because a special privilege is granted in connection with another and unrelated act. One who wishes to do the first may never wish to do the second. It is small comfort to a parent who plans a gift of land of the value of $5,000 for the benefit of his child to learn that he would be a gainer by the new tax if he were giving land of the value of a million dollars to a cousin or a friend. No doubt a taxing system may be upheld though "occasionally and incidentally" (Maxwell v. Bugbee, 250 U. S. 525, 543) individuals may suffer. In the case cited the formula of apportionment was framed to produce equality. The court let it stand though there was evidence that in a few instances it resulted in inequality. What was general prevailed over what was unintended and exceptional. The inequalities wrought by this enactment have not been kept within those limits. Great classes of persons, all or nearly all who bear a close relation to those who take the gift, many, though not all, whose relation is more distant, must pay a penalty to the taxgatherer because of their nonresidence. This is hostile discrimination, however generous the profession of benevolent paternalism.

The state does not contend that the new system was adopted as a check upon evasion. Evasion as to subject-matter is impossible when the thing to be transferred is land. Evasion as to deductions is a danger almost equal whether the transfer is the act of nonresident or of resident. * * *

The principle of equal treatment for the citizens of all the states is a good more precious than the gain of revenue in one year or another. We are not to whittle it down by refinement of exception, or by the implication of a reciprocal advantage that is merely trivial or specious. The principle is put in jeopardy—there is set in it an entering wedge that may be the beginning of its destruction—if this statute is upheld.

The order of the Appellate Division should be reversed and the determination of the state tax commission annulled, with costs in all courts.

Pound, Crane, Andrews, Lehman, Kellogg, and O'Brien, JJ., concur.

Ordered accordingly.

QUONG HAM WAH CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION.

1920. Supreme Court of California. 184 Cal. 26.

[Proceedings on certiorari to review an award against an employer made by the state Industrial Accident Commission in favor of an employee who was a citizen of California. The employer contended that Section 58 of the statute, the sole authority for the award, was wholly invalid. The court so held at the first hearing and decided to annul the award but now on rehearing:]

Lennon, J.—Section 58 of the Workmen's Compensation Act reads as follows: "The commission shall have jurisdiction over all controversies arising out of injuries suffered without the territorial limits of this state in those cases where the injured employee is a resident of this state at the time of the injury and the contract of hire was made in this state, and any such employee or his dependents shall be entitled to the compensation or death benefits provided by this act." (Stats. 1917, p. 870.) * * *

Since the act assumes that at the time of the injury the employee will be beyond the boundaries of the state, the word "residents" must necessarily have been used to designate "persons domiciled in" California. Citizens of the United States domiciled in California are citizens of the state. (Cal. Pol. Code, Sec. 51.) The benefits of the act are therefore extended solely to citizens of California and to aliens domiciled within the state. It follows that there is a direct discrimination against aliens not domiciled in California, with which we are not concerned, and against citizens of other states of the union which, if without legal justification, renders the statute unconstitutional. Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 247; 176 U. S. 56, 67. * * *

The statute * * * assumes to extend its effect only to those cases where the contract of hire was made in this state. * * * The right of the legislature to impose reasonable regulations upon contracts subject to its sovereignty is unquestioned. When, however, the legislature attempts to provide that a substantial privilege shall be incident to certain contracts of employment when entered into in this state by citizens of this state and that that privilege shall not be incident to identical contracts of employment when entered into in this state by citizens of other states of our Union, the enactment is clearly in contravention of Section 2 of Article IV of the federal Constitution. * * *

The Constitution provides that "The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." The provision appears without qualification. Its effect is not limited to those cases where its operation will not interfere with the internal policy of the state or with considerations which appear to affect the general welfare. Its mandate is absolute. It is true that a state may, in the valid exercise of its police power, limit the right of individuals to engage in certain professions or callings. Such regulations will be upheld even though their effect is indirectly to place noncitizens at a disadvantage, but the regulation must be inherently reasonable. Ex parte Spinney, 10 Nev. 323; La Tourette v. McMaster, 248 U. S. 465. The principles applied in these cases cannot be invoked under the facts presented here. No reasonable ground can be found for the classification. Respondents make the contention that the court should uphold the right of the state to require compulsory compensation for its citizens alone, inasmuch as it is only citizens or their families who are likely to become a public charge upon the state as a result of injuries sustained abroad. The argument expresses a very excellent reason for requiring compulsory compensation for citizens, but it expresses no reason at all for denying the same right to citizens of other states. In the cases of which Ex parte Spinney and La Tourette v. McMaster, supra, are examples, restraints upon engaging in certain occupations which bore more heavily upon citizens of other states were upheld upon the ground that the public good required that the occupations in question be opened only to those having had business or professional experience within the state, the general safety and welfare necessitating the exclusion of others. In none of these cases was the rule sanctioned that a privilege could be granted to a citizen of one state and denied to citizens of other states for the reason that public policy did not require that the privilege be extended to the latter class of persons. Such a rule would be manifestly unsound and altogether in conflict with the constitutional provision here in question. No consideration of public policy requires that citizens of sister states be excluded from the benefits of the act here under consideration. The fact that considerations of public policy do not affirmatively require the extension of the benefits in question to citizens of sister states as strongly as they require their extension to citizens of this state furnishes absolutely no sound reason for the exclusion of the former and affords no reasonable basis for the discrimination.

It follows that the discrimination made in Section 58 of the Workmen's Compensation Act contravenes the provisions of the federal Constitution.

It is contended, however, and correctly, that the provisions of the federal Constitution do not have the effect of rendering invalid that portion of the Workmen's Compensation Act providing for an extension of its benefits to residents who are injured abroad, but that it allows this portion of the act to stand as effective and valid and automatically and without regard to the intent of the state legislature extends the benefits created by the act to nonresidents, or rather to such nonresidents as are citizens of sister states. In support of this contention respondents rely upon Estate of Johnson, 139 Cal. 532.[10] No good reason has been advanced for departing from the doctrine therein declared as follows: "It will be noted not only that the constitutional provision is not restrictive, but that it is neither penal nor prohibitory. It nowhere intimates that an immunity conferred upon citizens of a state, because not in terms conferred upon citizens of sister states, shall therefore be void. Some force might be given to such an argument were the constitutional provision couched in appropriate language for the purpose. If, for example, it had said, 'No citizen of any state shall be granted any immunity not granted to every citizen of every state,' or had it begun its declaration by saying that 'It shall be unlawful to grant to citizens of any state any privilege or immunity not granted to citizens of every state,' it might then have been argued that a legislative attempt so to do would be declared violative of the express mandate of the Constitution, and therefore void. But such is neither the scope, purpose, nor intent of the provision under consideration. It leaves to the state perfect freedom to grant such privileges to its citizens as it may see fit, but secures to the citizens of all the other states, by virtue of the constitutional enactment itself, the same rights, privileges, and immunities. So that, in every state law conferring immunities and privileges upon citizens, the constitutional clause under consideration, ex proprio vigore, becomes an express part of such statute. * * * The Constitution itself becomes a part of the law. And this, in giving operation to that constitutional provision, is what the courts have always done. They have never stricken down the immunity and the privilege which a state may have accorded to its own citizens. They have never annulled the exemption. They have always construed the law so as to relieve the citizens of other states, and place all upon equal footing." This is in harmony with and declaratory of the principle laid down by the United States Supreme Court in the Slaughter-House Cases, [10] The cited case held that under a collateral inheritance tax which specified as exempt property passing to "nieces or nephews when a resident of this state" property passing to nieces and nephews who were citizens of other states was also exempt.

16 Wall. 36, 77, in the following words: "The constitutional provision there alluded to did not create those rights which it called privileges and immunities of citizens of the states. * * * Nor did it profess to control the power of the state governments over the rights of its own citizens. Its sole purpose was to declare to the several states that whatever rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other states within your jurisdiction."

The discrimination complained of in the instant case is to be found in the fact that the state statute under consideration confers upon the citizens of the state privileges and immunities which are not extended by the terms of the statute, either expressly or impliedly, to nonresidents of the state, and clearly the statute in question does not impose ~~nor attempt~~ to impose upon non-citizens of the state burdens or exactions not imposed upon citizens of the state. This difference is all-important in controlling the construction and application of that provision of the federal Constitution which declares that "The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." For, where a state endeavors to place a burden upon non-citizens of the state which is not put upon citizens of the state, obviously the effect of the federal constitutional provision is to abort the endeavor of the state. On the other hand, however, where a state by statute endeavors to confer and does confer upon its citizens privileges and immunities not accorded by the statute to citizens of other states, the federal Constitution operates, by the very force of its own language, to place citizens of other states in the same category and upon the same footing as citizens of the state in so far as concerns the right to have and enjoy the privileges and immunities conferred by the state upon its own citizens. In other words, the federal constitutional provision was designed for the protection of non-citizens and, therefore, in any given case calling for its application, the case and the application must be considered from the viewpoint and in the light of the welfare of the non-citizen. Viewed in this light, it is clear that, when a state statute imposes a burden on a non-citizen which is not imposed on the citizen of the state, the non-citizen may have relief from the burden thus imposed by invoking the provision of the federal Constitution for the nullification of the discriminatory legislation. But, when a privilege is granted to a citizen and withheld from a non-citizen, the latter finds relief in the provision of the federal Constitution which, by operation of law, so to speak, extends the privilege to him. The obvious resulting difference in the operation and effect of the federal constitutional provision under discussion, is the paramount point of the decision in the Estate of Johnson, supra, and it cannot be said that the extension to non-citizens of a statutory privilege granted only to citizens is judicial legislation, for clearly it is the federal Constitution itself, and not the courts, which declares that, if citizens of a state are by statute granted privileges and immunities, non-citizens of the state shall likewise be "entitled" to them. The case of Spraigue v. Thompson, 118 U. S. 90, which enunciates the principle that the courts cannot eliminate a discriminatory statutory exception and thereby make the statute effective as to a class which the legislature did not have in mind, has application only to that class of cases where it is attempted by the state to put a burden upon nonresidents. That case has no application to the extension to nonresidents of a privilege granted to residents, and, apparently, has never been applied to the latter situation.

The very recent case of Travis v. Yale & Towne Mfg. Co., 252 U. S. 60, is relied upon in support of the contention that Estate of Johnson, supra, has been overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States. [Here reasons are assigned for rejecting this contention.]

In any event, it cannot be said from anything contained, either expressly or impliedly, in the Travis decision that the court there went so far as to say that the act in its entirety was invalid and could not be enforced against residents of the state of New York. Therefore it seems that the Travis case in no way contravenes the rule and the reason for the rule enunciated in Estate of Johnson, supra, and, bound as this court is by the authority of the decision in that case until definitely overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States, it must apply the rule thereof to the instant case. It follows that, despite the invalidity of the discrimination, the statute itself is valid and may be made to apply uniformly to citizens of California and the citizens of the other states.

The award is affirmed.[11]

[11] Compare the two views of the dissenters in Chambers v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. (1907) 207 U. S. 142, 52 L. ed. 143, a statute of Ohio provided that whenever a citizen of the state was killed by wrongful act outside the state, in a jurisdiction which allowed an action therefor the right of action could be enforced in Ohio. This was the only statute on the subject. A widow sued in Ohio for the wrongful death of her husband (both being citizens of Pennsylvania) alleging it to have been caused outside of Ohio by the defendant. The United States Supreme Court affirmed a judgment of the Supreme Court of Ohio which had reversed the lower Ohio court's judgment for the plaintiff. Five of the justices held that the statute created a new right of action unknown to the common law, that this action was for the killing of Ohio citizens and that the statute did not discriminate, because persons suffering loss from such a killing might sue in Ohio regardless of their citizenship. Holmes, J., concurred specially on the ground that the statute made a forbidden discrimination, was wholly invalid, and no one could sue under it. Harlan, White, and McKenna, JJ., dissented, on the ground that the distinction based upon citizenship of the deceased produced a forbidden discrimination, for example, the statute accorded to an Ohio widow of an Ohio citizen a privilege which it with-

STATE v. STEVENS.

1916. Supreme Court of New Hampshire. 78 N. H. 268.

Appeal from conviction and sentence by the municipal court of Portsmouth upon a complaint for offering for sale and selling without a license lightning rods and material for the protection of buildings from damage by lightning, in violation of c. 128, Laws 1915. * * * July 29, 1915, the defendant, then a resident of Massachusetts, as the agent of the National Standard Company of Michigan, —the company being duly licensed to do business in this state,— at North Hampton, sold lightning rods without having a license as such agent. The defendant and the company had previously applied to the insurance commissioner for an agent's license for the defendant, which was refused for the sole reason that the defendant was not a resident of this state.

Parsons, C. J.—Chapter 128, Laws 1915, is entitled, "An Act to regulate the sale of lightning rods." * * * Section 3 is, "Upon written notice from a licensed manufacturer under this act of the appointment of a suitable person to act as his agent in this state, and upon the presentation of a certificate of his good reputation and moral character, signed by the mayor or selectmen of the city or town of which he is a resident, the insurance commissioner may, if he is satisfied that the appointee is a suitable person, issue to him a license as such agent, upon the receipt of a fee of two dollars. Such license shall continue in force one year from date of issue, but may be revoked at any time by the insurance commissioner for good cause and after a hearing. Such agents shall be residents of the state." * * *

The restriction of the statute applies equally whether at the time of license the agent is a citizen of New Hampshire or of some other state. The citizen of New Hampshire while claiming the benefit of the license cannot abandon his residence here, nor can the citizen of another state claim the rights of a licensee without establishing and maintaining such a residence here as will comply with the law. held from a Pennsylvania widow of a Pennsylvania citizen. These three justices voted for reversal of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

A Wisconsin statute giving "all persons, residents of this state," exemption from civil process while in military service of the United States during the "present war" was held not to offend Art. IV, § 2, Cl. 1, because by implication the exemption extended to citizens of other states "in the absence of language expressly limiting the Act to citizens of this state." Konkel v. State (1919) 168 Wis. 335, 170 N. W. 715.

was not required that the Massachusetts citizen taking out a license should become a citizen of the state, but only that he should reside here. Although the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution declares that citizens of the United States are citizens of the states in which they reside, there may be a temporary residence in one state, with intent to return to another, which will not create citizenship in the former. Bradwell v. State, 16 Wall. 130, 138. This seems a sufficient answer to the claim of discrimination against the citizens of other states. The provision does not differ from legislative and constitutional provisions requiring a certain term of residence as an essential to holding office or exercising the electoral franchise. As such provisions bear equally upon the citizens of the state and upon those who may come from other states there is no discrimination.

But it is unnecessary to rest the decision upon so narrow a ground or to take time to discuss the distinctions between residence, citizenship and inhabitancy. * * * It is clear that the statute abridges the right of sale both of the manufacturer of lightning-rod material and of those who otherwise might represent him as agents. If authority for such abridgment does not exist in the state despite the federal law, the whole statute is invalid. But, as was said in Giozza v. Tiernan, 148 U. S. 657, 662, of the Fourteenth Amendment, "The Amendment does not take from the states those powers of police that were reserved at the time the original Constitution was adopted. * * * It was not designed to interfere with the power of the state to protect the lives, liberty and property of its citizens, and to promote their health, morals, education and good order." In re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 449; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 31; Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 581, 604. Neither the article of the Constitution relied upon, nor the Amendment, abridges the right of protection inherent in the state and reserved when the constitution was adopted. DeGrazier v. Stephens, 101 Tex. 194, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1033; Kohn v. Melcher (Shiras, J.) 29 Fed. Rep. 433, 437; Commonwealth v. Hana, 195 Mass. 262, 265; Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36. "The police power of the state extends to the protection of the lives, health, comfort and quiet of all persons and the protection of all property within the state; and persons and property are subjected to such restraints and burdens as are reasonably necessary to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity. * * * The state has authority to make regulations as to the time, mode, and circumstances under which parties shall assert, enjoy, or exercise their rights without coming in conflict with any of those constitutional principles which are established for the protection of private rights and private property." State v. White, 64 N. H. 48, 50. Conflict with Section 2, Art. IV, of the Constitution of the United States has been claimed in cases where the law limited licenses for the sale of liquor to residents of the state. In all these cases it has been considered that the state having power to regulate the sale of liquor, the limitation being intended to effect such regulation and not merely to secure a special privilege to citizens of the state was not rendered void by any provisions of the federal Constitution or Amendments thereof. DeGrazier v. Stephens, 101 Tex. 194, * * *.[12]

The same principles are now involved. Is the legislation restricting the sale of lightning rods an exercise of the police power for the protection of the lives and property of the people of the state, and if so, is the restriction complained of a reasonable regulation made in good faith for the execution of the legislative purpose? 40 L. R. A.

[12] "The question then arises, is the provision as to the residence of an applicant for a liquor dealer's license a mere guise for a discrimination against non-residents, or does it tend to further the object of the statute regulating the liquor traffic? We think it should be answered that it is not a mere guise to evade the effect of the constitutional provisions under consideration; but that it is calculated to promote the objects of the act in substantial respects. In the first place, there are numerous acts forbidden under the statute in question and numerous penalties prescribed as against liquor dealers for their infringement. Also actions are authorized upon the bonds they are required to give as a condition precedent to their carrying on the business. It is reasonable therefore that they should be required to reside in the county in which the business is carried on, to the end that they may be arrested in case of an infringement of the law, or subject to the process of the court in case suit may be brought on the bond. In the second place, the act requires that the licensee shall be 'a law-abiding, tax-paying, male citizen of the State of Texas.' If the character of the applicant enters into the question, what more reasonable, than that he should be required to be a resident of the county for a sufficient length of time to establish the necessary qualifications in that respect. The statute allows a contest by any resident tax-paying citizen or owner in the block or square where said business is to be conducted or by any County Attorney or District Attorney, to determine whether the applicant is qualified; and it seems reasonable that some qualifications as to continued residence would be helpful in enabling them to ascertain the facts and to maintain the contest." De Grazier v. Stevens (1907) 101 Tex. 194, 196, 105 S. W. 992, annotated in 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1033, and in 16 Ann. Cas. 1059, 1060. Accord, as to licenses for sale of intoxicants: Austin v. State (1847) 10 Mo. 591; Welsh v. State (1890) 126 Ind. 71, 25 N. E. 883, 9 L. R. A. 664; Kohn v. Melcher (1887) 29 Fed. 433; Mette v. McGuckin (1885) 18 Nebr. 323, 25 N. W. 338, affirmed in Mette v. McGuckin (1892) 149 U. S. 781, 37 L. ed. 934, by a divided court without opinion.

Upon reasoning similar to that quoted above it has been held that a state may require an individual conducting a bank or one member of a firm of bankers to be a resident of the state. State v. Richcreek (1906) 167 Ind. 217, 77 N. E. 1085, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 874, 119 Am. St. 491, 10 Ann. Cas. 899. So also a statute is valid which requires a license to be obtained by any person lending money at a rate of interest over 10 per cent., and provides that only bona fide residents of the state are eligible. State v. Ware (1916) 79 Ore. 367, 154 Pac. 905, 155 Pac. 364. But citizens of other states are entitled to engage in the business of insurance upon the same terms with citizens of the state. State ex rel. Hoadley v. Board of Insurance Comrs. (1896) 37 Fla. 564, 20 So. 772, 33 L. R. A. 288; Barnes v. People ex rel. Moloney (1897) 168 Ill. 425, 430, 48 N. E. 91, where the court said, "If, as contended, the provision is intended as a police regulation for the protection of the citizens of this state from irresponsible underwriters acting individually and without incorporation or organization under any law, the same necessity applies in the case of the irresponsible and conscienceless underwriter who is a citizen of this state. If the business of insurance, on account of its importance and nature, is a proper subject for the exercise of the police power, such power must extend to and operate upon the citizens of this state and other states equally. A discrimination directed only against underwriters residing without the state is invalid."

(N. S.) 284, note. "It must be conceded that a state cannot under the guise of the police power make a discrimination for which no good reason can be assigned." DeGrazier v. Stephens, supra, p. 196. [Various prior statutes attempting to regulate the sale of lightning rods in the state are here summarized.]

A comparison of these provisions [of the present statute] with the earlier law shows that it was not the purpose to prohibit the use of lightning rods,—an intention which might be ascribed to the previous statute. P. S., c. 123, §§ 5, 6, 7. Instead of requiring a license fee of $300 of whoever might go about to sell, principal or agent, the total license fee to manufacturer and agent is $52. While the insurance commissioner is required to approve the manufacturer's product, he is not required to be satisfied that the proposed material will protect against lightning but only of the good faith and solvency of the manufacturer. The object is plain to protect from fraud and the dangers which might arise from unrestricted sale of a material which might increase the risk of, instead of preventing damage by lightning. As such protection is within the legislative power, the question is, not whether some provision of the act restricts to some extent private rights, but whether the purpose of the provision is the execution of the protective purpose, and whether, if enacted for such purpose, such provision unreasonably limits private right. Carter v. Craig, 77 N. H. 200. It cannot be urged that the purpose of the restriction was to preserve for residents of this state a monopoly of acting as agents for lightning-rod manufacturers. The language of Section 3 in reference to the appointment of agents proves that the draftsman of the act had in mind the provisions of the statute, requiring the agents of foreign insurance companies to be residents of the state, which has been the law of the state since 1889. P. S., c. 169, §§ 7, 8; Laws 1889, c. 86, § 2. The respondent as a citizen of Massachusetts does not come here to exercise an ordinary trade or calling, but to act as agent for another, to exercise a sort of office.

"Whenever the legislature prohibits any calling or profession, it ceases to be a lawful pursuit; and when the legislature do [sic] not prohibit it, but allow it to be exercised by certain persons, having certain qualifications specified in the law, it then becomes a municipal privilege, which may be only exercised by those persons who have the qualifications, and pursue the steps required by the law. It would be strange indeed, that the moment a citizen of another state sets his foot on our soil, he is to be considered as entitled to all the political,[13] and municipal privileges enjoyed by our own citizens, without regard to the constitution and laws of this state. And yet the words of the federal Constitution are without qualification. If we agree to exclude political privileges from the number of privileges and immunities which the Constitution of the United States declares citizens of other states shall be entitled to, there is the same reason for extending the limitation to municipal privileges. And selling spirituous liquors in quantities less than one quart, is in this state a privilege granted only to those having the qualifications pointed out in the act. A residence of two years in the state, is one of the qualifications which the legislature have thought proper to require in the city of St. Louis; and this qualification, we consider, is no more liable to constitutional objections than a residence of one year before a citizen from another state is allowed to vote, or a residence of five years before he can be elected to the legislature." Austin v. State, 10 Mo. 591, 594. The legislature thought it wise that one desiring to act as the agent of another in the sale of lightning rods should at least take up such a residence here, as would render him amenable to the process of, and bring him within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state. The provision does not so unreasonably affect the defendant's common law right to act as agent of a lightning-rod manufacturer, which he claims is preserved to him by the Constitution of the United States, that the court can declare it void. State v. Prince, 77 N. H. 581. It is said that the business of retailing liquor is one peculiar to itself, which the legislature might wholly prohibit, or as to which it might confine the license to a limited number. Templar v. State Board, 131 Mich. 254, 258, 100 Am. St. Rep. 610. But the difference is one of degree, not of principle, and no reason is perceived why the legislature, convinced by scientific investigation or the general sense of the community that lightning rods were more dangerous than useful, might not wholly prohibit their sale. There can be no natural inalienable right to sell lightning rods any more than there is to sell liquor, consequently there can be no natural right to sell as agent. It is to be conceded that a citizen of another state cannot be taxed a greater sum for a privilege allowed him here than is levied upon the citizens of the state. State v. Wiggin, 64 N. H. 508; State v. Lancaster, 63 N. H. 267; Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 430. It is argued that to deny the privilege of an occupation is a greater discrimination than an inequality of burden. State v. Montgomery, property is a governmental function and these capacities are a sort of public office. In re Mulford (1905) 217 Ill. 242, 75 N. E. 345, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 341, 108 Am. In re Estate of McWhirter (1908) 235 Ill. 607, 85 N. E. 918. Compare Duryea v. Muse (1903) 117 Wis. 399, 94 N. W. 365 (eligibility or capacity to act as assignee for the benefit of creditors may be restricted to residents of the state). But compare Shirk v. City of La Fayette (1892) 52 Fed. 857 (statute forbidding appointment of nonresidents as trustees in deeds, mortgages, etc., is invalid.)

94 Me. 192, 80 Am. St. Rep. 386. The inequality of burden, invalid as an exercise of the taxing power, cannot be sustained under the police power because admission to the privilege on some terms concedes the inapplicability of the police power. In Bliss' Petition, 63 N. H. 135, the question presented was considered as presenting a question of inequality of taxation. Whether upon any grounds a state could confine the privilege of itinerant salesman to citizens of the county in which they reside was not considered and need not now be discussed. See Commonwealth v. Hana, 195 Mass. 262, 265.

The conclusion is that the statute does not discriminate against citizens of other states and that if it could be construed to do so, the discrimination is one that the state could lawfully make.[14]

Judgment for the state.

FERRY v. SPOKANE, PORTLAND AND SEATTLE RY. CO.

1922. Supreme Court of the United States. 258 U. S. 314.

Mr. Justice McKenna delivered the opinion of the court.

By a bill filed in the district court of the United States for the district of Oregon, appellant asserted a dower right in one half part of certain land in possession of the railway company.

[14] A statute of Nevada provided that no person should thereafter practice medicine in the state without a diploma from a medical school or unless he had practiced medicine in the state for ten years next preceding the passage of the statute. This statute was sustained. The court admitted that citizens of other states were entitled to practice medicine in Nevada "on precisely the same terms and subject only to the same restrictions" as Nevada citizens, and said that the statute made "no distinction in terms between our own and citizens of other states. It merely prescribes the qualifications that practitioners are required to possess and admits all to practice who can bring themselves within the rule, whether they are citizens of this state or other states. But it is argued that one of the sorts of qualifications recognized is such, that of necessity none but citizens of this state can possess it. This is so, but it does not follow, therefore, that the law is unconstitutional; for if the qualification is in itself reasonable, and such as tends to subserve public interests, the legislature had a right to exact it, and the circumstance that citizens of other states can not possess it may be a misfortune to them, but is no reason why a precaution, proper in itself, should be dispensed with." Elsewhere in the opinion the court stated that the reasonableness of the discrimination might be found in that physicians who had had ten years' experience outside the state might "be reasonably safe advisers in the locality and among the diseases they are accustomed to" yet "might be very unsafe advisers in another locality and climate, among a population mainly employed in other avocations, and where as a consequence different diseases prevail." Ex parte Spinney (1875) 10 Nev. 323. With less show of reasoning many other courts have sustained nearly identical statutes, among these: State ex rel. Walker v. Green (1887) 112 Ind. 462, 14 N. E. 352; People v. Phippin (1888) 70 Mich. 6, 37 N. W. 888; State v. Creditor (1890) 44 Kans. 565, 24 Pac. 346, 21 Am. St. 306; State v. Rosenkrans (1910) 30 R. I. 374, 75 Atl. 491, 19 Ann. Cas. 824. Contra: State v. Hinman (1889) 65 N. H. 103, 105, 18 Atl. 194, 23 Am. St. 22.

A Wisconsin statute required both a diploma and an examination by a state board as pre-requisites to license to practice medicine, except that "any stu-

The bill was dismissed on motion of the railway company, and the company was awarded judgment for costs. On appeal by the complainant in the suit, the judgment was affirmed. Against the affirmance this appeal is prosecuted.

The law of Oregon provides: "The widow of every deceased person shall be entitled to dower, or the use, during her natural life, of one half of the lands whereof her husband was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage, unless she is lawfully barred thereof." Lord's Oregon Laws, § 7286.

"A woman being an alien shall not on that account be barred of her dower; and any woman residing out of the state shall be entitled to dower of the lands of her deceased husband lying in this state of which her husband died seised, and the same may be assigned to her, or recovered by her, in like manner as if she and her deceased husband had been residents within the state at the time of his death." § 7306.

Appellant adduces against the validity of § 7306, the provision of § 2 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states," and the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment which declare that no state shall "make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States" or "deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law" or "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Dower is not a privilege or immunity of citizenship, either state or federal, within the meaning of the provisions relied on. At most it is a right which, while it exists, is attached to the marital contract or relation; and it always has been deemed subject to regulation by each state as respects property within its limits. dent who is now matriculated in any medical college of this state" which required specified courses should be admitted on diploma only. Held that this statute made no discrimination between citizens of that and other states. State ex rel. Kellog v. Currans (1901) 111 Wis. 431, 87 N. W. 561, 56 L. R. A. 252.

[15] In the cited case it appears that the Louisiana Code confined the community property regime to spouses who married within that state and to spouses married outside the state who became domiciled in the state and in the latter case only with respect to property acquired after arrival of the spouses in the state. A married B in Mississippi where they were domiciled throughout the marriage. B, the husband, acquired property in Louisiana during the marriage. It was held that Art. IV, § 2, Cl. 1, did not entitle the "Mississippi widow" to community rights in the Louisiana property. The court said, "The laws of Louisiana affix certain incidents to a contract of marriage there made, or there partly or wholly executed, not because those who enter into such contracts are citizens of the state, but because they there make or perform the contract. And they refuse to affix these incidents to such contracts, made and executed elsewhere, not because the married persons are not citizens of Louisiana, but because their contract being made and performed under the laws of some other state or country, it is deemed proper not to interfere, by Louisiana laws, with the relations of married persons out of that state. Whether persons contracting marriage in Louisiana are citizens of that or some other state, or aliens, the law equally ap-

Fourteenth Amendment takes from the several states the power to regulate this subject; nor does either make it a privilege or immunity of citizenship. Maxwell v. Bugbee, 250 U. S. 525, 537, 538, and cases cited; United States v. Wheeler, 254 U. S. 281, 296.

The further contention based on the Fourteenth Amendment necessarily is, as counsel urge, that dower is "fundamental and substantial"—"a property right, being while inchoate, a chose in action, of which no citizen of the United States, wherever he [she] may be resident can be deprived without 'due process of law,' and as to which every person is entitled to the 'equal protection of the laws' as provided in the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution."

The Court of Appeals considered this contention, and it is difficult to add anything to its opinion. It pointed out that the Oregon statute was taken from the laws of Michigan adopted in 1846 and sustained.[16] The example of Michigan was followed in Wisconsin, Kansas and Nebraska and sustained by the courts of those states.[17]

To the decisions of those courts we may add Thornburn v. Doscher, U. S. Circuit Court for Oregon, 32 Fed. 810, which sustained the Oregon statute as did the Supreme Court of Oregon in Cunningham v. Friendly, 70 Ore. 222. And we may add also Richards v. Belingham Bay Land Co., 54 Fed. 209, which decided to be legal a like statute of the State of Washington. And Blackstone speaks of dower as having become "a great clog to alienation" and "otherwise inconvenient to families." 1 Washburn on Real Property 5th Ed. 278, in note.

The cases recognize that the limitation of the dower right is to remove an impediment to the transfer of real estate and to assure titles against absent and probably unknown wives. And such is the purpose of the Oregon statute, and the means of executing the purpose appropriate, and a proper exercise of classification. It satisfies, therefore, the constitutional requirement of the equal protection of the laws; and we proceed to the inquiry whether the statute is otherwise valid.

Appellant's contention is that though she be living in New York, it is her privilege under the Fourteenth Amendment to resist the plies to their contract; and so, whether persons married and domiciled elsewhere, be or not be citizens or aliens, the law fails to regulate their rights. The law does not discriminate between citizens of the state and other persons; it discriminates between contracts only. Such discrimination has no connection with the clause in the constitution now in question."

The student should consider whether this decision supports the principal case. Compare the common requirement of a period of residence within a state to entitle one to sue for divorce in the courts of the state.

law of Oregon as a limitation of her dower rights, that is a limitation of rights in property situated in Oregon. The contention might be tenable if the legislature of a state was required to grant dower rights. As repellant of that proposition, the difference the laws of the states exhibit in the rights that attach to the marriage relation may be adduced. The states greatly differ as to what lands are dowable, and as to what claims are paramount to dower, and to some extent, how it will be barred. 4 Kent 35, et seq.

The granting of dower, therefore, is a matter of statutory regulation. It was so decided by the United States Circuit Court of Oregon in 1887. (Thornburn v. Doscher, supra), Judge Deady expressing it as follows: "It rests with the legislature to say what interest, if any, married persons shall have in the property of each other, as an incident of the relation between them. It may give or withhold dower altogether. Or it may for the security of titles, and the protection of innocent purchasers, provide that a non-resident woman whose very existence is probably unknown within the state, and is practically disavowed by the husband, shall not be entitled to dower of lands which he has disposed of without her concurrence or consent, and ostensibly as a single man." The law thus declared has been the law of Oregon for 65 years.

There is a distinction between dower created by the parties and that given by law, and the latter "is believed to be the only kind which ever obtained in this country." Randall v. Kreiger, 23 Wall. 137, 148. Expressing the power of the legislature over it, the court said: "During the life of the husband the right is a mere expectancy or possibility. In that condition of things, the lawmaking power may deal with it as may be deemed proper. It is not a natural right. It is wholly given by law, and the power that gave it may increase, diminish, or otherwise alter it, or wholly take it away. It is upon the same footing with the expectancy of heirs, apparent or presumptive, before the death of the ancestor. Until that event occurs, the law of descent and distribution may be molded according to the will of the legislature."

The ruling is a deduction or incident of the more general principle expressed in Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat. 565, 570, "that the title to, and the disposition of, real property, must be exclusively subject to the laws of the country where it is situated." And this was so considered and the case cited in Thomas v. Woods, 173 Fed. 585, 593, along with a number of other cases, to sustain the court in the declaration and decision that "the right of dower in real property is determined by the laws of the state in which the property is situated."

From these cases it results, as said by the Circuit Court of Appeals, that, "the legislature having this power to give or withhold dower, it follows that it has the power to declare the manner in which the dower right may be barred, or the grounds upon which it may be forfeited, and if so, it has the right to provide that it may be barred by the wife's nonresidence in the state." [268 Fed. 120.]

The action of the court, affirming the decree of the District Court, is affirmed.

CANADIAN NORTHERN R. CO. v. EGGEN.

1920. Supreme Court of the United States. 252 U. S. 553.

Mr. Justice Clarke delivered the opinion of the court.

The only question presented for decision in this case is as to the validity of § 7709 of the statutes of Minnesota (General Statutes of Minnesota, 1913), which reads:

"When a cause of action has arisen outside of this state and, by the laws of the place where it arose, an action thereon is there barred by lapse of time, no such action shall be maintained in this state unless the plaintiff be a citizen of the state who has owned the cause of action ever since it accrued."

statute

The Circuit Court of Appeals, reversing the District Court, held this statute invalid for the reason that the exemption in favor of citizens of Minnesota rendered it repugnant to Article IV, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

The action was commenced in the District Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota, Second Division, by the respondent, a citizen of South Dakota, against the petitioner, a corporation organized under the laws of the Dominion of Canada, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him on November 29, 1913, when employed by the petitioner as a switchman in its yards at Humboldt, in the Province of Saskatchewan. The respondent, a citizen and resident of South Dakota, went to Canada and entered the employ of the petitioner as a switchman a short time prior to the accident complained of. He remained in Canada for six months after the accident and then returned to live in South Dakota. He commenced this action on October 15, 1915, almost two years after the date of the accident. By the laws of Canada, where the cause of action arose, an action of this kind must be commenced within one year from the time injury was sustained. If the statute of Minnesota, above quoted is valid, it is applicable to the action, which, being barred in Canada, cannot be maintained in Minnesota by a nonresident plaintiff. If, however, the statute is invalid, the general statute of limitations of Minnesota, allowing a period of six years within which to commence action, would be applicable. The record properly presents the claim of the petitioner that the Circuit Court of Appeals erred in holding the statute involved unconstitutional and void.

It is plain that the act assailed was not enacted for the purpose of creating an arbitrary or vexatious discrimination against nonresidents of Minnesota.

It has been in force ever since the state was admitted into the Union in 1858; it is in terms precisely the same as those of several other states, and in substance it does not differ from those of many more. It gives a nonresident the same rights in the Minnesota courts as a resident citizen has, for a time equal to that of the statute of limitations where his cause of action arose. If a resident citizen acquires such a cause of action after it has accrued, his rights are limited precisely as those of the nonresident are, by the laws of the place where it arose. If the limitation of the foreign state is equal to or longer than that of the Minnesota statute, the nonresident's position is as favorable as that of the citizen.

It is only when the foreign limitation is shorter than that of Minnesota, and when the nonresident who owns the cause of action from the time when it arose has slept on his rights until it is barred in the foreign state (which happens to be the respondent's case), that inequality results—and for this we are asked to declare a statute unconstitutional which has been in force for sixty years.

This court has never attempted to formulate a comprehensive list of the rights included within the "privileges and immunities" clause of the Constitution, Art. IV, Sec. 2, but it has repeatedly approved as authoritative the statement by Mr. Justice Washington, in 1823, in Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, 380 (the first federal case in which this clause was considered), saying: "We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are, in their nature, fundamental." Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 76; Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 248; Chambers v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., 207 U. S. 142, 155. In this Corfield case the court included in a partial list of such fundamental privileges, "The right of a citizen of one state, * * * to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of another."

The State of Minnesota, in the statute we are considering, recognized this right of citizens of other states to institute and maintain suits in its courts as a fundamental right, protected by the Constitution, and for one year from the time his cause of action accrued the respondent was given all of the rights which citizens of Minnesota had under it. The discrimination of which he complains could arise only from his own neglect.

This is not disputed, nor can it be fairly claimed that the limitation of one year is unduly short, having regard to the likelihood of the dispersing of witnesses to accidents such as that in which the respondent was injured, their exposure to injury and death, and the failure of memory as to the minute details of conduct on which questions of negligence so often turn.—Thus, the holding of the Circuit Court of Appeals comes to this, that the privilege and immunity clause of the Constitution guarantees to a nonresident precisely the same rights in the courts of a state as resident citizens have, and that any statute which gives him a less, even though it be an adequate remedy, is unconstitutional and void.

Such a literal interpretation of the clause cannot be accepted.

From very early in our history, requirements have been imposed upon nonresidents in many, perhaps in all, of the states as a condition of resorting to their courts, which have not been imposed upon resident citizens. For instance, security for costs has very generally been required of a nonresident, but not of a resident citizen, and a nonresident's property in many States may be attached under conditions which would not justify the attaching of a resident citizen's property. This court has said of such requirements:

"Such a regulation of the internal affairs of a state cannot reasonably be characterized as hostile to the fundamental rights of citizens of other states. * * * It has never been supposed that regulations of that character materially interfered with the enjoyment by citizens of each State of the privileges and immunities secured by the Constitution to citizens of the several states." Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 256.

The principle on which this holding rests is that the constitutional requirement is satisfied if the nonresident is given access to the courts of the state upon terms which in themselves are reasonable and adequate for the enforcing of any rights he may have, even though they may not be technically and precisely the same in extent as those accorded to resident citizens. The power is in the courts, ultimately in this court, to determine the adequacy and reasonableness of such terms. A man cannot be said to be denied, in a constitutional or in any rational sense, the privilege of resorting to courts to enforce his rights when he is given free access to them for a length of time reasonably sufficient to enable an ordinarily diligent man to institute proceedings for their protection.

This is the principle on which this court has repeatedly ruled that contracts were not impaired in a constitutional sense by change in limitation statutes which reduced the time for commencing actions upon them, provided a reasonable time was given for commencing suit before the new bar took effect. Sohn v. Waterson, 17 Wall. 596; Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 632; Tennessee v. Sneed, 96 U. S. 69, 74; Antoni v. Greenhow, 107 U. S. 769, 774.

A like result to that which we are announcing was reached with respect to similar statutes, in Chemung Canal Bank v. Lowery, 93 U. S. 72;[18] by the Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, in

Aultman & Taylor Co. v. Syme, 79 Fed. Rep. 238; in Klotz v. Angle, 220 N. Y. 347, and in Robinson v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Co., 112 N. Y. 315, 324. In this last case the Court of Appeals of New York pertinently says:

"A construction of the constitutional limitation [the one we are considering] which would apply it to such a case as this would strike down a large body of laws which have existed in all the states from the foundation of the government, making some discrimination between residents and nonresidents in legal proceedings and other matters."

The laws of Minnesota gave to the nonresident respondent free access to its courts, for the purpose of enforcing any right which he may have had, for a year,—as long a time as was given him for that purpose by the laws under which he chose to live and work—and having neglected to avail himself of that law, he may not successfully complain because his expired right to maintain suit elsewhere is not revived for his benefit by the laws of the state to which he went for the sole purpose of prosecuting his suit. The privilege extended to him for enforcing his claim was reasonably sufficient and adequate and the statute is a valid law.

It results that the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals must be reversed and that of the District Court affirmed.

of the state but should run against a nonresident plaintiff. The only reasoning in support of this discrimination was: "There is, in fact, a valid reason for the discrimination. If the statute does not run as between nonresident creditors and their debtors, it might often happen that a right of action would be extinguished, perhaps for years, in the state where the parties reside; and yet, if the defendant should be found in Wisconsin,—it may be only in a railroad train,—a suit could be sprung upon him after the claim had been forgotten. The laws of Wisconsin would thus be used as a trap to catch the unwary defendant, after the laws which had always governed the case had barred any recovery. This would be inequitable and unjust. Beardsley v. Southmayd, 3 N. J. L. (Green) 171."

[1] These cases provoked one of the most prolonged states of indecision that the Supreme Court has ever experienced. The membership of the court had completely changed since the decision in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857). The Fourteenth Amendment (the second of the Reconstruction Amendments) became operative July 28, 1868, and was now before the court for its first interpretation. The records in the cases were filed in the Supreme Court in 1870. The cases were argued in January, 1872, and reargued in February, 1873, and in April were decided by a 5 to 4 majority.

These cases are brought here by writs of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana. They arise out of the efforts of the butchers of New Orleans to resist the Crescent City Live-Stock Landing and Slaughter-House Company in the exercise of certain powers conferred by the charter which created it, and which was granted by the legislature of that state. * * *

The records show that the plaintiffs in error relied upon, and asserted throughout the entire course of the litigation in the state courts, that the grant of privileges in the charter of defendant, which they were contesting, was a violation of the most important provisions of the thirteenth and fourteenth articles of amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The jurisdiction and the duty of this court to review the judgment of the state court on those questions is clear and is imperative.

The statute thus assailed as unconstitutional was passed March 8, 1869, and is entitled "An Act to protect the health of the City of New Orleans, to locate the stock-landings and slaughter-houses, and to incorporate the Crescent City Live-Stock Landing and Slaughter-House Company."

The first section forbids the landing or slaughtering of animals whose flesh is intended for food, within the city of New Orleans and other parishes and boundaries named and defined, or the keeping or establishing any slaughter-houses or abattoirs within those limits, except by the corporation thereby created, which is also limited to certain places afterwards mentioned. Suitable penalties are enacted for violations of this prohibition.

The second section designates the corporators, gives the name to the corporation, and confers on it the usual corporate powers.

The third and fourth sections authorize the company to establish and erect within certain territorial limits, therein defined, one or more stockyards, stock-landings, and slaughter-houses, and impose upon it the duty of erecting, on or before the first day of June, 1869, one grand slaughter-house of sufficient capacity for slaughtering five hundred animals per day.

It declares that the company, after it shall have prepared all the necessary buildings, yards, and other conveniences for that purpose, shall have the sole and exclusive privilege of conducting and carrying on the live-stock landing and slaughter-house business within the limits and privilege granted by the Act, and that all such animals shall be landed at the stock-landings and slaughtered at the slaughter-houses of the company, and nowhere else. Penalties are enacted for infractions of this provision, and prices fixed for the maximum charges of the company for each steamboat and for each animal landed.

Section five orders the closing up of all other stock-landings and slaughter-houses after the first day of June, in the parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and St. Bernard, and makes it the duty of the company to permit any person to slaughter animals in their slaughter-houses under a heavy penalty for each refusal. Another section fixes a limit to the charges to be made by the company for each animal so slaughtered in their building, and another provides for an inspection of all animals intended to be so slaughtered, by an officer appointed by the governor of the state for that purpose. * * *

The Act divides itself into two main grants of privilege,—the one in reference to stock-landings and stock-yards, and the other to slaughter-houses. That the landing of live-stock in large droves, from steamboats on the bank of the river, and from railroad trains, should, for the safety and comfort of the people and the care of the animals, be limited to proper places, and those not numerous, it needs no argument to prove. Nor can it be injurious to the general community that while the duty of making ample preparation for this is imposed upon a few men, or a corporation, they should, to enable them to do it successfully, have the exclusive right of providing such landing-places, and receiving a fair compensation for the service.

It is, however, the slaughter-house privilege, which is mainly relied on to justify the charges of gross injustice to the public, and invasion of private right.

It is not, and cannot be successfully controverted, that it is both the right and the duty of the legislative body—the supreme power of the state or municipality—to prescribe and determine the localities where the business of slaughtering for a great city may be conducted. To do this effectively it is indispensable that all persons who slaughter animals for food shall do it in those places and nowhere else.

The statute under consideration defines these localities and forbids slaughtering in any other. It does not, as has been asserted, prevent the butcher from doing his own slaughtering. On the contrary, the Slaughter-House Company is required, under a heavy penalty, to permit any person who wishes to do so, to slaughter in their houses; and they are bound to make ample provision for the convenience of all the slaughtering for the entire city. The butcher then is still permitted to slaughter, to prepare, and to sell his own meats; but he is required to slaughter at a specified place and to pay a reasonable compensation for the use of the accommodations furnished him at that place.

The wisdom of the monopoly granted by the legislature may be open to question, but it is difficult to see a justification for the assertion that the butchers are deprived of the right to labor in their occupation, or the people of their daily service in preparing food, or how this statute, with the duties and guards imposed upon the company, can be said to destroy the business of the butcher, or seriously interfere with its pursuit.

The power here exercised by the legislature of Louisiana is, in its essential nature, one which has been, up to the present period in the constitutional history of this country, always conceded to belong to the states, however it may now be questioned in some of its details. * * *

It may, therefore, be considered as established, that the authority of the legislature of Louisiana to pass the present statute is ample, unless some restraint in the exercise of that power be found in the constitution of that state or in the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, adopted since the date of the decisions we have already cited.

If any such restraint is supposed to exist in the constitution of the state, the Supreme Court of Louisiana having necessarily passed on that question, it would not be open to review in this court.

The plaintiffs in error accepting this issue, allege that the statute is a violation of the Constitution of the United States in these several particulars:— * * *

That it abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States; * * *.

The first section of the fourteenth article, to which our attention is more specially invited, opens with a definition of citizenship—not only citizenship of the United States, but citizenship of the states. * * *

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States, and a citizenship of a state, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several states. The argument, however, in favor of the plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same, and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a state against the legislative power of his own state, that the word citizen of the state should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to citizens of the United States, in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the state, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the state as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested; for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

The first occurrence of the words "privileges and immunities" in our constitutional history, is to be found in the fourth of the Articles of the old Confederation. * * *

In the Constitution of the United States, which superseded the Articles of Confederation, the corresponding provision is found in section two of the fourth article, in the following words: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." * * *

Fortunately we are not without judicial construction of this clause of the Constitution. * * * [Here the court cites and briefly considers Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 430, and Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 180.]

The constitutional provision there alluded to did not create those rights, which it called privileges and immunities of citizens of the states. It threw around them in that clause no security for the citizen of the state in which they were claimed or exercised. Nor did it profess to control the power of the state governments over the rights of its own citizens.

Its sole purpose was to declare to the several states, that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify, or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other states within your jurisdiction.

It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority, that up to the adoption of the recent amendments, no claim or pretence was set up that those rights depended on the federal government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the federal Constitution imposed upon the states—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the states, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the states, and without that of the federal government. Was it the purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment, by the simple declaration that no state should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned, from the states to the federal government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the states?

All this and more must follow, if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by state legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the states, in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction followed by the reversal of the judgments of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in these cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the states, on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights, as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument, we admit, is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the state governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress, in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the state and federal governments to each other and of both these governments to the people; the argument has a force that is irresistible in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the legislatures of the states which ratified them.

Having shown that the privileges and immunities relied on in the argument are those which belong to citizens of the states as such, and that they are left to the state governments for security and protection, and not by this article placed under the special care of the federal government, we may hold ourselves excused from defining the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which no state can abridge, until some case involving those privileges may make it necessary to do so.

But lest it should be said that no such privileges and immunities are to be found if those we have been considering are excluded, we venture to suggest some which owe their existence to the federal government, its national character, its Constitution, or its laws.[2]

One of these is well described in the case of Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. 36. It is said to be the (a)[3] right of the citizen of this great country, protected by implied guarantees of its Constitution, "to come to the seat of government to assert any claim he may have upon that government, to transact any business he may have with it, to seek its protection, to share its offices, to engage in administering its functions. He has the right of free access to its seaports, through which all operations of foreign commerce are conducted, to the sub-treasuries, land offices, and courts of justices in the several states." And quoting from the language of Chief Justice Taney in another case, it is said "that for all the great purposes for which the federal government was established, we are one people, with one common country, we are all citizens of the United States;" and it is, as such citizens, that their rights are supported in this court in Crandall v. Nevada.

[2] The court's wording of the definition, in the light of the examples given, comes down to this, the privileges or immunities, which by this clause a state may not abridge, are only those that are conferred by national law upon a person who is a citizen, conferred upon him as a citizen eo nomine or upon him in common with other persons.

"Privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States [within the protection of this clause] * * * are only such as arise out of the nature and essential character of the national government, or are specifically granted or secured to all citizens or persons by the Constitution of the United States." Moody, J., for the court in Twining v. New Jersey (1908) 211 U. S. 77, 78, 97, 53 L. ed. 97.

"The privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, are privileges and immunities arising out of the nature and essential character of the federal government, and granted or secured by the Constitution * * *." Fuller, C. J., for the court in Duncan v. Missouri (1894) 152 U. S. 377, 382, 38 L. ed. 485. And see similar language of the same justice in In re Kemmler (1890) 136 U. S. 436, 448, 34 L. ed. 519 and in Giozza v. Tiernan (1893) 148 U. S. 657, 661, 37 L. ed. 599. The language used in Re Kemmler is quoted with approval in Orr v. Gilman (1902) 183 U. S. 278, 286, 46 L. ed. 196.

"The privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States [within the protection of this clause] are those which arise out of the nature and essential character of the national government, the provisions of its Constitution, or its laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof * * *." Fuller, C. J., for the court in McPherson v. Blacker (1892) 146 U. S. 1, 38, 36 L. ed. 869.

"If the plaintiff in error has any such privilege, he must be able to point to the provision of the Constitution or statutes of the United States by which it is conferred." Woods, J., for the court in Presser v. Illinois (1886) 116 U. S. 252, 266, 29 L. ed. 615.

Moreover, the specific national law from which the alleged immunity is adduced must have been set up below; a contention that the state's action complained of violates merely the privileges and immunities clause is too general to support an appeal or writ of error. Cox v. Texas (1906) 202 U. S. 446, 451, 50 L. ed. 1099.

A narrower definition is suggested by the language of some opinions:

"There are privileges and immunities belonging to citizens of the United States, in that relation and character, and * * * it is these and these alone which a state is forbidden to abridge. But the right to admission to practice in the courts of a state is not one of them. This right in no sense depends on citizenship of the United States." Bradwell v. Illinois (U. S. 1873) 16 Wall. 130, 139, 21 L. ed. 442. Italics are the present editor's.

Shortly after this construction was announced in the Slaughter-House Cases, Judge Emmons said in charging a grand jury:

"As now judicially read by the court of last resort, it leaves the organic law in this regard precisely where it was before. It is one of those constructions, often resorted to, to prevent consequences serious and revolutionary, which courts believe were not contemplated by legislatures who pass laws, and by the people who adopt constitutions." (Mar. 1875, C. C. W. D. Tenn.) Fed. Cas. No. 18, 260, p. 1006.

[3] Letters (a) to (j) are inserted by the present editor for convenience of reference in critical discussion of each of these alleged illustrations of the doctrine of the opinion. What is the correct formulation of a doctrine that embraces all of these specific instances?

Another (b) privilege of a citizen of the United States is to demand the care and protection of the federal government over his life, liberty, and property when on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of a foreign government. Of this there can be no doubt, nor that the right depends upon his character as a citizen of the United States. (c) The right to peaceably assemble and petition for redress of grievances, (d) the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, are rights of the citizen guaranteed by the federal Constitution. (e) The right to use the navigable waters of the United States, however they may penetrate the territory of the several states, (f) all rights secured to our citizens by treaties with foreign nations, are dependent upon citizenship of the United States, and not citizenship of a state. One of these privileges is conferred by the very article under consideration. (g) It is that a citizen of the United States can, of his own volition, become a citizen of any state of the Union by a bona fide residence therein, with the same rights as other citizens of that state. To these may be added the rights secured by the (h) thirteenth and (i) fifteenth articles of amendment, and (j) by the other clause of the fourteenth, next to be considered. [Due process clause.]

But it is useless to pursue this branch of the inquiry, since we are of opinion that the rights claimed by these plaintiffs in error, if they have any existence, are not privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States within the meaning of the clause of the Fourteenth Amendment under consideration.

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws."

The argument has not been much pressed in these cases that the defendant's charter deprives the plaintiffs of their property without due process of law, or that it denies to them the equal protection of the law. The first of these paragraphs has been in the Constitution since the adoption of the Fifth Amendment, as a restraint upon the federal power. It is also to be found in some form of expression in the constitutions of nearly all the states, as a restraint upon the power of the states. This law, then, has practically been the same as it now is during the existence of the government, except so far as the present amendment may place the restraining power over the states in this matter in the hands of the federal government.

We are not without judicial interpretation, therefore, both state and national, of the meaning of this clause. And it is sufficient to say that under no construction of that provision that we have ever seen, or any that we deem admissible, can the restraint imposed by the State of Louisiana upon the exercise of their trade by the butchers of New Orleans be held to be a deprivation of property within the meaning of that provision.

"Nor shall any State deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

In the light of the history of these amendments, and the pervading purpose of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause. The existence of laws in the states where the newly emancipated negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden.

If, however, the states did not conform their laws to its requirements, then by the fifth section of the article of amendment Congress was authorized to enforce it by suitable legislation. We doubt very much whether any action of a state not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision. It is so clearly a provision for that race and that emergency, that a strong case would be necessary for its application to any other. But as it is a state that is to be dealt with, and not alone the validity of its laws, we may safely leave that matter until Congress shall have exercised its power, or some case of state oppression, by denial of equal justice in its courts, shall have claimed a decision at our hands. We find no such case in the one before us, and do not deem it necessary to go over the argument again, as it may have relation to this particular clause of the amendment.

In the early history of the organization of the government, its statesmen seem to have divided on the line which should separate the powers of the national government from those of the state governments, and though this line has never been very well defined in public opinion, such a division has continued from that day to this.

The adoption of the first eleven amendments to the Constitution so soon after the original instrument was accepted, shows a prevailing sense of danger at that time from the federal power. And it cannot be denied that such a jealousy continued to exist with many patriotic men until the breaking out of the late Civil War. It was then discovered that the true danger to the perpetuity of the Union was in the capacity of the state organizations to combine and concentrate all the powers of the state, and of contiguous states, for a determined resistance to the general government.

Unquestionably this has given great force to the argument, and added largely to the number, of those who believe in the necessity of a strong national government.

But, however pervading this sentiment, and however it may have contributed to the adoption of the amendments we have been considering, we do not see in those amendments any purpose to destroy the main features of the general system. Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war, our statesmen have still believed that the existence of the states with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights—the rights of person and of property—was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government, though they have thought proper to impose additional limitations on the states, and to confer additional power on that of the nation.

But whatever fluctuations may be seen in the history of public opinion on this subject during the period of our national existence, we think it will be found that this court, so far as its functions required, has always held with a steady and an even hand the balance between state and federal power, and we trust that such may continue to be the history of its relation to that subject so long as it shall have duties to perform which demand of it a construction of the Constitution, or of any of its parts.

The judgments of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in these cases are

Affirmed.

[CHASE, C. J., FIELD, SWAYNE AND BRADLEY, JJ., dissented, the last three delivering dissenting opinions. In suggestive summary their view was, that the restrictive definition given by the majority rendered the clause nugatory, that with nation-conferred privileges and immunities "no state could ever have interfered by its laws, and no new constitutional provision was required to inhibit such interference. The supremacy of the Constitution and the laws of the United States always controlled any state legislation of that character;" that rightly understood the privileges and immunities meant were the traditionally recognized rights of free men such as were enumerated in the Declaration of Independence and by Justice Washington in Corfield v. Coryell, the rights to life, liberty and property, including rights to engage in the common callings, professions and trades except as these might be regulated for the public welfare and by uniform regulations applicable to all persons; that the portion of the act which entirely prohibited all but the favored corporation from owning slaughter houses in so large an area was not reasonably necessary to the protection of the health of the community.]

Bradley, J., said: "The granting of monopolies, or exclusive privileges to individuals or corporations, is an invasion of the rights of others to choose a lawful calling, and an infringement of personal liberty.* * * Admitting, therefore, that formerly the states were not prohibited from infringing any of the fundamental privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, except in a few specified cases, that cannot be said now, since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. In my judgment it was the intention of the people of this country in adopting that amendment to provide National security against violation by the states of the fundamental rights of the citizen."[4]

MAXWELL v. DOW.

1900. Supreme Court of the United States. 176 U. S. 581.

[Maxwell was tried in Utah for robbery and convicted by a jury of eight jurors. He applied to the state Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus upon the ground that this procedure and the constitution of Utah authorizing it violated the abridgement clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and also the due process clause. His petition was denied and this writ of error was taken.]

Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court.

What are the privileges and immunities of a citizen of the United States which no state can abridge? Do they include the right to be exempt from trial, for an infamous crime, in a state court and under state authority except upon presentment by a grand jury? And do they also include the right in all criminal prosecutions in a state court to be tried by a jury composed of twelve jurors?

That a jury composed, as at common law, of twelve jurors was intended by the Sixth Amendment to the federal Constitution, there can be no doubt. Thompson v. Utah, 170 U. S. 343, 349. And as the right of trial by jury in certain suits at common law is preserved by the Seventh Amendment, such a trial implies that there shall be an unanimous verdict of twelve jurors in all federal courts where a jury trial is held. American Pub. Co. v. Fisher, 166 U. S. 464; Springville v. Thomas, 166 U. S. 707.

[4] The student will be interested to note as he later proceeds with a study of the due process of law clause (which was passed over lightly in the argument of this case and in the opinion of Justice Miller) that by interpretation that clause has expanded to secure substantially as full a limitation on state power as the dissenters in this case contended was to be found in the "abridgement" clause. It seems sufficient for the student to realize at this point the uselessness of the "abridgement" clause as interpreted in this case, an interpretation that has never been retracted. For a full discussion see D. O. McGovney, Privileges or Immunities Clause—Fourteenth Amendment (1918) 4 Iowa Law Bul. 219-244.

It would seem to be quite plain that the provision in the Utah constitution for a jury of eight jurors in all state criminal trials, for other than capital offenses, violates the Sixth Amendment, provided that amendment is now to be construed as applicable to criminal prosecutions of citizens of the United States in state courts.

It is conceded that there are certain privileges or immunities possessed by a citizen of the United States, because of his citizenship, and that they cannot be abridged by any action of the states. In order to limit the powers which it was feared might be claimed or exercised by the federal government, under the provisions of the Constitution as it was when adopted, the first ten amendments to that instrument were proposed to the legislatures of the several states by the first Congress on the 25th of September, 1789. They were intended as restraints and limitations upon the powers of the general government, and were not intended to and did not have any effect upon the powers of the respective states. This has been many times decided.[5] * * *

It is claimed, however, that since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment the effect of the former amendments has been thereby changed and greatly enlarged. It is now urged in substance that all the provisions contained in the first ten amendments, so far as they secure and recognize the fundamental rights of the individual as against the exercise of federal power, are by virtue of this amendment to be regarded as privileges or immunities of a citizen of the United States, and therefore the states cannot provide for any procedure in state courts which could not be followed in a federal court because of the limitations contained in those amendments. This was also the contention made upon the argument in the Spies Case, 123 U. S. 131, 151; but in the opinion of the court therein, which was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Waite, the question was not decided because it was held that the case did not require its decision.

In the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, the subject of the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, as distinguished from those of a particular state, was treated by Mr. Justice Miller in delivering the opinion of the court. * * *

We have made this extended reference to the case because of its great importance, the thoroughness of the treatment of the subject, and the great ability displayed by the author of the opinion. Although his suggestion that only discrimination by a state against the negroes as a class or on account of their race was covered by the amendment as to the equal protection of the laws has not been affirmed by the later cases, yet it was but the expression of his belief as to what would be the decision of the court when a case came before it involving that point. The opinion upon the matters actually involved and maintained by the judgment in the case has never been doubted or overruled by any judgment of this court. It remains one of the leading cases upon the subject of that portion of the Fourteenth Amendment of which it treats.

[5] The earliest and leading case on this point is Barron v. Mayor &c. of Baltimore (U. S. 1833) 7 Pet. 243, 8 L. ed. 672.

The definition of the words "privileges and immunities," as given by Mr. Justice Washington [in Corfield v. Coryell, ante, p. 457], was adopted in substance in Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 180, and in Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 430. These rights, it is said in the Slaughter-House Cases, have always been held to be the class of rights which the state governments were created to establish and secure. * * *

It was said in Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. 162, that the amendment did not add to the privileges and immunities of a citizen; it simply furnished an additional guaranty for the protection of such as he already had. And in Re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 448, it was stated by the present Chief Justice that: "The Fourteenth Amendment did not radically change the whole theory of the relations of the state and federal governments to each other, and of both governments to the people. The same person may be at the same time a citizen of the United States and a citizen of a state. Protection to life, liberty, and property rests primarily with the states, and the amendment furnishes an additional guaranty against any encroachment by the states upon those fundamental rights which belong to citizenship, and which the state governments were created to secure. The privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, as distinguished from the privileges and immunities of citizens of the states, are indeed protected by it; but those are privileges and immunities arising out of the nature and essential character of the national government, and granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States. United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542; Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36." * * *

In Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, it was held that a trial by jury in suits at common law in the state courts was not a privilege or immunity belonging to a person as a citizen of the United States, and protected, therefore, by the Fourteenth Amendment. * * *

This case shows that the Fourteenth Amendment in forbidding a state to abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States does not include among them the right of trial by jury in a civil case, in a state court, although the right to such a trial in the federal courts is specially secured to all persons in the cases mentioned in the Seventh Amendment.

Is any one of the rights secured to the individual by the Fifth or by the Sixth Amendment any more a privilege or immunity of a citizen of the United States than are those secured by the Seventh? In none are they privileges or immunities granted and belonging to the individual as a citizen of the United States, but they are secured to all persons as against the federal government, entirely irrespective of such citizenship. As the individual does not enjoy them as a privilege of citizenship of the United States, therefore, when the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits the abridgement by the states of those privileges or immunities which he enjoys as such citizen, it is not correct or reasonable to say that it covers and extends to certain rights which he does not enjoy by reason of his citizenship, but simply because those rights exist in favor of all individuals as against federal governmental powers. The nature or character of the right of trial by jury is the same in a criminal prosecution as in a civil action, and in neither case does it spring from nor is it founded upon the citizenship of the individual as a citizen of the United States, and if not, then it cannot be said that in either case it is a privilege or immunity which alone belongs to him as such citizen. * * * Those are not distinctly privileges or immunities of such citizenship, where everyone has the same as against the federal government, whether citizen or not. * * *

In Kemmler's case, 136 U. S. 436, 448, it was stated that it was not contended and could not be that the Eighth Amendment to the federal Constitution was intended to apply to the states. * * * In Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S. 252, it was held that the Second Amendment to the Constitution, in regard to the right of the people to bear arms, is a limitation only on the power of Congress and the national government, and not of the states. * * * In O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U. S. 323, 332, it was stated that as a general question it has always been ruled that the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not apply to the states. In Thorington v. Montgomery, 147 U. S. 490, it was said that the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution operates exclusively in restraint of federal power, and has no application to the states.

We have cited these cases for the purpose of showing that the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States do not necessarily include all the rights protected by the first eight amendments to the federal Constitution against the powers of the federal government. They were decided subsequently to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, and if the particular clause of that amendment, now under consideration, had the effect claimed for it in this case, it is not too much to say that it would have been asserted and the principles applied in some of them. * * *

[HARLAN, J., gave a dissenting opinion.] Judgment affirmed.[6]

[6] For another discussion of the "abridgement" clause see Twining v. New Jersey (1908) 211 U. S. 78, 90-99, 53 L. ed. 97 holding that the immunity given to citizens of the United States and all other persons in Amend. V against being required to give self-incriminating testimony gives immunity in federal proceedings only; that Amendment gives no immunity from a state's exaction of self-incriminating testimony. Such immunity in state proceedings exists in all the states fully or to a limited extent by the common law, state statute or state constitution. The federal constitution leaves the states free to abridge it.

CHAPTER IV.

SEPARATION AND DELEGATION OF GOVERNMENTAL POWERS.

The following exposition of this topic is by Professor Frederick Green, of the College of Law of the University of Illinois.[1]

When a government is conceived of mainly as a means of protection from foreign foes, its people, desiring to see it strong, may willingly acquiesce in the concentration of unrestricted power in a few hands; but when they come to fear aggression from their governors as well as from the enemy, they seek to restrict governmental power and to control it. Prominent among expedients to that end has been the attempt to keep the legislative, executive and judicial powers apart. But as society grows complex and as private fortunes and combinations of private capital increase and operate obscurely, men, being dependent for their living upon sources beyond their control and even their knowledge, apprehend injustice and oppression rather from those without the government than from those within it, and a tendency revives to vest for protection a controlling power in public authority. Such a tendency which in ancient Rome helped, and perhaps sufficed, to extinguish the republic, and to restore to emperors of the world the power once exercised by kings of the petty city,[2] is operative today. Its more conservative manifestations include a disposition to trust to justice according to administrative discretion, rather than to justice according to law. The doctrine of the separation of powers has been called into question, and some say that it has broken down. It is the object of this article to consider the principles upon which that doctrine rests, and whether and how far they may usefully be applied in conditions now existing or likely to arise, and, with that purpose, to discuss the character and extent of the separation of powers which our constitutions in fact establish, its origin and effectiveness, and the extent to which present governmental practice is consistent with its theory.

A theoretical threefold division of governmental powers may be traced to Aristotle, who in his treatise on Politics wrote of the various kinds of government with which he was acquainted and attempted to ascertain their relative characteristics. For this purpose he distinguished in theory three kinds of governmental function, the kinds usually exercised by the deliberative assemblies, by the magistrates and by the law courts. He then looked to see what classes of citizens, by office holding, vote or appointment, respectively exercised or controlled the exercise of each of these functions in each state. These classes he denominated the elements of the state, and upon the composition of these elements he thought that the character of the state chiefly depended. "All states have three elements, and the good law giver has to regard what is expedient for each state. When they are well ordered, the state is well ordered, and, as they differ from one another, constitutions differ."[3] That is to say, in Aristotle's view, governmental functions are, on the whole, of three kinds, deliberative, magisterial, and judicial, and the character of the state varies with the hands that hold them. This is not to say that they should be in different hands, or separated, or independent of each other.

On the other hand, the historian Polybius, in the second century before Christ, without distinguishing powers according to their nature, explained the advantages of a system of checks. He eulogized the constitution of the Roman republic because it divided authority between senate, consuls and people so that each was dependent upon the good will of one of the others, and thus all worked concertedly and none could abuse its power.[4]

It is sometimes said that the English government was the first in which a separation of powers was achieved; but Parliament had its rise and won its ascendency in an attempt to check the royal power and to gain a voice in government for the interests it represented, and not with an idea of separating legislative and executive power. "The Parliament," said Milton, "was set as a bridle to the King."[5] Nor did Parliament discriminate in practise between making new law, declaring old law, and judging particular cases. Rather it acted generally to protect rights and to redress abuses.[6] Yet to preserve Parliament's control it was necessary to maintain the principle that the King could not alter the law of his own will. In 1610, the royal officers demanded of Chief Justice Coke whether the King by proclamation could guard against fire and overcrowding in London by forbidding the erection of new buildings, or could conserve wheat for food by forbidding making it into starch. [6] See McIlvaine, The High Court of Parliament. Parliament and the law courts differed in the nature of the business usually brought before them, but each tended to deal finally and completely with the business in hand. Probably this tendency was at the bottom of the disposition of early judges to disregard acts of Parliament which they thought against reason or common right. Maine, Popular Government, p. 218, says that the different nature of the legislative and executive powers was not recognized by writers until the fourteenth century. It is said to be recognized in the Defensor Pacis of Marsilio (1387).

Lord Privy Seal urged, in support of executive police power, that the physician was not always bound to a precedent, but to apply his medicine according to the quality of the disease, "and all concluded," says Coke, "that it should be necessary at that time to confirm the King's prerogative with our opinions." But it was resolved upon conference between the chief judges and the lords of the privy council "that the King by his proclamation can not create any offence which was not an offence before, for then he may alter the law of the land by his proclamation in a high point; for * * * upon that ensues fine and imprisonment; also the law of England is divided into three parts, common law, statute law and custom; but the King's proclamation is none of them."[7]

Further, if Parliament's power were to be real, it would not do to let the King control the decisions of his judges upon the effect of its statutes or the extent of his prerogative. Bacon, to be sure, was of the numerous class of reformers who favor absolute government because through its power the pathway to reform seems easier.[8] "Though the judges be lions," he said, yet they should be "lions under the throne, being circumspect that they do not check or oppose any points of sovereignty." But when the Archbishop of Canterbury advised King James that the King was authorized by word of God in Scripture to take from the judges and to determine himself any question not settled by express provision, Coke answered "in the presence and with the clear consent of all the judges of England and barons of the exchequer, that the King in his own person can not adjudge any case, either criminal * * * or betwixt party and party * * * but this ought to be determined and adjudged in some court of justice according to the law and custom of England * * * and that the law was the golden met-wand and measure to try the causes of the subjects and which protected his majesty in safety and peace; with which the King was greatly offended, and said that then he should be under the law, which was treason to affirm, as he said."[9]

The changes incident to the establishment of constitutional government in England came about, as was natural, mainly through the pressure of conflicting interests, and the development of points of political weakness and strength, and thinkers, very largely, moralized about them after the event and pointed out their merits. It was long before they clearly distinguished between the functions of government. Thus Milton ignored the separation of powers, while he gave clear expression to the doctrine of popular sovereignty delegated to representatives in assembly.[10]

[8] The economist Le Trosne (quoted by St. Girons, La séparation des pouvoirs) thought France under the old regime infinitely better off than England, because "reforms can be put through to change the whole state of the country, whereas with the English such reforms are liable to be hampered by the parties."

In 1656, Joseph Harrington published "The Commonwealth of Oceana" in which he repeatedly insisted on the necessity for government by legislative rule instead of administrative discretion. " * * * the liberty of a commonwealth consisteth in the empire of her laws, the absence whereof would betray her to the lusts of tyrants. And these I conceive to be the principles upon which Aristotle and Livy * * * have grounded their assertion 'that a commonwealth is an empire of laws and not of men.' " For, he says, though those that make the laws are but men, yet in a popular government, the laws will express the interest of the whole. "The wisdom of the few may be the light of mankind, but the interest of the few is not the profit of mankind." And in the preface to the Art of Lawgiving he said, "Whereas the law being not to be made but by the many, no man is governed by another man, but by that only which is the common interest; by which means this amounts to a government of laws and not of men." Harrington, of course, distinguished executing and judging the laws from making them. He thought it essential to liberty to have "a magistracy answerable to the people as distributors and executioners of the laws made by the people."[11] Sir Henry Vane also advocated the separation of executive from legislative power. He wrote: "Nay, would there be any just exception to be taken if * * * it should be agreed, as another part of the fundamental constitution of the government, to place that branch of the sovereignty which respects the execution of the laws in a distinct office from that of the legislative power and yet subordinate to them and to the laws * * *."[12] Locke, in his treatise on government, recognized the three functions. In his view the chief reasons for the existence of public authority are that in a state of nature there is wanting; first, an established law to decide controversies; second, an indifferent judge with authority to determine differences according to the law; and third, power to back the sentence and give it execution. In all well framed governments, he said, the legislative and the executive are in different hands, not only because the legislature need not, like the executive, be continually active, but also because in this way the laws, being freer from influence of class and of occasion, will be made and executed more impartially.[13] But unlike the framers of our constitutions, Locke apparently did not conceive of executive or judiciary as co-ordinate with the legislature, and, like it, drawing a direct and independent authority from the people.

It was Montesquieu, in 1748, who, developing Locke's suggestions, distinguished the powers of government, and stated the need for separating them, in a manner that arrested and held attention. He saw, no doubt, that the English king held his throne by a parliamentary title at the people's will; that control over the making of law had passed from the crown; and that the executive power had, with the fall of the star chamber and the achievement of independence by the judges, come to depend for its enforcement on a separate judicial body, which held to account not only private persons but royal officers as well; and that these changes were a necessary condition to English freedom. Montesquieu did not make the mistake, sometimes charged upon him, of supposing that the powers should be completely and politically separated, like three governments in one state. He does say that the legislature should not call the executive to account except by impeachment, which is at variance with the existing English system of tenure; but, as a means of securing executive independence, he approves the veto and the power to summon the assembly and to dissolve it. His point is that the functions should not be so united that he who exercises one may also control affirmatively the exercise of another. That would be an end of liberty. For one loses liberty when he becomes apprehensive. "Political liberty in a citizen is a tranquility of mind arising from the opinion each person has of his safety. In order to have this liberty it is requisite the government be so constructed as one man need not be afraid of another."[14] "Political, like moral good, always lies between two extremes."[15] "All experience shows that every one who has power is moved to abuse it. He goes to the limit * * *." To make abuse of power impossible it is necessary to arrange matters so that power will check power.[16] Those who would be despots, he says, have always begun by uniting offices in their own person; and in the republics of Italy where a single body wields the whole power, there is less liberty than in monarchies. "Though there is no external pomp that reveals the despot, yet he is continually felt." The fundamental reason of this is that lawmakers are careful about entrusting power to others, and will guard against and correct its abuse; but if they themselves are to control administration, they will confer as arbitrary a power as they can in order to be as free as possible in exercising it. As Montesquieu puts it, they will make tyrannical laws to execute them tyrannically. A judge who can execute his own decrees has power to oppress; and a judge who can make his own laws can do as he pleases.[17] Each will make himself feared. Montesquieu thought that by preventing any single group of men from controlling the exercise of more than one of the three functions, and by giving each class of society such representation in the government that it might check the others, injustice and oppression would be minimized and yet those things would be done which the general need required.[18]

Blackstone echoed the phrases of Montesquieu.[19] A legislature will not entrust dangerous powers to independent hands, but it can not fairly, and an executive can not safely, control adjudication.

The sophist Protagoras undertook to teach political science, and justified the adventure on the ground that since nothing was certain at all, political science was as certain as anything else. No doubt it was partly the definiteness, assurance and attractive simplicity with which Montesquieu laid down the doctrine of the separation of powers, together with the dearth of other formulas for good government, that gave the theory its immense vogue among those who in the eighteenth century were seeking a specific to make the world safe for democracy. The doctrine received the unquestioning adherence of Washington,[20] Jefferson,[21] John Adams,[22] and James Wilson.[23] It was expounded in the Federalist by Madison[24] and Hamilton.[25] It was later indorsed by Webster[26] and by the United States Supreme Court.[27] Article 16 of the declaration of the rights of man, prefixed to the French constitution of 1789, declared that without it there could be no constitution at all. All our state constitutions, beginning with Virginia in 1776, vested in separate departments legislative, executive and judicial powers, giving each department, as it were, its equal, independent warrant of attorney from the people. Most constitutions, like those of Illinois, have also expressly laid down, what in the others is necessarily implied, that no department shall exercise a power proper only to another. The Articles of Confederation it is true, gave Congress control of the executive, but this was thought a defect and the supposed mistake was remedied in the Constitution of the United States.

[18] "Ces trois puissances devraient former repos ou une inaction. Mais, comme par le movement nécessaire des choses elles sont contraintes d'aller, elles seront forcées d'aller de concert." He thought neither democracy nor aristocracy compatible with liberty, but the judges should be drawn from the people. Rousseau, too, believed in the separation of powers. Otherwise "law and fact would be so confounded that it could no longer be known what is law and what is not" and the very object for which the body politic was instituted would be lost. The separation of powers, says F. J. Stimson, is an American invention, for in America first was it formally or intelligently applied. It stands, he says, among America's great contributions to the science of government, along with the division of power between states and nation, and with the limitation of governmental authority over the individual. It is the principle "that they who make the laws may not administer them, and he who administers them may not judge them 'to the end it be a government of laws and not of men.' "[28]

Montesquieu once wrote, "Voltaire has too much mental activity to understand me. The books he reads he makes over, and then he criticises what he has made over."[29] The separation of powers has met many Voltaires. It is a phrase capable of varied meaning. It may be used in contrasting the position of an American executive with that of a minister responsible to a legislature.[30] But the essence of Montesquieu's meaning, and of the American doctrine, is not there. The irremovability of American executives is due to the method of electing them. A further and distinct result was aimed at by vesting differentiated powers in separate bodies. But on the other hand it was not intended to split each state into three sovereignties, each acting solely in a separate sphere. To prevent one department exercising its own functions with respect to the doings of another would vest in the other the uncontrolled power which separation is designed to prevent.[31] It is expected that the legislature will impose rules on the executive, the judge issue writs to the sheriff. The purpose of vesting the respective powers in different departments, which is their separation in its proper sense, is to prevent control over two powers coming to the same hands.[32]

It is as true to say that ministerial responsibility is the English mode of enforcing the separation of powers as to say that it impairs it. It prevents executive usurpation. Parliament and the administration have each a responsibility of its own.

[31] Jas. Wilson, Works, Vol. I, 367 (1896 ed.); Cp. the French doctrine that only administrative courts may hold administrative officers responsible for official acts.

That power tends to increase and to encroach has often been demonstrated. The tendency is progressive, because with growth of power goes growth of prestige, authority, influence and disposition to make might determine right.[33] A system of checks, such as the veto, impeachment, and the judicial practise of passing upon the constitutionality of governmental acts, so far from infringing on the principle of the separation of powers, is a surety for preserving its supposed benefits. It provides means of self-defence to keep the executive from sinking to the level of a legislative committee, or the legislature from becoming a mouthpiece for executive decrees. As Madison argued in the convention of 1787, it does not blend the departments, but is a barrier to keep them apart.[34] It gives to neither power to dispense with or to direct the conduct of the other. And even if the President, by veto, patronage and popular backing, were able continually to coerce Congress and the courts into acting against their better judgments, it would still be true that the action they took would be their own. The separation of powers prevents a transfer of authority or responsibility. The question here to be considered is what this separation is and what it accomplishes. In other words, when our constitutions vest separately the three powers, what limits are thereby set to each power, and how far is the limitation effectual, beneficial or sufficient?

Many recent writers have remarked a growing tendency, if not a compelling need, to vest in administrators a large discretion, and an authority to make rules which amounts, in a sense, to a delegation of real, though limited, legislative power. Some writers deny the desirability of the separation of powers, as they conceive it, and dispute the value and even the reality of the theoretical division of governmental functions upon which it rests.[35] Some think that the distinction of functions is largely a matter of convention and convenience, and that the same kind of power may be exercised by a legislature and called legislative, by an administrator and called executive, or by a court and called judicial. Professor F. J. Goodnow, for instance, quotes from a French author the statement that "the mind can conceive of but two powers: that which makes the law and that which executes it. There is no place, therefore, for a third power by the side of the first two."[36] Mr. Goodnow, somewhat similarly, argues that acts of a state, like those of an individual, can naturally be grouped under two heads only, those necessary to the expression, and those necessary to the execution, of the will. The former he calls political, the latter administrative, action. He says the theory of three separated powers incorporated in our constitutions has proven "to be unworkable as a legal principle" because there is "a common borderland" between them, and that it is really "existent in our constitutional law only in an attenuated form," and that it has become "an unworkable and unapplicable rule of law."

Laski, Authority in the Modern State (1919) 70, 71. There is no occasion to deny the possibility of a twofold division of governmental functions, nor its usefulness for some purposes. But there is need to challenge an assertion that the tripartite division is a fiction either of law or of political science, void of significance or value, necessarily disregarded in fact, or incapable of consistent application except by pretence. Perhaps there are differences which are inherently differences of kind. It may be that the differences between mind and matter, and between is and ought are such. But most classifications of human affairs rest upon differences of degree, like the difference between a grain of sand and the rock of Gibraltar. We can imagine a grain of sand increasing by degrees until it gets as big as Gibraltar, but when a change has progressed so far that we need to alter our manner of dealing with the changing thing we view it as a change in kind. What we generally mean by a different kind of thing is a thing that we need to treat differently.

Mr. Goodnow's classification rests on differences of degree to the same extent as the threefold classification. He says his classification applies to the single person as well as to the state, and therefore we might expect him to say that it is the distinction between deciding what to do, and doing it. But he says it is a distinction between the expression of the will, and putting the will into effect. Since important decisions may be made without any expression of will other than that involved in the act of putting the decisions into effect, it is not entirely clear whether Mr. Goodnow brings under the head of expression of the state's will merely the enunciation of rules, or whether he intends to embrace all decisions on matters of policy, even such as may be involved in an executive dealing with a particular case. Whichever he means, such an "expression of will" forms an element of almost every governmental action. When a legislature passes a law for maintaining traffic policemen; when the chief of police details particular policemen to control traffic at particular street intersections; when the policeman whirls about the sign that says "Go," and makes it read "Stop," each has to decide what policy requires, and each expresses the will of the state. Indeed, as numbers of persons are dealt with by word of command, each in some sense legislates. Yet Mr. Goodnow does not hesitate to treat such acts as those of the chief of police or patrolmen as involving only the sort of thing he means by administration. It is no real objection to a classification of governmental activities that action classed under one head savors in some degree of the characteristics of action classed under another. The distinction between earth, air and water is not rendered "unworkable" by the existence of dust, mud and clouds, or "unapplicable" by the fact that a traveler may sometimes choose between railroad, airplane and steamship. It is true that judges' decisions in a certain sense make law, that legislatures sometimes pass acts for particular cases, that the same result may sometimes be accomplished by invoking the action either of legislature, executive or court, and, as has been said already, that administrative officers may be vested with real, though limited, legislative power. These things indicate that the separation of powers works elastically, but they neither prove nor disprove the desirability or feasibility of putting limits on the kind of power a given functionary may exercise. Though it is not always physically necessary to formulate the state's will separately from enforcing it, there may be good reason for imposing a legal necessity for usually doing so, by separating the powers.

Furthermore, adjudication differs essentially from administration. To compare a state to a person, and to speak of the execution of its "will," is likely to mislead. The state is concerned with two matters of a different sort; first, what it does itself; second, what its people do to each other. Its regulations are largely not of public, but of private, affairs. They concern private "will." The state does not decide whether a man shall sell his land or give his money to charity. It confers rights in case he does these things, but it is for the persons concerned to insist upon their rights or to waive them. Only when private wills conflict does the state determine which will is entitled to prevail, and then the winner may enforce the decision or not, as he chooses. In adjudication, the will of the state is conditional on the will of the parties. It has no will of its own. That is why judging between parties is the chief function of primitive governments, and precedes law making and executive force,[37] and why judicial tribunals in civilized countries are distinct bodies treated as discharging a distinct office. A lawsuit may be an enterprise of the parties, enriching or impoverishing them, but it is not an enterprise of the state, analogous to conducting a war, levying a tax or paving a street. In a suit over the price of land, the subject-matter of the state's action is not dollars or land, but the rights of others.

The case is the same if the suit involves the legality, not of private, but of governmental, action. To challenge the authority of an officer is to assert that what he does is not the "will" of the state. It raises the question what the state's will is. To will and to enforce that will, and to determine what that will has been in order to discover and protect rights under it are matters of a different kind. This is equally true of prosecutions for crime. A government conceivably might arrest disturbers of the peace, throw them into jail and keep them there for punishment, all in a single course of administrative procedure. But a government worthy of the name guards its people from violence and wrong not only from others, but from itself, and not only by physical measures, but by a system of legal rights.[38] But legal rights give no sure protection unless there is also an opportunity to invoke specific governmental action to determine whether they have been violated. Therefore a man against whom public force is brought generally has a right to a formal determination whether there is authority to bring it. The function is distinct from and even in a sense opposed to the function of repressing crime. It is the function of protecting the individual from wrong. The criminal and the administration are on opposing sides. The court judges between them. When we say we live under a government of laws, we recognize the protection of rights as a function of government set apart from and in some degree above the administrative power. It would shock us if the prisoner's guilt and its punishment were determined by his jailer, as in a case of breach of prison discipline. It would shock us if, whenever a court made a decision, the governor could reverse it. Yet if it is on a footing with other executive acts, there should be no impropriety in empowering him to do so.[39]

It is true that by conditioning the authority of executives on their opinion as to facts instead of upon the existence of the facts, legislatures, as will be seen, may narrow the field of individual freedom and widen that of executive power; but this increases the importance of distinguishing the ordinary executive authority from the power to judge the limits of that authority. It is also true that such matters as the assessment of values incident to the collection of taxes and to the exercise of eminent domain may be carried through by the executive department, being classed as pertaining to the satisfaction by government of its own needs, much as breaches of prison discipline are classed as pertaining to prison administration. Yet since the fourteenth century, the provision of Magna Carta that no free man should be taken, imprisoned or destroyed, nor proceeded against by royal power, except through the judgment of his peers or the law of the land has been regarded as securing the separation of trial for crime from administration in general. So essential is this to fundamental justice that though due process of law does not in general require a separation of powers,[40] it does prevent an administrative determination of guilt.[41] Courts and legislative bodies may punish for contempt. Executives may not.

It is of fundamental importance to notice that the difference between legislative, executive and judicial action depends upon the kind of action taken and not upon the kind of mental process involved in deciding whether and how to take it.[42] Misconception on this point has caused much confusion.[43] If a claim is made against a principal on a contract alleged to have been concluded by his agent, the principal may try to ascertain the facts from witnesses and the law from law books, or he may go to a lawyer for an opinion or to an umpire for a decision, and as a result may pay the claim; but though principal, lawyer and umpire have gone through the same train of thought, as a judge would on a trial, they plainly have not exercised a judicial function because they have exercised no governmental power at all. If the contract claim were against a city, and the proper administrative officer of the city, after inquiry, thought it valid, and paid it, there would be governmental action involving the same mental process as adjudication, but the action would be administrative, not judicial, because the purpose and consummation of the proceeding were administrative. But if a debtor refuses to pay and is sued, all exercises of governmental power by the court are judicial, because they are steps in the giving of judicial relief.

In what then does the distinction consist? To hazard definitions in an attempt to be explicit, it may be said:

Legislation is the creation by the state of a right (including an authority, a privilege or an immunity), duty, or status not dependent on the existence of a previous right, duty or status.

Adjudication is the imposition of a specific duty in personam, or of a liability, or the granting of a right or status which is dependent on a previous right or duty, in that it is imposed by way of giving effect to a right or duty determined to exist or to have existed, or by way of redress or punishment for its violation.

Administration probably can not be so closely defined. It consists in a management of public affairs and includes all state action not part of a process of legislation or adjudication which affects rights or involves the use of adverse force. It can not be closely defined, because, as will be explained, it may slightly overlap the legislative field, in that administrative officers may be vested with a limited, subsidiary discretion in the creation of rights and duties, and also because it may slightly overlap the judicial field, in that administrative officers may be vested with power to put existing rights into effect where doing so does not affect other rights adversely. With that part of administration which, as in many of the scientific activities of government, involves no control over rights, but only such action as might be carried on by private persons, we are not concerned.

LEGISLATIVE POWER.

Legislation may be permanent or temporary, general or special. A permanent revenue law or a tax for a particular work of public benefit, a general divorce, pension or incorporation law, or an act granting divorce, pension or incorporation to particular persons are alike legislation.[44] Divorces, pensions and incorporation were once usually granted by special act; and this required the legislature to make up its mind in each case whether sufficient reason existed. It was seen to be more simple and just to determine generally what facts are good reason for divorce, pension or incorporation and to pass an act conferring a right to an award thereof to any person in whose case the facts exist. It is then competent to vest a court with power to determine on application whether the conditions of the right are fulfilled, and, if so, to effectuate it by decree. The process which might have been purely legislative has been divided into two parts, one of which is judicial. But the legislature may frame its action so that the grant of incorporation, pension, or, it would seem, divorce, if by consent, shall come from the executive and not from a court. It can make it the duty of an administrative officer when the conditions are fulfilled (in fact or in his opinion, whichever the statute provides), and application duly made, to grant a certificate of incorporation or award a pension. This duty is purely executive. It administers the law. That in order to administer it correctly it is necessary to determine what the law and facts are is immaterial. Such a determination is generally necessary as a preliminary to administrative action; for instance, in arresting a disturber of the peace. But the legislature could not confer on an executive officer power to grant a decree of divorce for a specified cause without the consent of the parties, so long as marriage remains a matter involving individual rights. To deprive a person of a right in respect to another, putting an end to it upon the ground that he is not entitled under the law to possess it any longer, is to adjudicate.[45] In short, much as a bombardment may be carried on from land, air or water, so a corporation may be created by action which is legislative, administrative or judicial. Actions differing in nature are invoked to work the same result.

[44] Fletcher v. Peck (1810, U. S.) 6 Cranch, 87; Maynard v. Hill (1888) 125 U. S. 190, 8 Sup. Ct. 723.

This is as it should be. Each of the three departments exists to help, according to its own function, in the general work of government. It may properly be used to carry out any measures for which it is adapted, and it is for the law-making power to decide to what extent to use it.[46] It is a mistake to think that the distinction between the functions of government is unreal because there is often a choice which to use. As to mental processes involved the powers are indifferent; but as to results to be accomplished, and in a lesser degree as to the mode of acting, they are circles which partly overlap. The doctrine is not that no two of them may include any common ground, but that none of them may pass without its own boundaries and intrude upon territory belonging solely to another. The executive can not take action which is legislative or judicial in such sense as to be non-executive, and so of the others. But it is no constitutional objection to executive action that it requires determination of law or fact or, in some degree, policy, or that instead a court or legislature might have acted in its own way and produced a like result; although it may be a good political objection that a court or legislature could have done it better.[47]

[46] United States v. Woo Jan (1918) 245 U. S. 552, 556, 38 Sup. Ct. 207. It seems that the legislature may confer power to determine election results either on an administrative body or on a court. Lyons v. Becker (1916) 272 Ill. 333, 336, 111 N. E. 980.

[47] Thus the legislature may appropriate money to pay a claim against the state, although the court of claims has decided that the claim is unfounded. Fergus v. Russel (1917) 277 Ill. 20, 115 N. E. 166.

Since the separation of powers operates by way of exclusion, the important thing is to consider what this exclusion is,—what power is non-legislative, non-executive and non-judicial. The legislature as the creator and destroyer of rights is in a sense the superior department, since, as Locke puts it, "the legislature is no otherwise legislative of the society, but by the right it has to make laws for all the parts." [48] By fixing the rights of persons, the duties of executives and the jurisdiction of courts, it largely determines the form the government shall take, the extent to which the power of the administrative and judicial departments shall be called into play.

Fixing a railroad rate confers on all who tender goods for shipment a right against the carrier to have that rate. It governs an undetermined multitude of persons and future transactions. When given by a legislature, it is given as a new, independent right, and not as an enforcement of a preëxisting one. Therefore it is legislation.[49] But though a legislature may itself fix rates it may instead provide that they shall be such as a board determine to be reasonable. The board only determines a fact and promulgates the law accordingly. The legislature has adopted the determination in advance and provided for writing it into the law when made.[50]

A grant of a special right to a particular person is also legislation.[51] But where it is obvious that the legislature is not attempting to create a new right, because it is desirable that a new right should exist, but to enforce, in favor of A against B, what it believes to be an old right because it thinks the right exists and deserves enforcement, it is obvious that the legislature is attempting to adjudicate, and its act is invalid.[52]

[52] Thus an act is valid which confers on a particular bastard a right to inherit from parents living when the act is passed. See Norman v. Heist (1843, Pa.) 5 Watts & S. 171. But an act is void which sets off specified land to a widow to be held as her dower. Edwards v. Pope (1842) 4 Ill. 465. It is within legislative power to give a particular plaintiff a right to special relief provided he obtains judgment. Edwards v. Pope, supra. Or to authorize a particular guardian to sell his ward's land for the ward's benefit. Mason v. Wait (1842) 5 Ill. 127. Or a particular administrator to sell land to pay judgment creditors. See Rozier v. Fagan (1868) 46 Ill. 404. But it is not within legislative power to authorize an administrator to sell land and pay from the proceeds alleged creditors who have not recovered judgment. Lane v. Dorman (1841) 4 Ill. 238 (to pay a specified claim); Rozier v. Fagan, supra (to pay debts generally). Or to make it the duty of a grantee, whose land is not under the control of the state, to reconvey to the grantor by a statute whose preamble recites that the conveyance was on a condition which has been broken. Board v. Bakewell (1887) 122 Ill. 339, 10 N. E. 378. Nor can a recital of a non-political fact in a statute be conclusive. And an act is invalid which sets aside a judgment and grants a new trial. Merrill v. Sherburne (1818) 1 N. H. 199. But acts validating defective acknowledgments (Steger v. Traveling Men's Ass. (1904) 208 Ill. 236, 70 N. E. 236) or votes cast by disqualified electors (People v. Peltier (1916) 275 Ill. 217, 113 N. E. 856) justly confer new rights, and therefore are not judgments upon former rights. It is a doctrine of the civil law that where the canons of interpretation do not suffice, a later statute interpreting an earlier one binds the judges, even as to past cases. Coxe, Judicial Powers and Unconstitutional Legislation (1893) 60; Esmein, ibid., 437. Making law involves declaring what the law means, and reiterating the law's meaning to make it certain is thought naturally to appertain to the power of originally declaring it; and the maker knows his intention best. Eius est interpretari cuius est condere. But the common law with truer insight holds that legal duty depends on what the law ordains, not on what the legislature intended to ordain, or thinks it has ordained, and that interpretation, being the ascertainment of legal duty, is for the court. A legislature may properly make the operation of its laws conditional when the condition affects their expediency. Thus a statute may be passed to be operative only in time of war. Where expediency depends on the wishes of those whom the law will affect, its operation in a given locality may be made to depend on a majority vote in its favor.

Though it is within legislative power to create a special private right, there is high authority for saying that to destroy a private right, unless under a general law or rule of policy, is not, in general, legislation. An act conveying to A, B's land, in which A has no special concern, simply on the ground that A can use it better or needs it more, is legislative in a sense, and certainly is not adjudication. But there was no thought of vesting in the government power to make particular confiscations for private benefit. That is not the kind of thing meant by legislation.[53]

As "the nature of the final act" determines the nature of the proceedings, the body that is to act is within its function in controlling matters incident to its action. Either house may, without usurping judicial power, admit to or exclude from participation in its affairs members whose qualifications are questioned;[54] summon witnesses and require them to answer questions relevant to contemplated legislative action; condemn to punishment for contempt persons who obstruct it or disobey its lawful commands;[55] and apply force in preserving order at its sessions.[56] But it is not within legislative power to conduct inquiries merely to satisfy curiosity or to enlighten the public, and neither the separate houses nor the whole legislature may compel attendance before a legislative committee for that purpose.[57]

JUDICIAL POWER.

That a judgment, like a statute, creates a new right is clear because it is valid even though founded in misjudgment, as where no cause of action really existed. Within the jurisdiction, it extinguishes the original claim. It carries right to execution. It may include interest and costs. It differs from a statutory right in being conferred only on application, on specific persons, and after a determination that under existing law they have a right to it. This gives the measure of judicial power. Thus, as has been said, the legislature may grant a right on conditions and empower a court, if it finds them fulfilled, to grant a new right by way of putting the old one into effect. So judicial power may be invoked to grant a certificate of incorporation,[58] or of election,[59] or to naturalize an alien.[60] Taking acknowledgments and celebrating marriages, sometimes adduced as instances of administrative action by judges, seem to the writer to be judicial action of this kind, for the effect is to confer a new right on an applicant deemed entitled to receive it. But the condition must be one of fact, not of expediency. To grant a right because it is expedient to grant it is to make law. A statute which directs a court to grant a right upon proof that it ought to be granted is void as attempting to confer legislative power. A court can not be empowered to incorporate a city upon finding that the city ought to be incorporated,[61] or "that the interests of the inhabitants will be promoted;"[62] but may have power to create a drainage district on petition and proof that the drains will be useful.[63] It may determine what location has been granted a street-railway and enter an order fixing it; but it is not within judicial power, as has been held, to determine what location, motive power and track will be the proper ones, and issue license to use them.[64] Power to issue licenses to fit persons has generally been upheld.[65] The principle is clear, but matters of fact and of expediency blend. Where the character of a thing depends on circumstances, we can not set up a quantitative standard for determining its character. And where a quantitative standard is impracticable we are often driven to using terms which savor of expediency. Speed must not be dangerous, regulations unreasonable, or goods unfit for use. There is conflict in the cases as to the degree in which room may be left for considerations of expediency to affect the determination. The separation of powers is not intended to prevent employing that organ of government whose characteristic mode of action is most appropriate for dealing with the situation. Where a standard of pure fact is impossible, and the conditions are so defined that when the facts in any case are ascertained there is little room for difference of opinion as to whether they come within the standard as defined, the power of the court should be upheld.

Judicial power acts specifically. To order a man to fulfill in general a legal duty to others, would duplicate the rule of law by adding a new obligation to obey the order, and would be to legislate. A court can go no farther in this regard than to enjoin, or to order specific performance, in favor of a party threatened with injury. It has been held that as a public utility company is bound to serve at a reasonable rate, a court may be empowered, on the application of a person to whom such service has been denied, to determine a reasonable rate and to direct the rendering of service at that rate to that person for a limited time.[66] But the court can not be empowered on such an application to require the utility to adhere to the rate for all customers.[67] As already explained[68] that would be to take part in legislation. The court would be the mouthpiece of the legislature reënacting the law in specific terms. The doctrine is that although it may be made an administrative function to ascertain and declare the existence of a fact upon which a statute is to take effect, as when demobilization is complete, or what rate is reasonable, it can not be a judicial one.

The statutory power of a court to require obedience to an order of a commission by mandamus or injunction issued on application in behalf of the state would seem to be limited by this principle. See Ill. Pub. Util. Act, sec. 75; Fed. Trade Commission Act, secs. 5, 9. It is one thing to enjoin a man from further maintaining a particular house of ill-fame. It is another thing to order him to abstain from keeping any and all houses of ill-fame, or to obey the laws in general.

A court has, however, a power to make rules, which arises from the fact that it may control its own procedure in a way that does not amount to a denial of the parties' rights to relief or conflict with statutes. So far as it may control its procedure, it may announce in advance the manner in which it will act, and its rules may create rights which it would be error for it to disregard, and which, when the making of rules is authorized by statute, create rights which rank with statutory rights.[69]

There is a class of cases in which judicial power is invoked to guide executive discretion, which merits special consideration. Administrative boards and officers often have to take action which depends upon their decision as to law and fact, and directly affects the rights of others. If they exceed their authority, a court may generally give redress.[70] But they may act within their authority, and yet incorrectly. A valid assessment may be too high,[71] a license may be refused by mistake of law. A court is peculiarly fitted to decide questions of law and many questions of fact, and in the interest of good government it ought to be possible to obtain a court's decision, though there has been no violation of a legal right. It is competent for the legislature to give a court power, at the instance of a person aggrieved, to review administrative proceedings (other than rule making), determine what decisions of law and fact should have been made, and direct action in accordance with its findings. This is judicial action of a peculiar kind. No duty has been violated. The legislature has conferred on the person whose rights are affected, by the administrative action, a right to have the action changed and made correct, and has imposed on the court a duty of putting this right into effect. The court's action is analogous to issuing a certificate of incorporation, or of election, rather than to setting aside proceedings in excess of authority. The court merely determines what executive action was proper upon the evidence which the executive had before it. The decision is simply that given executive action shall or shall not take place. There is no adjudication on anything else. Thus where the issue of a patent for an invention is objected to on the ground that it infringes a previous patent, Congress may subject the patent commissioner's decision to review by a court, on the evidence before the commissioner, but the court's decision is only that the patent shall or shall not issue, and is not an adjudication that there is no infringement. If the patent is issued, the earlier patentee, though he was a party to the proceedings, may sue for infringement without prejudice.[72]

So, too, an appeal may be granted from the verdict of a sheriff's jury as to the title to property attached, but the decision merely affects the action and "liability" of the sheriff, and does not settle the title.[73] Other examples of court control over executive action that is valid but incorrect are furnished by appeals on the merits from taxing-boards,[74] assessments by drainage commissioners,[75] rulings of election officers,[76] and of registration officers,[77] and in appeals on points of law from decisions of the Industrial Board in workmen's compensation cases.[78] May an appeal also be granted from an administrative ruling which involves no decision except as to matters of law and fact, but which instead of affecting only a single case promulgates a rule of law for future transactions, for example an order fixing reasonable railroad rates?[79] The commission's work consists substantially in ascertaining, first, what the law means by "reasonable," a matter of law, though hardly yet ascertained; and, secondly, what rates possess those qualities designated as reasonable, which is in substance a question of fact as to the effect of given rates. Hence it would seem that a court might constitutionally be vested with power to review an order fixing reasonable rates, to set aside a ruling contrary to the weight of evidence, and to direct a ruling in accordance with it,[80] though the language of some cases is to the contrary.[81] It does not require the court to collect evidence or to promulgate the order,[82] but only to ensure that executive action shall proceed upon a correct view of law and fact.

Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Cent. R. R. (1910) 215 U. S. 452, 30 Sup. Ct. 155. ADMINISTRATIVE POWER.[a]

The separation of powers does not require the legislature to settle all details of policy. Discretion belongs to the executive as well. It is enough if the legislature determines policies as far as is practicable, leaving to executive discretion the mode of carrying them out and the occasions on which action is required.[83] What the executive may accomplish by action it may accomplish without exceeding the limits of executive power by order. For illustration, as the legislature may empower the executive to prevent accidents and crowding by taking charge of traffic at street intersections, leaving to executive discretion the streets at which control of traffic is required and the mode of controlling it, so it may empower the executive to control it by making regulations and enforcing them. This vests the executive with power to make laws.[84] But making laws of this character is not a non-executive function, a usurpation of legislative power any more than control to the same extent by the discretionary use of force would be. So far as concerns the principle of the separation of powers, it is all one whether the police stop a horse at a street crossing by seizing its head, or by telling its driver to stop, or by issuing a rule requiring everybody to stop.

Thus the legislature may empower customs officers to exclude unwholesome teas by fixing standards of wholesomeness as well as by discretionary action in each case,[85] inspectors to fix the character of fire escapes by regulation as well as by separate approvals,[86] and a prison board to govern its discipline of convicts by rules.[87] Upon this principle rest the rule making powers of civil service boards;[88] of boards of health;[89] of the department of the interior concerning the use of the public domain;[90] and of the interstate commerce commission as to the form of railroad accounts.[91] The farther administrative control by use of force extends, the farther goes the power of making rules. The power to command the army in management, discipline and drill may be exercised by army regulations and by courts martial administering a military law.

Conversely an attempt to empower a customs officer to collect such duties as he thinks proper, a board of pharmacy to determine whether or not to issue licenses to sell patent medicines,[92] or a fire marshal to require safety appliances in cases of danger, or to dispense with them, as he thinks best,[93] is invalid as vesting in an executive a kind of discretion which under the constitution belongs only to the legislature, though it does not involve his imposing any regulations at all.[94]

It is plain that administrative officers may be empowered to take specific action in executing the law on condition that the specific facts exist on which the law depends, and to take measures necessary to decide whether or not the facts do exist and whether or not the law does authorize action, in order to act accordingly, and that this involves no exercise of power judicial in such sense as to be non-administrative.[95] However it is sometimes said that in such cases administrative officers act judicially,[96] and the statement, though tending to confusion, is correct if it merely means that their mental processes resemble those of courts, or that due process may require a hearing, or that their resulting action may, like a judgment, be final, in that it may (as in awarding a pension or a civil service rating) confer a right which can not be rescinded except for a distinct cause.

The distinction between deciding upon a legal right for the purpose of taking such administrative action as the law directs or authorizes in case the right exists, and deciding upon a legal right for the purpose of adjudicating and determining it, may be illustrated by comparing the preceding cases with those that follow: Cleveland, etc., R. R. v. People (1904) 212 Ill. 638, 72 N. E. 725 (an assessor can not be empowered to impose a penalty for misconduct); Hall v. Marks, supra (clerk of court cannot enter judgment on default); Poppen v. Chase (1897) 165 Ill. 527, 46 N. E. 454, which holds that the legislature can not empower a registrar under the Torrens Act to make title to land good by registering it. It may be doubted, however, whether the facts brought this case within the principle, for the act of the registrar did not directly validate title, but only started the running of a short statute of limitations. It seems analogous to Devine v. Brunswick-Balke Co., supra, which holds that the legislature may make the verdict of a coroner's jury prima facie evidence of the cause of death.

The Interstate Commerce Act forbids excessive charges and unfair discriminations. Yet however excessive a charge has been or however unfair a discrimination, if it was in accordance with the carriers' duly published regulations, no court may award damages for the violation of the act, unless the Interstate Commerce Commission has first ruled that such a charge or discrimination would violate the act. The commission's determination as to the character of the alleged charge or discrimination is conclusive, both as to the carrier and as to the shipper. Phillips Co. v. Grand Trunk, etc., R. R. (1915) 236 U. S. 662, 35 Sup. Ct. 444; Pennsylvania R. R. v. Stineman Coal Co. (1915) 242 U. S. 298, 37 Sup. Ct. 118. This determination as to past rights looks at first sight like an exercise of judicial power. In truth, it is precisely parallel to the establishment of rates and practises for the future. It is an administrative determination of fact as to the character of the rate or practise, and the promulgation of the rule of law concerning it which the legislature has provided for. But instead of being promulgated for the future, the rule is promulgated, in a sense retroactively, to govern all past transactions. The explanation is found in the fact that the Interstate Commerce Act while it expressly prohibits excessive rates and unfair discriminations, nevertheless, in order to secure uniformity in the treatment of shippers, also provides, in effect, that reg-

Thus in the much discussed Ju Toy case[98] it was held that Congress, having under its legislative power denied to alien Chinese a privilege to enter the United States, could provide for the enforcement of the law, by empowering collectors of ports to exclude persons of the Chinese race, provided, after inquiry, they deemed them (though mistakenly) to be aliens. It is the same principle which authorizes policemen to prevent boys skating on ice, which the policemen, though mistakenly, think too thin. There is no exercise of judicial power in any degree. There is merely a decision by an executive that a case has arisen in which it is his duty to act. If in acting, he exceeds his authority, a person aggrieved has his remedy, by injunction, mandamus, habeas corpus, or suit for damages, as the case may be. If there has been no excess of authority, there is nothing for a court to redress. Whether there is excess of authority may depend on whether the legislature has seen fit to condition authority on the truth as to the facts, or on the officer's opinion as to them. When a policeman is authorized to prevent skating if he thinks the ice too thin, and acts mistakenly, the only remedy the boys have is to wait for another occasion. They may apply for permission five minutes later, if they wish, and the case is a new one. In the Ju Toy case, if the collector's authority had only been to exclude those who were aliens in fact, Ju Toy, if really a citizen, could have obtained from the court a release from detention. If he were not of Chinese race, but looked like a Chinaman, he could have had his release, for the collector's authority happened only to be to detain those who were really Chinese and who were or whom he thought to be aliens. As it was, the collector had a right to exclude Ju Toy; but it would be a great mistake to suppose that the collector's decision deprived him of anything except ability to enter the country on that occasion. He could have come again to the United States and applied for admission before the same or any other collector, and he would have had a right to a new ruling. If, while detained, he had sued the collector for false imprisonment in a United States court, alleging that he, Ju Toy, was a citizen of one state, and the collector a citizen of another, the court might have decided that he was a citizen and that it had jurisdiction, at the same time it decided that the imprisonment was not illegal and gave judgment against him on the merits.

ulations duly published shall be obligatory unless and until the commission rules that they are counter to the act. A carrier thus establishes a rule at the risk of being bound to follow it while it is in force, and of becoming liable in damages, if the commission after the event, displaces it and substitutes a different standard, as being the course of conduct which the carrier was bound to follow. The new standard, accordingly, furnishes the measure of the rights of all shippers, whether they took part in the proceedings by which it was established or not. Phillips Co. v. Grand Trunk, etc., R. R., supra; Pennsylvania R. R. v. Puritan Coal Co. (1915) 237 U. S. 121, 131, 35 Sup. Ct. 484; Loomis v. Lehigh Valley R. R., supra; Pennsylvania R. R. v. Stineman Coal Co., supra.

In cases like this, discussions as to the degree in which administrative action may involve an exercise of judicial power are beside the point. Such administrative action is not judicial in any degree. But the fact that authority may be made to depend on a variety of facts, and either on facts or on belief as to facts, illustrates the elasticity in governmental method which is possible within the limits imposed by the separation of powers. Separation prevents the executive from adjudging controverted individual rights, or from making strictly legislative determinations of policy, but it leaves the legislature abundant opportunity by enlarging executive discretion and authority to contract the area within which courts are capable of giving protection in order to extend the area in which the executive may act with freedom. It makes some abuses impossible and diminishes the temptation to others and thus, as Professor Burgess has said, it "has a tendency to retard the development of government in its almost inevitable tendency to absolutism."[99] For beside the positive limitations that separation imposes, it enables the legislature, being prevented from itself exercising either the executive or the judicial power, to hold the balance impartially between the positive and negative functions of government, between the promotion of social interests and the judicial protection of rights. But to secure impartiality is not in itself to secure justice or wisdom. A well balanced diet is not a warranty of health. Powers arbitrary or discordant may sometimes be bestowed on others as well as grasped for one's self, and it is possible for a legislature so to extend the boundaries of executive authority and discretion, that the executive, within its realm, may act pretty largely according to its own views of policy, law and fact. It is where there are real abuses to correct that the practice of arbitrary power begins, and the danger "is always greater where the purposes for which it is exercised are good" because there it is less easy to see the danger.[1] "Good men in good times should beware of setting bad precedents for bad men in bad times."[2] * * *

SPRINGER ET AL. v. GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

1928. Supreme Court of the United States. 277 U. S. 189.

Certiorari to two judgments of ouster rendered by the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands in proceedings in the nature of quo warranto, which were brought in that court by the Philippine Government against the present petitioners, to test their right to be directors in certain corporations described in the opinion.

Mr. Justice Sutherland delivered the opinion of the court.

These cases, presenting substantially the same question, were argued and will be considered and disposed of together. In each case an action in the nature of quo warranto was brought in the court below challenging the right to hold office of directors of certain corporations organized under the legislative authority of the Philippine Islands, No. 564 involving directors of the National Coal Company and No. 573 involving directors of the Philippine National Bank.

The National Coal Company was created by Act 2705, approved March 10, 1917, subsequently amended by Act 2822, approved March 5, 1919. The Governor-General, under the provisions of the amended act, subscribed on behalf of the Philippine Islands for substantially all of the capital stock. The act provides: "The voting power of all such stock owned by the Government of the Philippine Islands shall be vested exclusively in a committee, consisting of the Governor-General, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives."

The National Bank was created by Act 2612, approved February 4, 1916, subsequently amended by Act 2747, approved February 20, 1918, and Act 2938, approved January 30, 1921. The authorized capital of the bank, as finally fixed, was 10,000,000 pesos, consisting of 100,000 shares, of which, in pursuance of the legislative provisions, the Philippine Government acquired and owns 97,332 shares, the remainder being held by private persons. By the original act the voting power of the government-owned stock was vested exclusively in the Governor-General, but by the amended acts now in force that power was "vested exclusively in a board, the short title of which shall be 'Board of Control,' composed of the Governor-General, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives." * * *

In pursuance of the first-quoted provision, petitioners in No. 564 were elected directors of the National Coal Company by a vote of the government-owned shares cast by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House; and, in pursuance of the second quoted provision, petitioners in No. 573 were elected directors of the National Bank in the same way. The Governor-General, challenging the validity of the legislation, did not participate in either election. While there are some differences between the two actions in respect of the facts, they are differences of detail which do not affect the substantial question to be determined.

On behalf of the Philippine government, respondent in both cases, it is contended that the election of directors and managing agents by a vote of the government-owned stock was an executive function intrusted by the Organic Act of the Philippine Islands to the Governor-General, and that the acts of the Legislature divesting him of that power and vesting it, in the one case, in a "board," and, in the other, in a "committee," the majority of which in each instance consisted of officers and members of the Legislature, were invalid as being in conflict with the Organic Act. The court below sustained the contention of the Government and entered judgments of ouster against the petitioners in each case.

The Congressional legislation referred to as the "Organic Act" is the enactment of August 29, 1916, c. 416, 39 Stat. 545, which constitutes the fundamental law of the Philippine Islands and bears a relation to their governmental affairs not unlike that borne by a state constitution to the state. The act contains a bill of rights, many of the provisions of which are taken from the federal Constitution. It lays down fundamental rules in respect of taxation, shipping, customs duties, etc. Section 8 of the act provides, "That general legislative power, except as otherwise herein provided, is hereby granted to the Philippine Legislature, authorized by this Act." And by § 12 this legislative power is vested in a legislature, to consist of two houses, one the senate and the other the house of representatives. Provision is made (§§ 13, 14 and 17) for memberships, terms and qualifications of the members of each house. By § 21 it is provided "that the supreme executive power shall be vested in an executive officer, whose official title shall be 'The Governor General of the Philippine Islands.'" He is given "general supervision and control of all of the departments and bureaus of the government in the Philippine Islands as far as is not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act." He is made "responsible for the faithful execution of the laws of the Philippine Islands and of the United States operative within the Philippine Islands." Other powers of an important and comprehensive character also are conferred upon him. By § 22 the executive departments of the Philippine government, as then authorized by law, are continued until otherwise provided by the legislature. The legislature is authorized by appropriate legislation to "increase the number or abolish any of the executive departments, or make such changes in the names and duties thereof as it may see fit," and "provide for the appointment and removal of the heads of the executive departments by the Governor General." Then follows the proviso: "That all executive functions of the government must be directly under the Governor General or within one of the executive departments under the supervision and control of the Governor General." Section 26 recognizes the existing supreme court and courts of first instance of the Islands and continues their jurisdiction as theretofore provided, with such additional jurisdiction as shall thereafter be prescribed by law.

Thus the Organic Act, following the rule established by the American constitutions, both state and federal, divides the government into three separate departments—the legislative, executive and judicial. Some of our state constitutions expressly provide in one form or another that the legislative, executive and judicial powers of the government shall be forever separate and distinct from each other. Other constitutions, including that of the United States, do not contain such an express provision. But it is implicit in all, as a conclusion logically following from the separation of the several departments. See Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, 190-191. And this separation and the consequent exclusive character of the powers conferred upon each of the three departments is basic and vital—not merely a matter of governmental mechanism. That the principle is implicit in the Philippine Organic Act does not admit of doubt. See Abueva v. Wood, 45 Phil. Rep. 612, 622, 628 et seq.

It may be stated then, as a general rule inherent in the American constitutional system, that, unless otherwise expressly provided or incidental to the powers conferred, the legislature can not exercise either executive or judicial power; the executive can not exercise either legislative or judicial power; the judiciary can not exercise either executive or legislative power. The existence in the various constitutions of occasional provisions expressly giving to one of the departments powers which by their nature otherwise would fall within the general scope of the authority of another department emphasizes, rather than casts doubt upon, the generally inviolate character of this basic rule.

Legislative power, as distinguished from executive power, is the authority to make laws, but not to enforce them or appoint the agents charged with the duty of such enforcement. The latter are executive functions. It is unnecessary to enlarge further upon the general subject, since it has so recently received the full consideration of this court. Myers v. United States, 272 U. S. 52.

Not having the power of appointment, unless expressly granted or incidental to its powers, the legislature can not ingraft executive duties upon a legislative office, since that would be to usurp the power of appointment by indirection; though the case might be different if the additional duties were devolved upon an appointee of the executive. Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S. 282, 300, 301. Here the members of the legislature who constitute a majority of the "board" and "committee," respectively, are not charged with the performance of any legislative functions or with the doing of anything which is in aid of the performance of any such functions by the Legislature. Putting aside for the moment the question whether the duties devolved upon these members are vested by the Organic Act in the Governor General, it is clear that they are not legislative in character, and still more clear that they are not judicial. The fact that they do not fall within the authority of either of these two constitutes logical ground for concluding that they do fall within that of the remaining one of the three among which the powers of government are divided. Compare Myers v. United States, supra, pp. 117-118.

Assuming, for present purposes, that the duty of managing this property, namely, the government-owned shares of stock in these corporations, is not sovereign but proprietary in its nature, the conclusion must be the same. The property is owned by the government, and the government in dealing with it, whether in its quasi sovereign or its proprietary capacity, nevertheless acts in its governmental capacity. There is nothing in the Organic Act, or in the nature of the legislative power conferred by it, to suggest that the Legislature in acting in respect of the proprietary rights of the government may disregard the limitation that it must exercise legislative and not executive functions. It must deal with the property of the government by making rules, and not by executing them. The appointment of managers (in this instance corporate directors) of property or a business, is essentially an executive act which the legislature is without capacity to perform directly or through any of its members.

Whether the members of the "board" or the "committee" are public officers in a strict sense, we do not find it necessary to determine. They are public agents at least, charged with the exercise of executive functions and, therefore, beyond the appointing power of the legislature. Stockman v. Leddy, 55 Colo. 24, involved a case very much like that now under consideration. The state legislature had created a committee of its own members to investigate the rights of the state in the flowing waters therein. The committee was authorized to determine what steps were necessary to be taken to protect the rights of the state, to employ counsel, etc. There was no claim that the investigation was for the purpose of ascertaining facts to aid in future legislation or to assist the legislature in its legislative capacity, but it was for the purpose of enabling the committee itself to reach a conclusion as to what should be proper to do in order to protect the rights of the state. The court, in holding the act unconstitutional, said (p. 31): "In other words, the general assembly not only passed an act—that is, made a law—but it made a joint committee of the senate and the house as its executive agent to carry out that law. This is a clear and conspicuous instance of an attempt by the general assembly to confer executive power upon a collection of its own members." And the court held that this was invalid under the provisions of the state constitution respecting the tripartite division of governmental powers. See also, Clark v. Stanly, 66 N. C. 59; State ex rel. Howerton v. Tate, 68 N. C. 546.

Petitioners seek to draw a parallel between the power of Congress to create corporations as appropriate means of executing governmental powers and the acts of the Philippine legislature here under consideration. To what extent the powers of the two bodies in this respect may be assimilated we need not stop now to determine, since the power of the legislature to create the two corporations here involved is not doubted. But it is argued further that Congress in creating corporations for governmental purposes has sometimes devolved the voting power in such corporations upon persons other than executive officers. In the case of the Smithsonian Institution, cited as an example, Congress provided for a governing Board of Regents composed in part of members of the Senate and of the House. There are two or three other instances in respect of non-stock organizations of like character. On the other hand, as pointed out by the Solicitor General, in the case of governmentally organized or controlled stock corporations, Congress has uniformly recognized the executive authority in their management, generally providing in express terms that the shares shall be voted by an executive officer, and in no instance attempting to grant such power to one or more of its members. Many instances of this kind are cited by the Solicitor General, but it is not necessary to repeat his enumeration. It is enough to say that, when we consider the limited number of acts of Congress which fall within the first class spoken of above, as well as the peculiar character of the institutions dealt with, and the contrary attitude of Congress toward corporations of a different character, such acts can not be regarded as lending support to a construction of the Constitution which would justify congressional legislation like that here involved. * * *

And we are further of the opinion that the powers asserted by the Philippine Legislature are vested by the Organic Act in the Governor-General. The intent of Congress to that effect is disclosed by the provisions of that act already set forth. Stated concisely these provisions are: that the supreme executive power is vested in the Governor-General, who is given general supervision and control over all the departments and bureaus of the Philippine government; upon him is placed the responsibility for the faithful execution of the laws of the Philippine Islands; and, by the general proviso, already quoted, all executive functions must be directly under the Governor-General or within one of the executive departments under his supervision and control. These are grants comprehensive enough to include the powers attempted to be exercised by the legislature by the provisions of law now under review. * * *

The judgments in both cases are affirmed.

Mr. Justice Holmes. The great ordinances of the Constitution do not establish and divide fields of black and white. Even the more specific of them are found to terminate in a penumbra shading gradually from one extreme to the other. Property must not be taken without compensation, but with the help of a phrase, (the police power) some property may be taken or destroyed for public use without paying for it, if you do not take too much. When we come to the fundamental distinctions it is still more obvious that they must be received with a certain latitude or our government could not go on.

To make a rule of conduct applicable to an individual who but for such action would be free from it is to legislate—yet it is what the judges do whenever they determine which of two competing principles of policy shall prevail. At an early date it was held that Congress could delegate to the Courts the power to regulate process, which certainly is lawmaking so far as it goes. Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. 1, 42. Bank of the United States v. Halstead, 10 Wheat. 51. With regard to the Executive, Congress has delegated to it or to some branch of it the power to impose penalties, Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U. S. 320; to make conclusive determination of dutiable values, Passavant v. United States, 148 U. S. 214; to establish standards for imports, Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470; to make regulations as to forest reserves, United States v. Grimaud, 220 U. S. 506, and other powers not needing to be stated in further detail. Houston v. St. Louis Independent Packing Co., 249 U. S. 479. Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S. 364. Ex parte Kollock, 165 U. S. 526. Congress has authorized the President to suspend the operation of a statute, even one suspending commercial intercourse with another country, Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, and very recently it has been decided that the President might be given power to change the tariff. J. W. Hampton, Jr., & Co. v. United States, 276 U. S. 394. It is said that the powers of Congress can not be delegated, yet Congress has established the Interstate Commerce Commission, which does legislative, judicial and executive acts, only softened by a quasi; makes regulations, Intermountain Rate Cases, 234 U. S. 476, 486, issues reparation orders, and performs executive functions in connection with Safety Appliance Acts, Boiler Inspection Acts, &c. Congress also has made effective excursions in the other direction. It has withdrawn jurisdiction of a case after it has been argued. Ex parte McCardle, 7 Wall. 506. It has granted an amnesty, notwithstanding the grant to the President of the power to pardon. Brown v.

Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 601. A territorial legislature has granted a divorce. Maynard v. Hill, 125 U. S. 190. Congress has declared lawful an obstruction to navigation that this Court has declared unlawful. Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & Belmont Bridge Co., 18 How. 421. Parallel to the case before us, Congress long ago established the Smithsonian Institution, to question which would be to lay hands on the Ark of the Covenant; not to speak of later similar exercises of power hitherto unquestioned, so far as I know.

It does not seem to need argument to show that however we may disguise it by veiling words we do not and can not carry out the distinction between legislative and executive action with mathematical precision and divide the branches into watertight compartments, were it ever so desirable to do so, which I am far from believing that it is, or that the Constitution requires.

The only qualification of such latitude as otherwise would be consistent with the threefold division of power, is the proviso in § 22 of the Organic Act "that all executive functions of the Government must be directly under the Governor General or within one of the executive departments," &c. Act of August 29, 1916, c. 416, 39 Stat. 553, U. S. C., Title 48, § 1114. That does not appear to me to govern the case. The corporations concerned were private corporations which the legislature had power to incorporate. Whoever owned the stock, the corporation did not perform functions of the Government. This would be plain if the stock were in private hands, and if the government bought the stock from private owners the functions of the corporations would not be changed. If I am right in what I have said I think that ownership would not make voting upon the stock an executive function of the government when the acts of the corporation were not. I can not believe that the legislature might not have provided for the holding of the stock by a board of private persons with no duty to the government other than to keep it informed and to pay over such dividends as might accrue. It is said that the functions of the Board of Control are not legislative or judicial and therefore they must be executive. I should say rather that they plainly are no part of the executive functions of the Government but rather fall into the indiscriminate residue of matters within legislative control. I think it would be lamentable even to hint a doubt as to the legitimacy of the action of Congress in establishing the Smithsonian as it did, and I see no sufficient reason for denying the Philippine legislature a similar power.

Mr. Justice Brandeis agrees with this opinion.

Mr. Justice McReynolds. I think the opinion of the majority goes much beyond the necessities of the case.

The Organic Act is careful to provide:

"That all executive functions of the government must be directly under the Governor General or within one of the executive departments under the supervision and control of the Governor General."

A good reason lies behind this limitation which does not apply to our federal or state governments. From the language employed, read in the light of all the circumstances, perhaps it is possible to spell out enough to overthrow the challenged legislation. Beyond that it is unnecessary to go.

CHAPTER V.

DUE PROCESS OF LAW: AMENDMENTS V AND XIV.

Section 1.—As a Standard of Validity of Modes of Law Enforcement.[1]

DEN d. MURRAY ET AL. v. THE HOBOKEN LAND, ETC. COMPANY.

1855. Supreme Court of the United States. 18 How. 272.

MR. JUSTICE CURTIS delivered the opinion of the court.

This case comes before us on a certificate of division of opinion of the judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey. It is an action of ejectment, in which both parties claim title under Samuel Swartwout—the plaintiffs, under the levy of an execution on the 10th day of April, 1839, and the defendants, under a sale made by the marshal of the United States for the District of New Jersey, on the 1st day of June, 1839—by virtue of what is denominated a distress warrant, issued by the solicitor of the treasury under the Act of Congress of May 15, 1820, * * *.

[1] The cases in this section, with the exception of Murray v. Hoboken Land etc. Co., and Home Telephone and Telegraph Co. v. City of Los Angeles, deal with law administration by courts (judicial procedure). The restrictions of due process of law in administrative procedure are dealt with in Chapter VII.

What is due process in procedure varies with the governmental purpose to be accomplished and somewhat with the nature of the interests affected. It has been said that "by 'due process' is meant one which * * * is appropriate to the nature of the case."—Field, J., in Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, (1884) 111 U. S. 701, 708, 28 L. ed. 569.

"What is due process of law must be determined by circumstances. To those in the military or naval service of the United States the military law is due process. The decision, therefore, of a military tribunal acting within the scope of its powers cannot be reviewed or set aside by the [civil] courts." McKenna, J., in Reaves v. Ainsworth (1911) 219 U. S. 296, 304, 55 L. ed. 225.

In holding that an attorney may be disbarred by a court acting without a jury, it has been said: "It is a mistaken idea that due process of law requires a plenary suit and a trial by jury, in all cases where property or personal rights are involved. The important right of personal liberty is generally determined by a single judge, on a writ of habeas corpus, using affidavits or depositions for proofs, where facts are to be established. Assessments for damages and benefits occasioned by public improvements are usually made by commissioners in a summary way. Conflicting claims of creditors, amounting to thousands of dollars, are often settled by the courts on affidavits or depositions alone. And the courts of chancery, bankruptcy, probate, and admiralty administer immense fields of jurisdiction without trial by jury. In all cases, that kind of procedure is due process of law which is suitable and proper to the nature of the case, and sanctioned by the established customs and usages of the courts." Bradley, J., in Ex parte Wall (1882) 107 U. S. 265, 289, 27 L. ed. 552.

"Due process is not necessarily judicial process." Brewer, J., in Reetz v. Michigan (1903) 188 U. S. 505, 507, 47 L. ed. 563.

No objection has been taken to the warrant on account of any defect or irregularity in the proceedings which preceded its issue. It is not denied that they were in conformity with the requirements of the Act of Congress. The special verdict finds that Swartwout was collector of the customs for the port of New York for eight years before the 29th of March, 1838: that, on the 10th of November, 1838, his account, as such collector, was audited by the first auditor, and certified by the first comptroller of the treasury; and for the balance thus found, amounting to the sum of $1,374,119 65/100, the warrant in question was issued by the solicitor of the treasury. Its validity is denied by the plaintiffs, upon the ground that so much of the Act of Congress as authorized it, is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

In support of this position, the plaintiff relies on that part of the first section of the third article of the Constitution which requires the judicial power of the United States to be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish; the judges whereof shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. Also, on the second section of the same article, which declares that the judicial power shall extend to controversies to which the United States shall be a party.

It must be admitted that, if the auditing of this account, and the ascertainment of its balance, and the issuing of this process, was an exercise of the judicial power of the United States, the proceeding was void; for the officers who performed these acts could exercise no part of that judicial power. They neither constituted a court of the United States, nor were they, or either of them, so connected with any such court as to perform even any of the ministerial duties which arise out of judicial proceedings.

The question, whether these acts were an exercise of the judicial power of the United States, can best be considered under another inquiry, raised by the further objection of the plaintiff, that the effect of the proceedings authorized by the Act in question is to deprive the party, against whom the warrant issues, of his liberty and property, "without due process of law;" and, therefore, is in conflict with the fifth article of the amendments of the Constitution.

Taking these two objections together, they raise the questions, whether, under the Constitution of the United States, a collector of the customs, from whom a balance of account has been found to be due by accounting officers of the treasury, designated for that purpose by law, can be deprived of his liberty, or property, in order to enforce payment of that balance, without the exercise of the judicial power of the United States, and yet by due process of law, within the meaning of those terms in the Constitution; and if so, then, secondly, whether the warrant in question was such due process of law?

The words, "due process of law," were undoubtedly intended to convey the same meaning as the words, "by the law of the land," in Magna Charta. Lord Coke, in his commentary on those words (2 Inst. 50), says they mean due process of law. The constitutions which had been adopted by the several states before the formation of the Federal Constitution, following the language of the great charter more closely, generally contained the words, "but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land." The ordinance of Congress of July 13, 1787, for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, used the same words.

The Constitution of the United States, as adopted, contained the provision, that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." When the fifth article of amendment containing the words now in question was made, the trial by jury in criminal cases had thus already been provided for. By the sixth and seventh articles of amendment, further special provisions were separately made for that mode of trial in civil and criminal cases. To have followed, as in the state constitutions, and in the ordinance of 1787, the words of Magna Charta, and declared that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land, would have been in part superfluous and inappropriate. To have taken the clause, "law of the land," without its immediate context, might possibly have given rise to doubts, which would be effectually dispelled by using those words which the great commentator on Magna Charta had declared to be the true meaning of the phrase, "law of the land," in that instrument, and which were undoubtedly then received as their true meaning.

That the warrant now in question is legal process, is not denied. It was issued in conformity with an Act of Congress. But is it "due process of law"? The Constitution contains no description of those processes which it was intended to allow or forbid. It does not even declare what principles are to be applied to ascertain whether it be due process. It is manifest that it was not left to the legislative power to enact any process which might be devised. The article is a restraint on the legislative as well as on the executive and judicial powers of the government, and cannot be so construed as to leave Congress free to make any process "due process of law," by its mere will.[2] To what principles, then, are we to resort to ascertain whether this process, enacted by Congress, is due process? To this the answer must be twofold. We must examine the Constitution itself, to see whether this process be in conflict with any of its provisions. If not found to be so, we must look to those settled usages and modes of proceeding existing in the common and statute law of England, before the emigration of our ancestors, and which are shown not to have been unsuited to their civil and political condition by having been acted on by them after the settlement of this country. We apprehend there has been no period, since the establishment of the English monarchy, when there has not been, by the law of the land, a summary method for the recovery of debts due to the Crown, and especially those due from receivers of the revenues. It is difficult, at this day, to trace with precision all the proceedings had for these purposes in the earliest ages of the common law. That they were summary and severe, and had been used for purposes of oppression, is inferable from the fact that one chapter of Magna Charta treats of their restraint. It declares: "We or our bailiffs shall not seize any land or rent for any debt as long as the present goods and chattels of the debtor do suffice to pay the debt, and the debtor himself be ready to satisfy therefor. Neither shall the pledges of the debtor be distrained, as long as the principal debtor is sufficient for the payment of the debt; and if the principal debtor fail in payment of the debt, having nothing wherewith to pay, or will not pay where he is able, the pledges shall answer for the debt. And if they will, they shall have the lands and rents of the debtor until they be satisfied of the debt which they before paid for him, except that the principal debtor can show himself to be acquitted against the said sureties."

[2] That the "law of the land" and "due process of law" clauses of a state constitution imposed some restriction upon the state legislature had been held in Vanzant v. Waddel (1829, Tenn.) 2 Yerg. 260; Taylor v. Porter (1843, N. Y.)

4 Hill 140, 40 Am. Dec. 274. This doctrine became general, Rison v. Farr (1865) 24 Ark. 161, 87 Am. Dec. 52; Parsons v. Russell (1863) 11 Mich. 113, 83 Am. Dec. 728, but not without dissent. In the last cited case where a statute was held to violate the due process clause of the Michigan constitution because it authorized what a majority of the court considered an unjust method for enforcing liens for supplies against boats and vessels, calling it an "outrage on the rights of property," Manning, J., dissenting, said: "This constitutional provision is borrowed from Magna Charta—not the language, but the idea, or principle. The phraseology is a little different, but the one great idea expressed is, that no one shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, except in pursuance of law. The language of the great charter is, by the law of the land; which Lord Coke, in commenting on the charter, paraphrased due process of law. The two phrases, therefore, mean the same thing. And, history shows us, with the clearness of a sunbeam, the meaning of the former, and that it was not intended to protect the subjects of the king against the legislation of Parliament, but against the illegal and arbitrary acts of the king and his government. * * * Until those who contend for a different meaning can show us when the change took place, the occasion of it, and in what it consists, we prefer looking to the circumstances in which the phrase originated for its meaning, rather than to groping in the dark and treacherous regions of conjecture for something new, where each one is at liberty to give a loose rein to his fancy in conjuring up something to suit himself. Those who have tried the experiment, though satisfied with it, acknowledge their inability to give us either the name or the virtues of the new god they worship."

By the common law, the body, lands, and goods of the king's debtor were liable to be levied on to obtain payment. In conformity with the above provision of Magna Charta, a conditional writ was framed, commanding the sheriff to inquire of the goods and chattels of the debtor, and, if they were insufficient, then to extend on the lands. 3 Co. 12 b; Com. Dig., Debt, G. 2; 2 Inst. 19. But it is said that since the statute 33 Hen. VIII. c. 39, the practice has been to issue the writ in an absolute form, without requiring any previous inquisition as to the goods. Gilbert's Exch. 127.

To authorize a writ of extent, however, the debt must be matter of record in the king's exchequer. The 33 Hen. VIII. c. 39, § 50, made all specialty debts due to the king of the same force and effect as debts by statute staple, thus giving to such debts the effect of debts of record. In regard to debts due upon simple contract, other than those due from collectors of the revenue and other accountants of the Crown, the practice, from very ancient times, has been to issue a commission to inquire as to the existence of the debt.

This commission being returned, the debt found was thereby evidenced by a record, and an extent could issue thereon. No notice was required to be given to the alleged debtor of the execution of this commission (2 Tidd's Pr. 1047), though it seems that, in some cases, an order for notice might be obtained. 1 Ves. 269. Formerly, no witnesses were examined by the commission (Chitty's Prerog. 267; West, 22); the affidavit prepared to obtain an order for an immediate extent being the only evidence introduced. But this practice has been recently changed. 11 Price, 29. By the statute 13 Eliz. ch. 4, balances due from receivers of the revenue and all other accountants of the Crown were placed on the same footing as debts acknowledged to be due by statute staple. These balances were found by auditors, the particular officers acting thereon having been, from time to time, varied by legislation and usage. The different methods of accounting in ancient and modern times are described in Mr. Price's Treatise on the Law and Practice of the Exchequer, ch. 9. Such balances, when found, were certified to what was called the pipe office, to be given in charge to the sheriffs for their levy. Price, 231.

If an accountant failed to render his accounts, a process was issued, termed a capias nomine districtionis, against the body, goods, and lands of the accountant. Price, 162, 233, note 3.

This brief sketch of the modes of proceeding to ascertain and enforce payment of balances due from receivers of the revenue in England, is sufficient to show that the methods of ascertaining the existence and amount of such debts, and compelling their payment, have varied widely from the usual course of the common law on other subjects; and that, as respects such debts due from such officers, "the law of the land" authorized the employment of auditors, and an inquisition without notice, and a species of execution bearing a very close resemblance to what is termed a warrant of distress in the Act of 1820, now in question.

It is certain that this diversity in "the law of the land" between public defaulters and ordinary debtors was understood in this country, and entered into the legislation of the colonies and provinces, and more especially of the states, after the Declaration of Independence and before the formation of the Constitution of the United States. Not only was the process of distress in nearly or quite universal use for the collection of taxes, but what was generally termed a warrant of distress, running against the body, goods, and chattels of defaulting receivers of public money, was issued to some public officer, to whom was committed the power to ascertain the amount of the default, and by such warrant proceed to collect it. [Early state and federal legislation of this character is here referred to.]

Tested by the common and statute law of England prior to the emigration of our ancestors, and by the laws of many of the states at the time of the adoption of this amendment, the proceedings authorized by the Act of 1820 cannot be denied to be due process of law, when applied to the ascertainment and recovery of balances due to the government from a collector of customs, unless there exists in the Constitution some other provision which restrains Congress from authorizing such proceedings. For, though "due process of law" generally implies and includes, actor, reus, judex, regular allegations, opportunity to answer, and a trial according to some settled course of judicial proceedings (2 Inst. 47, 50; Hoke v. Henderson, 4 Dev. N. C. Rep. 15; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 146; Van Zandt v. Waddel, 2 Yerger, 260; State Bank v. Cooper, Ibid. 599; Jones's Heirs v. Perry, 10 Ibid. 59; Greene v. Briggs, 1 Curtis, 311), yet, this is not universally true. There may be, and we have seen that there are, cases, under the law of England after Magna Charta, and as it was brought to this country and acted on here, in which process, in its nature final, issues against the body, lands, and goods of certain public debtors without any such trial; and this brings us to the question, whether those provisions of the Constitution which relate to the judicial power are incompatible with these proceedings?

That the auditing of the accounts of a receiver of public moneys may be, in an enlarged sense, a judicial act, must be admitted. So are all those administrative duties the performance of which involves an inquiry into the existence of facts and the application to them of rules of law. In this sense the act of the President in calling out the militia under the Act of 1795, 12 Wheat. 19, or of a commissioner who makes a certificate for the extradition of a criminal, under a treaty, is judicial. But it is not sufficient to bring such matters under the judicial power, that they involve the exercise of judgment upon law and fact. United States v. Ferreira, 13 How. 40. It is necessary to go further, and show not only that the adjustment of the balances due from accounting officers may be, but from their nature must be, controversies to which the United States is a party, within the meaning of the second section of the third article of the Constitution. We do not doubt the power of Congress to provide by law that such a question shall form the subject-matter of a suit in which the judicial power can be exerted. The Act of 1820 makes such a provision for reviewing the decision of the accounting officers of the treasury. But, until reviewed, it is final and binding; and the question is, whether its subject-matter is necessarily, and without regard to the consent of Congress, a judicial controversy. And we are of opinion it is not. * * *

It was strongly urged by the plaintiff's counsel, that though the government might have the rightful power to provide a summary remedy for the recovery of its public dues, aside from any exercise of the judicial power, yet it had not done so in this instance. That it had enabled the debtor to apply to the judicial power, and having thus brought the subject-matter under its cognizance, it was not for the government to say that the subject-matter was not within the judicial power. That if it were not in its nature a judicial controversy, Congress could not make it such, nor give jurisdiction over it to the district courts. In short, the argument is, that if this were not, in its nature, a judicial controversy, Congress could not have conferred on the district court power to determine it upon a bill filed by the collector. If it be such a controversy, then it is subject to the judicial power alone; and the fact that Congress has enabled the district court to pass upon it, is conclusive evidence that it is a judicial controversy.

We cannot admit the correctness of the last position. If we were of opinion that this subject-matter cannot be the subject of a judicial controversy, and that, consequently, it cannot be made a subject of judicial cognizance, the consequence would be, that the attempt to bring it under the jurisdiction of a court of the United States would be ineffectual. But the previous proceedings of the executive department would not necessarily be affected thereby. They might be final, instead of being subject to judicial review.

But the argument leaves out of view an essential element in the case, and also assumes something which cannot be admitted.

It assumes that the entire subject-matter is or is not, in every mode of presentation, a judicial controversy, essentially and in its own nature, aside from the will of Congress to permit it to be so; and it leaves out of view the fact that the United States is a party.

It is necessary to take into view some settled rules.

Though, generally, both public and private wrongs are redressed through judicial action, there are more summary extra-judicial remedies for both. An instance of extra-judicial redress of a private wrong is, the recapture of goods by their lawful owner; of a public wrong, by a private person is the abatement of a public nuisance; and the recovery of public dues by a summary process of distress, issued by some public officer authorized by law, is an instance of redress of a particular kind of public wrong, by the act of the public through its authorized agents. There is, however, an important distinction between these. Though a private person may retake his property, or abate a nuisance, he is directly responsible for his acts to the proper judicial tribunals. His authority to do these acts depends not merely on the law, but upon the existence of such facts as are, in point of law, sufficient to constitute that authority; and he may be required, by an action at law, to prove those facts; but a public agent, who acts pursuant to the command of a legal precept, can justify his act by the production of such precept. He cannot be made responsible in a judicial tribunal for obeying the lawful command of the government; and the government itself, which gave the command, cannot be sued without its own consent.

At the same time there can be no doubt that the mere question, whether a collector of the customs is indebted to the United States, may be one of judicial cognizance. It is competent for the United States to sue any of its debtors in a court of law. It is equally clear that the United States may consent to be sued, and may yield this consent upon such terms and under such restrictions as it may think just. Though both the marshal and the government are exempt from suit, for anything done by the former in obedience to legal process, still, Congress may provide by law, that both, or either, shall, in a particular class of cases, and under such restrictions as they may think proper to impose, come into a court of law or equity and abide by its determination. The United States may thus place the government upon the same ground which is occupied by private persons who proceed to take extra-judicial remedies for their wrongs, and they may do so to such extent, and with such restrictions, as may be thought fit.

When, therefore, the Act of 1820 enacts, that after the levy of the distress warrant has been begun, the collector may bring before a district court the question, whether he is indebted as recited in the warrant, it simply waives a privilege which belongs to the government, and consents to make the legality of its future proceedings dependent on the judgment of the court; as we have already stated in case of a private person, every fact upon which the legality of the extra-judicial remedy depends may be drawn in question by a suit against him. The United States consents that this fact of indebtedness may be drawn in question by a suit against them. Though they might have withheld their consent, we think that, by granting it, nothing which may not be a subject of judicial cognizance is brought before the court.

To avoid misconstruction upon so grave a subject, we think it proper to state that we do not consider Congress can either withdraw from judicial cognizance any matter which, from its nature, is the subject of a suit at the common law, or in equity, or admiralty; nor, on the other hand, can it bring under the judicial power a matter which, from its nature, is not a subject for judicial determination. At the same time there are matters, involving public rights, which may be presented in such form that the judicial power is capable of acting on them, and which are susceptible of judicial determination, but which Congress may or may not bring within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, as it may deem proper. Equitable claims to land by the inhabitants of ceded territories form a striking instance of such a class of cases; and as it depends upon the will of Congress whether a remedy in the courts shall be allowed at all, in such cases, they may regulate it and prescribe such rules of determination as they may think just and needful. Thus it has been repeatedly decided in this class of cases, that upon their trial the acts of executive officers, done under the authority of Congress, were conclusive, either upon particular facts involved in the inquiry or upon the whole title. Foley v. Harrison, 15 How. 433; Burgess v. Gray, 16 How. 48; —— v. The Minnesota Mining Company at the present term.

It is true, also, that even in a suit between private persons to try a question of private right, the action of the executive power, upon a matter committed to its determination by the Constitution and laws, is conclusive. Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1; Doe v. Braden, 16 How. 635.

To apply these principles to the case before us, we say that, though a suit may be brought against the marshal for seizing property under such a warrant of distress, and he may be put to show his justification; yet the action of the executive power in issuing the warrant, pursuant to the Act of 1820, passed under the powers to collect and disburse the revenue granted by the Constitution, is conclusive evidence of the facts recited in it, and of the authority to make the levy; that though no suit can be brought against the United States without the consent of Congress, yet Congress may consent to have a suit brought, to try the question whether the collector be indebted, that being a subject capable of judicial determination, and may empower a court to act on that determination, and restrain the levy of the warrant of distress within the limits of the debt judicially found to exist.

It was further urged that, by thus subjecting the proceeding to the determination of a court, it did conclusively appear that there was no such necessity for a summary remedy, by the action of the executive power, as was essential to enable Congress to authorize this mode of proceeding.

But it seems to us that the just inference from the entire law is, that there was such a necessity for the warrant and the commencement of the levy, but not for its completion, if the collector should interpose, and file his bill and give security. The provision that he may file his bill and give security, and thus arrest the summary proceedings, only proves that Congress thought it not necessary to pursue them, after such security should be given, until a decision should be made by the court. It has no tendency to prove they were not, in the judgment of Congress, of the highest necessity under all other circumstances; and of this necessity Congress alone is the judge. * * *[3]

DAVIDSON v. CITY OF NEW ORLEANS.

1877. Supreme Court of the United States. 96 U. S. 97.

Error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana.

MR. JUSTICE MILLER delivered the opinion of the court [sustaining an assessment levied on certain real estate by the City of New Orleans, as authorized by state legislation, for the drainage of swamp lands]. * * *

The prohibition against depriving the citizen or subject of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law, is not new in the constitutional history of the English race. It is not new in the constitutional history of this country, and it was not new in the Constitution of the United States when it became a part of the Fourteenth Amendment, in the year 1866.

[3] This is the first case in the Supreme Court of the United States in which the due process of law clause of Amendment V was discussed. Previously there seems to be not even a dictum throwing the slightest light upon it. There were, however, many earlier cases in state courts giving various constructions to similar clauses in their respective state constitutions. For discussions of these cases, see Edward S. Corwin, The Doctrine of Due Process of Law Before the Civil War (1911) 24 Harv. L. Rev. 366, 460; Lowell John Howe, The Meaning of "Due Process of Law" Prior to Adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment (1929) 18 Cal. L. Rev. ——.

Compare with the principal case Ownbey v. Morgan (1921) 256 U. S. 94, 65 L. ed. 837, where the court sustained, on grounds of English usage and long and previously unchallenged recognition in some states, a harsh procedure whereby a court refused to permit a nonresident of the state, in a suit commenced against him by attachment of property in the state, to defend without first giving security in an amount equal to the plaintiff's claim, and gave judgment on default of such security, collectible only by sale of the property attached, although in the particular case the defendant claimed that the property attached was substantially all that he had and that in spite of every possible effort he was unable to obtain security. For other instances of this historical interpretation of due process see Coler v. Corn Exchange Bank (1928) 250 N. Y. 136; 164 N. E. 882; Jackman v. Rosenbaum Co. infra, p. 688.

The equivalent of the phrase "due process of law," according to Lord Coke, is found in the words "law of the land," in the Great Charter, in connection with the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury, and other guarantees of the rights of the subject against the oppression of the Crown. In the series of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, proposed and adopted immediately after the organization of the government, which were dictated by the jealousy of the states as further limitations upon the power of the federal government, it is found in the Fifth, in connection with other guarantees of personal rights of the same character. Among these are protection against prosecutions for crimes, unless sanctioned by a grand jury; against being twice tried for the same offence; against the accused being compelled, in a criminal case, to testify against himself; and against taking private property for public use without just compensation.

Most of these provisions, including the one under consideration, either in terms or in substance, have been embodied in the constitutions of the several states, and in one shape or another have been the subject of judicial construction.

It must be confessed, however, that the constitutional meaning or value of the phrase "due process of law," remains to-day without that satisfactory precision of definition which judicial decisions have given to nearly all the other guarantees of personal rights found in the constitutions of the several states and of the United States.

It is easy to see that when the great barons of England wrung from King John, at the point of the sword, the concession that neither their lives nor their property should be disposed of by the Crown, except as provided by the law of the land, they meant by "law of the land" the ancient and customary laws of the English people, or laws enacted by the Parliament of which those barons were a controlling element. It was not in their minds, therefore, to protect themselves against the enactment of laws by the Parliament of England. But when, in the year of grace 1866, there is placed in the Constitution of the United States a declaration that "no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," can a state make anything due process of law which, by its own legislation, it chooses to declare such? To affirm this is to hold that the prohibition to the states is of no avail, or has no application where the invasion of private rights is effected under the forms of state legislation. It seems to us that a statute which declares in terms, and without more, that the full and exclusive title of a described piece of land, which is now in A., shall be and is hereby vested in B., would, if effectual, deprive A. of his property without due process of law, within the meaning of the constitutional provision.

A most exhaustive judicial inquiry into the meaning of the words "due process of law," as found in the Fifth Amendment, resulted in the unanimous decision of this court, that they do not necessarily imply a regular proceeding in a court of justice, or after the manner of such courts. Murray's Lessee et al. v. Hoboken Land and Improvement Co., 18 How. 272. * * *

It is not a little remarkable, that while this provision has been in the Constitution of the United States, as a restraint upon the authority of the federal government, for nearly a century, and while, during all that time, the manner in which the powers of that government have been exercised has been watched with jealousy, and subjected to the most rigid criticism in all its branches, this special limitation upon its powers has rarely been invoked in the judicial forum or the more enlarged theatre of public discussion. But while it has been a part of the Constitution, as a restraint upon the power of the states, only a very few years, the docket of this court is crowded with cases in which we are asked to hold that state courts and state legislatures have deprived their own citizens of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. There is here abundant evidence that there exists some strange misconception of the scope of this provision as found in the Fourteenth Amendment. In fact, it would seem, from the character of many of the cases before us, and the arguments made in them, that the clause under consideration is looked upon as a means of bringing to the test of the decision of this court the abstract opinions of every unsuccessful litigant in a state court of the justice of the decision against him, and of the merits of the legislation on which such a decision may be founded. If, therefore, it were possible to define what it is for a state to deprive a person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, in terms which would cover every exercise of power thus forbidden to the State, and exclude those which are not, no more useful construction could be furnished by this or any other court to any part of the fundamental law.

But, apart from the imminent risk of a failure to give any definition which would be at once perspicuous, comprehensive, and satisfactory, there is wisdom, we think, in the ascertaining of the intent and application of such an important phrase in the Federal Constitution, by the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require, with the reasoning on which such decisions may be founded. This court is, after an experience of nearly a century, still engaged in defining the obligation of contracts, and regulation of commerce, and other powers conferred on the federal government, or limitations imposed upon the states.

As contributing, to some extent, to this mode of determining what class of cases do not fall within its provision, we lay down the following proposition, as applicable to the case before us:—

That whenever by the laws of a state, or by state authority, a tax, assessment, servitude, or other burden is imposed upon property for the public use, whether it be for the whole state or of some more limited portion of the community, and those laws provide for a mode of confirming or contesting the charge thus imposed, in the ordinary courts of justice, with such notice to the person, or such proceeding in regard to the property as is appropriate to the nature of the case, the judgment in such proceedings cannot be said to deprive the owner of his property without due process of law, however obnoxious it may be to other objections. * * *

This proposition covers the present case. Before the assessment could be collected, or become effectual, the statute required that the tableau of assessments should be filed in the proper district court of the state; that personal service of notice, with reasonable time to object, should be served on all owners who were known and within reach of process, and due advertisement made as to those who were unknown, or could not be found. This was complied with; and the party complaining here appeared, and had a full and fair hearing in the court of the first instance, and afterwards in the Supreme Court. If this be not due process of law, then the words can have no definite meaning as used in the Constitution. * * *

And lastly, and most strongly, it is urged that the court rendered a personal judgment against the owner for the amount of the tax, while it also made it a charge upon the land. It is urged with force, —and some highly respectable authorities are cited to support the proposition,—that while for such improvements as this a part, or even the whole, of a man's property connected with the improvement may be taken, no personal liability can be imposed on him in regard to it. If this were a proposition coming before us sitting in a State court, or, perhaps, in a circuit court of the United States, we might be called upon to decide it; but we are unable to see that any of the provisions of the Federal Constitution authorizes us to reverse the judgment of a State court on that question. It is not one which is involved in the phrase "due process of law," and none other is called to our attention in the present case.

As there is no error in the judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, of which this court has cognizance, it is Affirmed.

Mr. Justice Bradley gave a concurring opinion, in which he said: "I think it [the opinion of the court] narrows the scope of inquiry as to what is due process of law more than it should do. * * * I think, therefore, we are entitled, under the Fourteenth Amendment, not only to see that there is some process of law, but 'due process of law,' provided by the state law when a citizen is deprived of his property; and that, in judging what is 'due process of law,' respect must be had to the cause and object of the taking, whether under the taxing power, the power of eminent domain, or the power of assessment for local improvements, or none of these: and if found to be suitable or admissible in the special case, it will be adjudged to be 'due process of law;' but if found to be arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, it may be declared to be not 'due process of law.' Such an examination may be made without interfering with that large discretion which every legislative power has of making wide modifications in the forms of procedure in each case, according as the laws, habits, customs, and preferences of the people of the particular state may require."

HOME TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.

1913. Supreme Court of the United States. 227 U. S. 278.

[The telephone company filed a bill for an injunction against the city of Los Angeles in the District Court of the United States to restrain enforcement by the city of an ordinance which prescribed telephone rates. The company alleged that the rates prescribed were so low that to enforce compliance with them would deprive it of its property in violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The city pleaded to the jurisdiction, asserting that there was a like due process clause in the California state constitution and that if the ordinance was lacking in due process it would be invalid under the state constitution, that in that contingency the ordinance could not be considered "state" action within the prohibition of the Fourteenth Amendment but only the unauthorized act of a state agent, and therefore the plaintiff could not make out a case for relief in a federal court unless upon proceedings had in the state courts the latter should sustain the ordinance as authorized by the state. The District Court sustained the plea and dismissed the bill, and this appeal was taken.]

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court.

1. By the proposition the prohibitions and guarantees of the Amendment are addressed to and control the states only in their complete governmental capacity, and as a result give no authority to exert federal judicial power until by the decision of a court of last resort of a state, acts complained of under the Fourteenth Amendment have been held valid and therefore state acts in the fullest sense. To the contrary the provisions of the Amendment as conclusively fixed by previous decisions are generic in their terms, are addressed, of course, to the states, but also to every person whether natural or juridical who is the repository of state power. By this construction the reach of the Amendment is shown to be coextensive with any exercise by a state of power, in whatever form exerted.

2. As previously stated, the proposition relied upon presupposes that the terms of the Fourteenth Amendment reach only acts done by state officers which are within the scope of the power conferred by the state. The proposition hence applies to the prohibitions of the Amendment the law of principal and agent governing contracts between individuals and consequently assumes that no act done by an officer of a state is within the reach of the Amendment unless such act can be held to be the act of the state by the application of such law of agency. In other words, the proposition is that the Amendment deals only with the acts of state officers within the strict scope of the public powers possessed by them and does not include an abuse of power by an officer as the result of a wrong done in excess of the power delegated. Here again the settled construction of the Amendment is that it presupposes the possibility of an abuse by a state officer or representative of the powers possessed and deals with such a contingency. It provides, therefore, for a case where one who is in possession of state power uses that power to the doing of the wrongs which the Amendment forbids even although the consummation of the wrong may not be within the powers possessed, if the commission of the wrong itself is rendered possible or is efficiently aided by the state authority lodged in the wrongdoer. That is to say, the theory of the Amendment is that where an officer or other representative of a state in the exercise of the authority with which he is clothed misuses the power possessed to do a wrong forbidden by the Amendment, inquiry concerning whether the state has authorized the wrong is irrelevant and the federal judicial power is competent to afford redress for the wrong by dealing with the officer and the result of his exertion of power. * * *

[After quoting from Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339 and Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356.] In Raymond v. Traction Company, 207 U. S. p. 20, the whole subject—almost in the identical aspect which is here involved—came under consideration. The case concerned the repugnancy to the Fourteenth Amendment of a reassessment made by a state board of equalization, and the suit was originally commenced in a federal court. It was pressed that as the claim of the complainant was in effect that the board in the reassessment had violated an express requirement of the state constitution in that the board had "disobeyed the authentic command of the state by failing to make its valuations in such a way that every person shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his property," the act of the subordinate board could not be deemed the act of the state. This contention was held to be unsound and it was decided that even although the act of the board was wrongful from the point of view of the state constitution or law, it was nevertheless an act of a state officer within the intendment of the Fourteenth Amendment. It was pointed out that as the result of the enforcement of the reassessment would be an assertion of state power accomplishing a wrong which the Fourteenth Amendment forbade, the claim of right to prevent such act under the Fourteenth Amendment "constitutes a federal question beyond all controversy." It was then said (pp. 35-36):

"The state board of equalization is one of the instrumentalities provided by the state for the purpose of raising the public revenue by way of taxation. * * * Acting under the constitution and laws of the state, the board therefore represents the state, and its action is the action of the state. The provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment are not confined to the action of the state through its legislature, or through the executive or judicial authority. Those provisions relate to and cover all the instrumentalities by which the state acts, and so it has been held that, whoever by virtue of public position under a state government, deprives another of any right protected by that amendment against deprivation by the state, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name of the state and for the state, and is clothed with the state's powers, his act is that of the state." * * *

WALKER v. SAUVINET.

1875. Supreme Court of the United States. 92 U. S. 90.

[Sauvinet sued Walker, a licensed keeper of a coffee-house in New Orleans, for damages for the latter's refusal to sell him refreshments on the ground that he was a man of color. The court upon failure of the jury to agree gave judgment for $1,000 damages without resubmission to a jury, all in accordance with a Louisiana statute. From affirmance by the Supreme Court of Louisiana this writ of error was taken.]

[4] So the injunction of the Fourteenth Amendment that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws was held to be infringed by a state judge who so directed the selection of jurors as to make impossible the drawing of any negro as a juror although the state statutes did not authorize such discrimination. Ex parte Virginia (1880) 100 U. S. 339, 25 L. ed. 676.

That, on the other hand, the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment are not addressed to private persons so as to make every murder, false imprisonment or theft a federal constitutional question see Civil Rights Cases, ante, 311, 317-318.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court.

So far as we can discover from the record, the only federal question decided by either one of the courts below was that which related to the right of Walker to demand a trial by jury, notwithstanding the provisions of the act of 1871 to the contrary. He insisted that he had a constitutional right to such a trial, and that the statute was void to the extent that it deprived him of this right.

All questions arising under the constitution of the state alone are finally settled by the judgment below. We can consider only such as grow out of the Constitution of the United States. By Art. VII of the Amendments, it is provided, that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." This, as has been many times decided, relates only to trials in the courts of the United States. Edwards v. Elliot, 21 Wall. 557. The states, so far as this amendment is concerned, are left to regulate trials in their own courts in their own way. A trial by jury in suits at common law pending in the state courts is not, therefore, a privilege or immunity of national citizenship, which the states are forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment to abridge. A state cannot deprive a person of his property without due process of law; but this does not necessarily imply that all trials in the state courts affecting the property of persons must be by jury. This requirement of the Constitution is met if the trial is had according to the settled course of judicial proceedings. Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken L. & I. Co., 18 How. 280. Due process of law is process due according to the law of the land. This process in the states is regulated by the law of the state. Our power over that law is only to determine whether it is in conflict with the supreme law of the land,—that is to say, with the Constitution and laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof,—or with any treaty made under the authority of the United States. Art. VI Const. Here the state court has decided that the proceeding below was in accordance with the law of the state; and we do not find that to be contrary to the Constitution, or any law or treaty of the United States.

The other questions presented by the assignment of errors and argued here cannot be considered, as the record does not show that they were brought to the attention of either of the courts below.

Judgment affirmed.[5]

Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Clifford dissented from the opinion and judgment of the court.

[5] In a civil action in a state court a verdict upon concurrence of five-sixths of a jury of twelve, authorized by the constitution of Minnesota, is consistent with the requirement of due process even though the law to be applied by the state court in the suit is the Federal Employers' Liability Act, notwithstanding that

HURTADO v. PEOPLE OF CALIFORNIA.

1884. Supreme Court of the United States. 110 U. S. 516.

[The constitution of California of 1879 provided: "Offenses heretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or by indictment with or without such examination and commitment, as may be prescribed by law." A statute of 1880 provided that when a committing magistrate upon giving an arrested person a preliminary examination should find sufficient cause to believe the person guilty of a public offense he should commit him to custody or bail, as the case might be, not for examination before a grand jury as theretofore but to stand trial, and the statute declared, "it shall be the duty of the district attorney, within thirty days thereafter, to file in the superior court of the county in which the offense is triable an information charging the defendant with such offense."[6] By this method of accusation Hurtado was prosecuted and convicted on a charge of murder and given a death sentence. The Supreme Court of California affirmed the judgment and this writ of error was taken.]

Mr. Justice Matthews delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

It is claimed on behalf of the prisoner that the conviction and sentence are void, on the ground that they are repugnant to that clause of the Fourteenth Article of Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which is in these words:

"Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

The proposition of law we are asked to affirm is that an indictment or presentment by a grand jury, as known to the common law of England, is essential to that "due process of law," when applied

Amendment VII requires a unanimous verdict in suits under the act when brought in federal courts. Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co. v. Bombolis (1916) 241 U. S. 211, 60 L. ed. 961, L. R. A. 1917A, 86, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 505.

It has been held that a state may enlarge the functions of the jury in civil cases, as by leaving to the jury the determination of the law of contributory negligence (making them judges of the law as well as of the facts). Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Cole (1919) 251 U. S. 54, 64 L. ed. 133.

[6] Harlan, J., in his dissenting opinion gave an interpretation to this legislation: "Under the local statutes in question, even the district attorney of the county is deprived of any discretion in the premises; for, if in the judgment of the magistrate before whom the accused is brought—and, generally, he is only a justice of the peace—a public offence has been committed, it becomes the duty of the district attorney to proceed against him by information for the offence indicated by the committing magistrate. Thus, in California, nothing stands between the citizen and prosecution for his life, except the judgment of a justice of the peace."

This interpretation was approved by the Supreme Court of California in Ex parte Sternes (1889) 82 Cal. 245, 248.

to prosecutions for felonies, which is secured and guaranteed by this provision of the Constitution of the United States, and which accordingly it is forbidden to the states respectively to dispense with in the administration of criminal law. * * *

It is maintained on behalf of the plaintiff in error that the phrase "due process of law" is equivalent to "law of the land," as found in the 29th chapter of Magna Charta; that by immemorial usage it has acquired a fixed, definite, and technical meaning; that it refers to and includes, not only the general principles of public liberty and private right, which lie at the foundation of all free government, but the very institutions which, venerable by time and custom, have been tried by experience and found fit and necessary for the preservation of those principles, and which, having been the birthright and inheritance of every English subject, crossed the Atlantic with the colonists and were transplanted and established in the fundamental laws of the state; that, having been originally introduced into the Constitution of the United States as a limitation upon the powers of the government, brought into being by that instrument, it has now been added as an additional security to the individual against oppression by the states themselves; that one of these institutions is that of the grand jury, an indictment or presentment by which against the accused in cases of alleged felonies is an essential part of due process of law, in order that he may not be harassed or destroyed by prosecutions founded only upon private malice or popular fury.

This view is certainly supported by the authority of the great name of Chief Justice Shaw and of the court in which he presided, which, in Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray, 329, decided that the 12th article of the Bill of Rights of Massachusetts, a transcript of Magna Charta in this respect, made an indictment or presentment of a grand jury essential to the validity of a conviction in cases of prosecutions for felonies. In delivering the opinion of the court in that case, Merrick, J.; alone dissenting, the Chief Justice said:

"The right of individual citizens to be secure from an open and public accusation of crime, and from the trouble, expense, and anxiety of a public trial before a probable cause is established by the presentment and indictment of a grand jury, in case of high offences, is justly regarded as one of the securities to the innocent against hasty, malicious, and oppressive public prosecutions, and as one of the ancient immunities and privileges of English liberty."

[After commenting at length upon Coke's discussion of "the law of the land" clause of Magna Charta, referred to by Shaw, C. J., the opinion continues:]

Mr. Reeve, in 2 History of Eng. Law, 43 translates the phrase, nisi per legale judicium parium suorum vel per legem terræ, "but by the judgment of his peers, or by some other legal process or proceeding adapted by the law to the nature of the case."

Chancellor Kent, 2 Com. 13, adopts this mode of construing the phrase. Quoting the language of Magna Charta, and referring to Lord Coke's comment upon it, he says: "The better and larger definition of due process of law is that it means law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice."

This accords with what is said in Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 N. Y. 202, by Denio, J., p. 212: "The provision was designed to protect the citizen against all mere acts of power, whether flowing from the legislative or executive branches of the government."

The principal and true meaning of the phrase has never been more tersely or accurately stated than by Mr. Justice Johnson, in Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 4 Wheat. 235-244: "As to the words from Magna Charta, incorporated into the Constitution of Maryland, after volumes spoken and written with a view to their exposition, the good sense of mankind has at last settled down to this: that they were intended to secure the individual from the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private right and distributive justice."

And the conclusion rightly deduced is, as stated by Mr. Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, 356: "The principles, then, upon which the process is based, are to determine whether it is 'due process' or not, and not any considerations of mere form. Administrative and remedial process may be changed from time to time, but only with due regard to the landmarks established for the protection of the citizen."

It is urged upon us, however, in argument, that the claim made in behalf of the plaintiff in error is supported by the decision of this court in Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Company, 18 How. 272. * * * [Here follows the paragraph on p. 540, ante.]

This, it is argued, furnishes an indispensable test of what constitutes "due process of law;" that any proceeding otherwise authorized by law, which is not thus sanctioned by usage, or which supersedes and displaces one that is, cannot be regarded as due process of law.

But this inference is unwarranted. The real syllabus of the passage quoted is, that a process of law, which is not otherwise forbidden, must be taken to be due process of law, if it can show the sanction of settled usage both in England and in this country; but it by no means follows that nothing else can be due process of law. The point in the case cited arose in reference to a summary proceeding, questioned on that account, as not due process of law. The answer was: however exceptional it may be, as tested by definitions and principles of ordinary procedure, nevertheless, this, in substance, has been immemorially the actual law of the land, and, therefore, is due process of law. But to hold that such a characteristic is essential to due process of law, would be to deny every quality of the law but its age, and to render it incapable of progress or improvement. It would be to stamp upon our jurisprudence the unchangeableness attributed to the laws of the Medes and Persians.

This would be all the more singular and surprising, in this quick and active age, when we consider that, owing to the progressive development of legal ideas and institutions in England, the words of Magna Charta stood for very different things at the time of the separation of the American colonies from what they represented originally. For at first the words nisi per legale judicium parium had no reference to a jury; they applied only to the pares regni, who were the constitutional judges in the court of exchequer and coram rege. Bac. Abr. "Juries," 7th ed. Lond., note; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, 41. And as to the grand jury itself, we learn of its constitution and functions from the Assize of Clarendon, A. D. 1164, and that of Northampton, A. D. 1176, Stubbs, Charters, 143-150 * * *. "The system thus established," says Mr. Justice Stephens, 1 Hist. Crim. Law of England 252, "is simple. The body of the country are the accusers. Their accusation is practically equivalent to a conviction, subject to the chance of a favorable termination of the ordeal by water. If the ordeal fails, the accused person loses his foot and his hand. If it succeeds, he is, nevertheless, to be banished. Accusation, therefore, was equivalent to banishment, at least." When we add to this that the primitive grand jury heard no witnesses in support of the truth of the charges to be preferred, but presented upon their own knowledge, or indicted upon common fame and general suspicion, we shall be ready to acknowledge that it is better not to go too far back into antiquity for the best securities for our "ancient liberties." It is more consonant to the true philosophy of our historical legal institutions to say that the spirit of personal liberty and individual right, which they embodied, was preserved and developed by a progressive growth and wise adaptation to new circumstances and situations of the forms and processes found fit to give, from time to time, new expression and greater effect to modern ideas of self-government. * * *

The Constitution of the United States was ordained, it is true, by descendants of Englishmen, who inherited the traditions of English law and history; but it was made for an undefined and expanding future, and for a people gathered and to be gathered from many nations and of many tongues. And while we take just pride in the principles and institutions of the common law, we are not to forget that in lands where other systems of jurisprudence prevail, the ideas and processes of civil justice are also not unknown. Due process of law, in spite of the absolutism of continental governments, is not alien to that code which survived the Roman Empire as the foundation of modern civilization in Europe, and which has given us that fundamental maxim of distributive justice,—suum cuique tribuere. There is nothing in Magna Charta, rightly construed as a broad charter of public right and law, which ought to exclude the best ideas of all systems and of every age; and as it was the characteristic principle of the common law to draw its inspiration from every fountain of justice, we are not to assume that the sources of its supply have been exhausted. On the contrary, we should expect that the new and various experiences of our own situation and system will mould and shape it into new and not less useful forms.

The concessions of Magna Charta were wrung from the king as guarantees against the oppressions and usurpations of his prerogative. It did not enter into the minds of the barons to provide security against their own body or in favor of the Commons by limiting the power of Parliament; so that bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, laws declaring forfeitures of estates, and other arbitrary acts of legislation which occur so frequently in English history, were never regarded as inconsistent with the law of the land; for notwithstanding what was attributed to Lord Coke in Bonham's Case, 8 Rep. 115, 118 a, the omnipotence of Parliament over the common law was absolute, even against common right and reason. The actual and practical security for English liberty against legislative tyranny was the power of a free public opinion represented by the Commons.

In this country written constitutions were deemed essential to protect the rights and liberties of the people against the encroachments of power delegated to their governments, and the provisions of Magna Charta were incorporated into bills of rights. They were limitations upon all the powers of government, legislative as well as executive and judicial.

It necessarily happened, therefore, that as these broad and general maxims of liberty and justice held in our system a different place and performed a different function from their position and office in English constitutional history and law, they would receive and justify a corresponding and more comprehensive interpretation. Applied in England only as guards against executive usurpation and tyranny, here they have become bulwarks also against arbitrary legislation; but, in that application, as it would be incongruous to measure and restrict them by the ancient customary English law, they must be held to guarantee, not particular forms of procedure, but the very substance of individual rights to life, liberty, and property.

Restraints that could be fastened upon executive authority with precision and detail, might prove obstructive and injurious when imposed on the just and necessary discretion of legislative power; and, while in every instance, laws that violated express and specific injunctions and prohibitions might, without embarrassment, be judicially declared to be void, yet, any general principle or maxim, founded on the essential nature of law, as a just and reasonable expression of the public will and of government, as instituted by popular consent and for the general good, can only be applied to cases coming clearly within the scope of its spirit and purpose, and not to legislative provisions merely establishing forms and modes of attainment. Such regulations, to adopt a sentence of Burke's, "may alter the mode and application, but have no power over the substance of original justice." Tract on the Popery Laws, 6 Burke's Works, ed. Little & Brown, 323.

Such is the often-repeated doctrine of this court. * * * [Here follow citations from Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90; Kennard v. Louisiana, 92 U. S. 480; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97.]

We are to construe this phrase in the Fourteenth Amendment by the usus loquendi of the Constitution itself. The same words are contained in the Fifth Amendment. That article makes specific and express provision for perpetuating the institution of the grand jury, so far as relates to prosecutions for the more aggravated crimes under the laws of the United States. It declares that:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall he be compelled in any criminal case to be witness against himself." [It then immediately adds:] "Nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

According to a recognized canon of interpretation, especially applicable to formal and solemn instruments of constitutional law, we are forbidden to assume, without clear reason to the contrary, that any part of this most important Amendment is superfluous. The natural and obvious inference is, that in the sense of the Constitution, "due process of law" was not meant or intended to include, ex vi termini, the institution and procedure of a grand jury in any case. The conclusion is equally irresistible, that when the same phrase was employed in the Fourteenth Amendment to restrain the action of the states, it was used in the same sense and with no greater extent; and that if in the adoption of that Amendment it had been part of its purpose to perpetuate the institution of the grand jury in all the states, it would have embodied, as did the Fifth Amendment, express declarations to that effect. Due process of law in the latter refers to that law of the land which derives its authority from the legislative powers conferred upon Congress by the Constitution of the United States, exercised within the limits therein prescribed, and interpreted according to the principles of the common law. In the Fourteenth Amendment, by parity of reason, it refers to that law of the land in each state which derives its authority from the inherent and reserved powers of the state, exerted within the limits of those fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions, and the greatest security for which resides in the right of the people to make their own laws, and alter them at their pleasure. * * *

But it is not to be supposed that these legislative powers are absolute and despotic, and that the Amendment prescribing due process of law is too vague and indefinite to operate as a practical restraint. It is not every act, legislative in form, that is law. Law is something more than mere will exerted as an act of power. It must be not a special rule for a particular person or a particular case, but, in the language of Mr. Webster, in his familiar definition, "the general law, a law which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial," so "that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society;" and thus excluding, as not due process of law, acts of attainder, bills of pains and penalties, acts of confiscation, acts reversing judgments, and acts directly transferring one man's estate to another, legislative judgments and decrees, and other similar special, partial, and arbitrary exertions of power under the forms of legislation. Arbitrary power, enforcing its edicts to the injury of the persons and property of its subjects, is not law, whether manifested as the decree of a personal monarch or of an impersonal multitude. And the limitations imposed by our constitutional law upon the action of the governments, both state and national, are essential to the preservation of public and private rights, notwithstanding the representative character of our political institutions. The enforcement of these limitations by judicial process is the device of self-governing communities to protect the rights of individuals and minorities, as well against the power of numbers as against the violence of public agents transcending the limits of lawful authority, even when acting in the name and wielding the force of the government. * * *

It follows that any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, whether sanctioned by age and custom, or newly devised in the discretion of the legislative power, in furtherance of the general public good, which regards and preserves these principles of liberty and justice, must be held to be due process of law. * * *

Tried by these principles, we are unable to say that the substitution for a presentment or indictment by a grand jury of the proceeding by information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, certifying to the probable guilt of the defendant, with the right on his part to the aid of counsel, and to the cross-examination of the witnesses produced for the prosecution, is not due process of law. It is, as we have seen, an ancient proceeding at common law, which might include every case of an offence of less grade than a felony, except misprision of treason; and in every circumstance of its administration, as authorized by the statute of California, it carefully considers and guards the substantial interest of the prisoner. It is merely a preliminary proceeding, and can result in no final judgment, except as the consequence of a regular judicial trial, conducted precisely as in cases of indictments. * * *

For these reasons, finding no error therein, the judgment of the Supreme Court of California is Affirmed.[7]

[Mr. Justice Harlan dissenting, quoted many English and American eulogiums of the grand jury including, "Blackstone says: 'But to find a bill there must be at least twelve of the jury agree; for, so tender is the law of England of the lives of the subjects, that no man can be convicted at the suit of the King of any capital offence, unless by an unanimous voice of twenty-four of his equals and neighbors, that is, by twelve at least of the grand jury, in the first place, assenting to the accusation, and afterwards by the whole petit jury, of twelve or more, finding him guilty upon his trial.' 4 Bl. Com. 306. The same author, after referring to prosecutions by

[7] Criminal trial jury. The provision of the national constitution that in the federal courts "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury" has been interpreted to require the common law number of twelve jurors, and conviction only by unanimous verdict. Thompson v. Utah (1898) 170 U. S. 343, 42 L. ed. 1061. The same construction is given to the usual specific provisions for jury trial in state constitutions in absence of express modifications.

"Petty" federal offenses may be tried in the federal courts without a jury if the accused waives jury trial, and this is so without statutory provision for waiver. So holding, in Schick v. United States (1904) 195 U. S. 65, 49 L. ed. 99, 1 Ann. Cas. 585, the court said that there is no constitutional requirement of jury trial for "petty" offenses. Semble, Congress may provide for punishment of petty offenses without giving the accused an option of trial by jury. Ibid. p. 71. See also Callan v. Wilson (1888) 127 U. S. 540, 32 L. ed. 223. On the probable validity of federal legislation that would provide for trial of petty offenses in federal courts without a jury and as to what are "petty" offenses, see Felix Frankfurter and Thomas G. Corcoran (1926) Petty Federal Offenses and the Constitutional Guaranty of Trial by Jury, 39 Harv. L. Rev. 917.

Whether Congress may authorize a federal court to try, at the request or with the consent of the accused, serious offenses without jury has not been decided. In the absence of such statute a person accused of a serious offense does not have the privilege in the federal courts of trial without jury. Low v. United States (1909) 169 Fed. 86; Coates v. United States (1923) 290 Fed. 134; Blair v. United States (1917) 241 Fed. 217, 230.

Under the specific provisions of state constitutions for trial by jury the holdings of the state courts are at variance as to whether without or with a statute information, describing their different kinds, and stating that the mode of prosecution by information (or suggestion) filed on record by the King's attorney-general, or by his coroner or master of the crown office in the Court of King's Bench, was as ancient as the common law itself, proceeds: 'But these informations (of every kind) are confined by the constitutional law to mere misdemeanors only; for, wherever any capital offence is charged, the same law requires that the accusation be warranted by the oath of twelve men, before the party shall be put to answer it.' 4 Bl. Com. 309-10."] purporting to so authorize, a state court may try a person accused of a serious offense without jury at his option. See S. Chesterfield Oppenheim (1927) 24 Mich. L. Rev. 695. A few state constitutions expressly permit waiver. Ibid. 699. So California by amendment (1928) to Sec. 7 of Art. I (waiver "in all criminal cases, by consent of both parties, expressed in open court by the defendant and his counsel").

Does the due process of law requirement prevent a state from abolishing jury trial in trial of serious offenses? That it does not has been held in Williams v. Hert (1901) 110 Fed. 166. See also Ex parte Brown (1905) 140 Fed. 461. There are dicta to the same effect in Frank v. Mangum (1915) 237 U. S. 309, 340, 59 L. ed. 969 (holding that a state's procedure is not invalid under which the jury's verdict may be delivered in absence of the accused from the trial room) and in Jordan v. Massachusetts (1912) 225 U. S. 167, 56 L. ed. 1038, (holding that a state observes due process although upon motion for new trial on the ground of alleged insanity of one of the jurors the court denies the motion upon its finding the juror sane by a fair preponderance of the evidence as distinguished from proof beyond reasonable doubt). Also in Maxwell v. Dow (1900) 176 U. S. 581, 603, 44 L. ed. 597, in holding that a jury of eight in all criminal cases not capital is due process the court said, "trial by jury has never been affirmed to be a necessary requisite of due process of law." The decisions that Congress may provide for the enforcement of criminal law without jury trial in "unincorporated territory" and in exercise of exterritorial jurisdiction in foreign countries, may or may not be considered pertinent, the gist of the doctrine of "unincorporated territory" being that Congress is not subject to all the constitutional limitations in governing people there that restrain it in governing people in the states and incorporated territory. The due process requirement of Amendment V may be considered as not having normal operation there. See Dorr v. United States (1904) 195 U. S. 138, 49 L. ed. 128, 1 Ann. Cas. 697; Balzac v. Porto Rico (1922) 258 U. S. 298, 66 L. ed. 627; In re Ross (1890) 140 U. S. 453, 35 L. ed. 581; Hawaii v. Mankichi (1903) 190 U. S. 197, 47 L. ed. 1016. Congress while intentionally not establishing jury trial in the Philippines and Porto Rico has included in the Organic Acts for those islands a due process limitation on legislation by the governments there. 39 Stat. 545, 546; 39 Stat. 951.

Trial by jury is not an essential of due process in punishment for petty offenses, that is, not for petty punishment. Natal v. Louisiana (1891) 139 U. S. 621, 35 L. ed. 288.

A state statute is valid which provides that upon a plea of guilty to a charge of murder the court may without jury determine the degree of guilt. Hallinger v. Davis (1892) 146 U. S. 314, 36 L. ed. 986.

"We have also held that the states * * * may dispense with grand juries, Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516; and perhaps also allow verdicts to be rendered by less than a unanimous vote. American Publishing Co. v. Fisher, 166 U. S. 464; Thompson v. Utah, 170 U. S. 343." Hawaii v. Mankichi (1903) 190 U. S. 197, 211, 47 L. ed. 1016. The cited cases do not so hold. Considering merely mathematical probabilities there is a vast difference between a jury of eight where a unanimous vote is required to convict and conviction by a vote of eight out of twelve jurors. See William Forsyth (1852) Trial by Jury, p. 254, note 1.

EILENBECKER v. PLYMOUTH COUNTY.

1890. Supreme Court of the United States. 134 U. S. 31.

[The statute involved in the case was "Whoever shall erect or establish or continue or use any building, erection or place for [the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquor] shall be deemed guilty of a nuisance, and may be prosecuted and punished accordingly, and upon conviction shall pay a fine of not exceeding $1000 and costs of prosecution, and stand committed until the fine and costs are paid. * * * Any citizen of the county where such nuisance exists, or is kept or maintained, may maintain an action in equity, to abate and perpetually enjoin the same, and any person violating the terms of any injunction granted in such proceeding shall be punished as for contempt, by fine of not less than five hundred nor more than one thousand dollars or by imprisonment in the county jail not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court."

Appeals from the trial court in the six cases stated in the opinion below being taken to the Supreme Court of Iowa were there treated as one, the judgment of the trial court affirmed and this writ of error taken.]

MR. JUSTICE MILLER delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

The judgment which we are called upon to review is one affirming the judgment of the District Court of Plymouth County in that state. This judgment imposed a fine of five hundred dollars and

The constitution of Louisiana, art. 116, provides: "Cases in which the punishment may be at hard labor shall be tried by a jury of five, all of whom must concur to render a verdict; cases in which the punishment is necessarily at hard labor, by a jury of twelve, nine of whom concurring may render a verdict; cases in which the punishment may be capital, by a jury of twelve, all of whom must concur to render a verdict." See State v. Woodard (1919) 144 La. 845, 81 So. 337 (sustaining verdict of jury of five where offense was punishable by not more than twenty years' imprisonment with or without hard labor); State v. Wooten (1915) 136 La. 560, 67 So. 366, (sustaining verdict by concurrence of nine out of twelve for offense of manslaughter); followed in State v. Vial (1923) 153 La. 883, 96 So. 796; State v. Trull (1920) 147 La. 444, 85 So. 70 (bigamy). In none of these cases was the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment considered. Compare Muldrow v. State (1910) 4 Okla. Cr. 324, 111 Pac. 656 (state constitution art. 2, § 19, for misdemeanors jury of six and concurrence of three-fourths sufficient); State v. Scheminisky (1918) 31 Idaho 504, 174 Pac. 611 (for misdemeanors concurrence of five-sixths sufficient, Const. of Idaho, art. 1, § 7).

Lesser departures, in trial of serious offenses, from the common law incidents of jury trial have been sustained. Howard v. Kentucky (1906) 200 U. S. 164, 50 L. ed. 421 (permitting temporary absences of accused from the trial provided no injury results to his substantial rights); Felts v. Murphy (1906) 201 U. S. 123, 50 L. ed. 689 (conviction of an almost deaf person without so arranging the proceedings that he could hear everything through his ear trumpet); Brown v. New Jersey (1899) 175 U. S. 172, 44 L. ed. 119 (struck jury may be used for offenses for which it was not used at common law); Garland v. Washington (1914) 232 U. S. 642, 58 L. ed. 772 (deviation from formal arraignment).

costs on each of the six plaintiffs in error in this case, and imprisonment in the jail of Plymouth County for a period of three months, but they were to be released from confinement if the fine imposed was paid within thirty days from the date of the judgment.

This sentence was pronounced by the court as a punishment for contempt in refusing to obey a writ of injunction issued by that court, enjoining and restraining each of the defendants from selling, or keeping for sale, any intoxicating liquors, including ale, wine and beer, in Plymouth County, and the sentence was imposed upon a hearing by the court, without a jury, and upon evidence in the form of affidavits.

It appears that on the 11th day of June, 1885, separate petitions in equity were filed in the District Court of Plymouth County against each of these plaintiffs in error, praying that they should be enjoined from selling, or keeping for sale, intoxicating liquors, including ale, wine and beer, in that county. On the 6th of July the court ordered the issue of preliminary injunctions as prayed. On the 7th of July the writs were served on each of the defendants in each proceeding by the sheriff of Plymouth County. On the 24th of October, complaints were filed, alleging that these plaintiffs in error had violated this injunction by selling intoxicating liquors contrary to the law and the terms of the injunction served on them, and asking that they be required to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt of court. A rule was granted accordingly, and the court, having no personal knowledge of the facts charged, ordered that a hearing be had at the next term of the court, upon affidavits; and on the 8th day of March, 1886, it being at the regular term of said District Court, separate trials were had upon evidence in the form of affidavits, by the court without a jury, upon which the plaintiffs were found guilty of a violation of the writs of injunction issued in said cause, and a sentence of fine and imprisonment, as already stated, entered against them.

The first observation to be made on this subject is, that the plaintiffs in error are seeking to reverse a judgment of the District Court of Plymouth County, Iowa, imposing upon them a fine and imprisonment for violating the injunction of that court, which had been regularly issued and served upon them. Of the intentional violation of this injunction by plaintiffs we are not permitted to entertain any doubt, and, if we did, the record in the case makes it plain. Neither is it doubted that they had a regular and fair trial, after due notice, and opportunity to defend themselves in open court at a regular term thereof.

The contention of these parties is, that they were entitled to a trial by jury on the question as to whether they were guilty or not guilty of the contempt charged upon them, and because they did not have this trial by jury they say that they were deprived of their liberty without due process of law within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

If it has ever been understood that proceedings according to the common law for contempt of court have been subject to the right of trial by jury, we have been unable to find any instance of it. It has always been one of the attributes—one of the powers necessarily incident to a court of justice—that it should have this power of vindicating its dignity, of enforcing its orders, of protecting itself from insult, without the necessity of calling upon a jury to assist it in the exercise of this power.

In the case in this court of Ex parte Terry, 128 U. S. 289, this doctrine is fully asserted and enforced * * *. In Ex parte Robinson, 19 Wall. 505, 510, this court speaks in the following language:

"The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts. Its existence is essential to the preservation of order in judicial proceedings, and the enforcement of the judgments, orders and writs of the courts, and consequently to the due administration of justice. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject, they became possessed of this power. But the power has been limited and defined by the act of Congress of March 2d, 1831. 4 Stat. 487."

The statute, now embodied in § 725 of the Revised Statutes, reads as follows: "The power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishments for contempts of court shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of the said courts or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of the said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of the said courts, party, juror, witness, or any other person or persons to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts."

It will thus be seen that even in the act of Congress, intended to limit the power of the courts to punish for contempts of its authority by summary proceedings,[8] there is expressly left the power to [8] For supplementary study of contempt of court see on the distinction between civil and criminal contempts Gompers v. Bucks Stove &c. Co. (1911) 221 U. S. 418, 55 L. ed. 797, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 874; Merchants' Stock & Grain Co. v. Board of Trade (1911) 187 Fed. 398; on the power of the president to pardon persons convicted of criminal contempts by the federal courts, Ex parte Grossman (1925) 267 U. S. 87, 69 L. ed. 527, 38 A. L. R. 131. Is not "criminal contempt" a broader classification than acts which are both contempts and crimes?

The Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, amending the federal antitrust laws provides in §§ 21, 22 (38 Stat. 738-739) that "in all cases within the purview of this Act," "any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree or command" of a federal district court by doing an act forbidden punish in this summary manner the disobedience of any party, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree or command of said court. * * *

So far from any statute on this subject limiting the power of the courts of Iowa, the act of the legislature of that state, authorizing the injunction which these parties are charged with violating, expressly declares that for violating such injunction a person doing so shall be punished for the contempt by a fine of not less than five hundred or more than a thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. So that the proceeding by which the fine and imprisonment imposed upon these parties for contempt in violating the injunction of the court, regularly issued in a suit to which they were parties, is due process of law, and always has been due process of law, and is the process or proceeding by which courts have from time immemorial enforced the execution of their orders and decrees, and cannot be said to deprive the parties of their liberty or property without due process of law.

The counsel for plaintiffs in error seek to evade the force of this reasoning by the proposition that the entire statute under which this injunction was issued is in the nature of a criminal proceeding, and that the contempt of court of which these parties have been found guilty is a crime for the punishment of which they have a right to trial by jury.

We cannot accede to this view of the subject. Whether an attachment for a contempt of court, and the judgment of the court punishing the party for such contempt, is in itself essentially a criminal proceeding or not, we do not find it necessary to decide. We simply hold that, whatever its nature may be, it is an offence against the court and against the administration of justice, for which courts have always had the right to punish the party by summary proceeding and without trial by jury; and that in that sense it is due process of law within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution. We do not suppose that that pro-thereby, "if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States, or under the laws of any state in which the act was committed" shall be tried by the court or upon his demand by a jury. It has been held, despite the separation of powers principle, that this limitation of the so-called inherent powers of the courts is not unconstitutional. Michaelson v. United States (1924) 266 U. S. 42, 69 L. ed. 162, 35 A. L. R. 451. The court said: "The only substantial difference between such a proceeding as we have here, and a criminal prosecution by indictment or information is that in the latter the act complained of is the violation of a law and in the former the violation of a decree. In the case of the latter, the accused has a constitutional right of trial by jury; while in the former he has not. The statutory extension of this constitutional right to a class of contempts which are properly described as "criminal offences" does not, in our opinion, invade the powers of the courts as intended by the Constitution or violate that instrument in any other way."

vision of the Constitution was ever intended to interfere with or abolish the powers of the courts in proceedings for contempt, whether this contempt occurred in the course of a criminal proceeding or of a civil suit.

We might rest the case here; but the plaintiffs in error fall back upon the proposition that the statute of the Iowa legislature concerning the sale of liquors, under which this injunction was issued, is itself void, as depriving the parties of their property and of their liberty without due process of law. We are not prepared to say that this question arises in the present case. The principal suit in which the injunction was issued, for the contempt of which these parties have been sentenced to imprisonment and to pay a fine, has never been tried so far as this record shows. We do not know whether the parties demanded a trial by jury on the question of their guilty violation of that statute. We do not know that they would have been refused a trial by jury if they had demanded it. Until the trial of that case has been had they are not injured by a refusal to grant them a jury trial. It is the well-settled doctrine of this court that a part of a statute may be void and the remainder may be valid. That part of this statute which declares that no person shall own or keep, or be in any way concerned, engaged or employed in owning or keeping any intoxicating liquors with intent to sell the same within this state, and all the prohibitory clauses of the statute, have been held by this court to be within the constitutional powers of the state legislature, in the cases of Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, and Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678.

If the objection to the statute is that it authorizes a proceeding in the nature of a suit in equity to suppress the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors which are by law prohibited, and to abate the nuisance which the statute declares such acts to be, wherever carried on, we respond that, so far as at present advised, it appears to us that all the powers of a court, whether at common law or in chancery, may be called into operation by a legislative body for the purpose of suppressing this objectionable traffic; and we know of no hindrance in the Constitution of the United States to the form of proceedings, or to the court in which this remedy shall be had. Certainly it seems to us to be quite as wise to use the processes of the law and the powers of the court to prevent the evil, as to punish the offence as a crime after it had been committed.

We think it was within the power of the court of Plymouth County to issue the writs of injunction in these cases, and that the disobedience to them by the plaintiffs in error subjected them to the proceedings for contempt which were had before that court.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Iowa is affirmed.[9]

in 38 states and state decisions all sustaining them, except Hedden v. Hand (1919) 90 N. J. Eq. 583, 107 Atl. 285, 5 A. L. R. 1474, annotations). See also (1921) 34 Harv. L. Rev. 398-400. These statutes have dealt with maintainance of places for the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquor, gambling, Ex parte Allison (1905) 48 Tex. Cr. 634, 90 S. W. 492, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 622, 13 Ann. Cas. 684; houses of prostitution, Carleton v. Rugg (1888) 149 Mass. 550, 22 N. E. 55, 5 L. R. A. 193, 14 Am. St. 446; State v. Fanning (1914) 96 Nebr. 123, 147 N. W. 215; and horse racing, State v. Roby (1895) 142 Ind. 168, 41 N. E. 145, 33 L. R. A. 213, 51 Am. St. 174. Dissenting in Carleton v. Rugg, supra, Field, J., said: "The injunction issued in this case, and probably the only one that could have been issued, is one enjoining the respondents from using, or permitting to be used, the building, place, or tenement for the illegal keeping or sale of intoxicating liquors. The Public Statutes prohibit such a use as a crime, and the only effect of the injunction is to subject the respondents to the process used for punishing persons guilty of violating injunctions, in addition to or in substitution for criminal process. The Legislature apparently thought that a remedy in equity would be more speedy, or more certain, or more efficient, than that by complaint or indictment. The issuing of the injunction of itself adds nothing to the prohibition of the statutes, but the intention plainly is to call into use the peculiar process employed by courts of equity in punishing persons guilty of wilful violations of injunctions. The efficacy of the statute, apart from the fact that the prosecution may be beyond the control of the district attorney, depends wholly upon the proceedings that may be taken for punishing violations of injunctions."

Statutes authorizing commitment of juvenile delinquents to industrial schools and similar institutions by summary proceedings before a judge or commissioners are sustained on the ground that "the intent is to protect rather than punish the child." Cases are collected in Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1227. Likewise jury trial is not essential to due process in determination of insanity and commitment of the insane to hospitals and asylums, the proceedings being not criminal. Cases are collected in L. R. A. 1918A, 348. See Nobles v. Georgia (1897) 168 U. S. 398, 42 L. ed. 515 (jury not essential on issue of insanity after conviction and sentence for crime).

Sections 22, 23 and 24 of the National Prohibition Act, 41 Stat. 314, 315, U. S. C. A. Title 27, §§ 34, 35, 38, are similar to the Iowa legislation above, except that the action to obtain an injunction may be brought only by an official prosecutor. Neither in the proceeding to obtain an injunction nor in the contempt proceeding is provision made for jury trial. The act declares any building, boat, vehicle etc. in which liquor is manufactured, kept or sold a nuisance and also that any person who shall, with intent to effect a sale, carry around on his person any prohibited liquor or who shall travel to solicit orders for sale of such liquor is declared "guilty of a nuisance" and may be enjoined permanently and punished summarily for violation of the injunction. By other sections of the statute these acts are made criminal offenses to be prosecuted by the usual criminal procedure. The provision for trial of contempts by jury made in the Clayton Act, supra, note 8, do not apply to proceedings to punish violations of injunctions authorized by the National Prohibition Act, and trial of such contempts without jury is due process of law. Maynard v. United States (1927) 23 Fed. (2d) 141; Lewinsohn v. United States (1921) 278 Fed. 421. The original proceeding to obtain an injunction is the ordinary equity proceeding without jury and is valid. United States v. Duignan (1925) 4 Fed. (2d) 983, affirmed in Duignan v. United States (1927) 274 U. S. 195, 71 L. ed. 996; Kling v. United States (1925) 8 Fed. (2d) 730, certiorari denied, 269 U. S. 587, 70 L. ed. 426; Denapolis v. United States (1925) 3 Fed. (2d) 722.

TWINING v. STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

1908. Supreme Court of the United States. 211 U. S. 78.

[Defendant and another were indicted of a criminal offense in a New Jersey court, convicted and sentenced to six and four years imprisonment respectively. At the trial the accused refrained from testifying and objected to the judge's instruction: "Because a man does not go upon the stand you are not necessarily justified in drawing an inference of guilt. But you have a right to consider the fact that he does not go upon the stand where a direct accusation is made against him" by other testimony. The ~~court of~~ last resort of the state affirmed the conviction over the contention that the trial judge's instruction violated an immunity of an accused from testifying against himself and that this immunity was secured by the Fourteenth Amendment. This writ of error was taken.]

Mr. Justice Moody delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

The exemption from testimonial compulsion, that is, from disclosure as a witness of evidence against oneself, forced by any form of legal process, is universal in American law, though there may be differences as to its exact scope and limits. At the time of the formation of the Union the principle that no person could be compelled to be a witness against himself had become embodied in the common law and distinguished it from all other systems of jurisprudence. It was generally regarded then, as now, as a privilege of great value, a protection to the innocent though a shelter to the guilty, and a safeguard against heedless, unfounded or tyrannical prosecutions. Five of the original thirteen states (North Carolina, 1776; Pennsylvania, 1776; Virginia, 1776; Massachusetts, 1780; New Hampshire, 1784) had then guarded the principle from legislative or judicial change by including it in constitutions or bills of rights; Maryland had provided in her constitution (1776) that "no man ought to be compelled to give evidence against himself, (1927) 21 Fed. (2d) 800 (holding this provision in violation of jury requirement in Const. Art. III, § 2). See the opinion of the same judge in United States v. Lot 29 (1924) 296 Fed. 729.

In May, 1921, a United States district court issued an injunction against Hansen enjoining him from permitting or continuing a nuisance on his premises in violation of the National Prohibition Act. On July 29, Hansen sold a glass of whiskey there. For this act he was indicted September 2, in the same district court, pleaded guilty September 22 and was fined $25. On September 27 a petition was filed in the same court alleging that Hansen had violated the injunction. The only evidence of such violation was the same single sale. The court held him in contempt and imposed a penalty of imprisonment for one year and a fine of $1,000. The Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that this did not violate the defendant's immunity from double jeopardy (Const., Amend. V), saying: "Contempt of court for transgression of its injunctional order bears no necessary relation to liability for violating a criminal statute, although both are incurred by the same act, and punishment for one is no bar to prosecution for the other." Hansen v. United States (1924) 1 Fed. (2d) 316. Cf. Murphy v. United States (1926) 272 U. S. 630, 71 L. ed. 446.

in a common court of law, or in any other court, but in such cases as have been usually practiced in this state or may hereafter be directed by the legislature;" and in the remainder of those states there seems to be no doubt that it was recognized by the courts. The privilege was not included in the federal Constitution as originally adopted, but was placed in one of the ten Amendments which were recommended to the states by the first Congress, and by them adopted. Since then all the states of the Union have, from time to time, with varying form but uniform meaning, included the privilege in their constitutions, except the States of New Jersey and Iowa, and in those states it is held to be part of the existing law [common law or statute]. State v. Zdanowicz, 69 N. J. L. 619; State v. Height, 117 Iowa, 650. It is obvious from this short statement that it has been supposed by the states that, so far as the state courts are concerned, the privilege had its origin in the constitution and laws of the states, and that persons appealing to it must look to the state for their protection. Indeed, since by the unvarying decisions of this court the first ten Amendments of the federal Constitution are restrictive only of national action, there was nowhere else to look, up to the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, and the state, at least until then, might give, modify or withhold the privilege at its will. The Fourteenth Amendment withdrew from the states powers theretofore enjoyed by them to an extent not yet fully ascertained, or rather, to speak more accurately, limited those powers and restrained their exercise. There is no doubt of the duty of this court to enforce the limitations and restraints whenever they exist, and there has been no hesitation in the performance of the duty. But whenever a new limitation or restriction is declared it is a matter of grave import, since, to that extent, it diminishes the authority of the state, so necessary to the perpetuity of our dual form of government, and changes its relation to its people and to the Union. The question in the case at bar has been twice before us, and been left undecided, as the cases were disposed of on other grounds. Adams v. New York, 192 U. S. 585; Consolidated Rendering Co. v. Vermont, 207 U. S. 541. The defendants contend, in the first place, that the exemption from self-incrimination is one of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which the Fourteenth Amendment forbids the states to abridge. It is not argued that the defendants are protected by that part of the Fifth Amendment which provides that "no person * * * shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," for it is recognized by counsel that by a long line of decisions the first ten Amendments are not operative on the states. Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243; Spies v. Illinois, 123 U. S. 131; Brown v. New Jersey, 175 U. S. 172; Barrington v. Missouri, 205 U. S. 483. But it is argued that this privilege is one of the fundamental rights of national citizenship, placed under national protection by the Fourteenth Amendment, and it is specifically argued that the "privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States," protected against state action by that Amendment, include those fundamental personal rights which were protected against national action by the first eight Amendments; that this was the intention of the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment, and that this part of it would otherwise have little or no meaning and effect. These arguments are not new to this court and the answer to them is found in its decisions. The meaning of the phrase "privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States," as used in the Fourteenth Amendment, came under early consideration in the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36. * * *

We conclude, therefore, that the exemption from compulsory self-incrimination is not a privilege or immunity of national citizenship guaranteed by this clause of the Fourteenth Amendment against abridgment by the states.

The defendants, however, do not stop here. They appeal to another clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and insist that the self-incrimination, which they allege the instruction to the jury compelled, was a denial of due process of law. This contention requires separate consideration, for it is possible that some of the personal rights safeguarded by the first eight Amendments against national action may also be safe-guarded against state action, because a denial of them would be a denial of due process of law. Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226. If this is so, it is not because those rights are enumerated in the first eight Amendments, but because they are of such a nature that they are included in the conception of due process of law. Few phrases of the law are so elusive of exact apprehension as this. * * * [Here reference is made to the historical interpretation of "due process of law" expressed in Murray v. Hoboken Land Co., ante, p. 537, and in Hurtado v. California, ante, p. 554.]

The question under consideration may first be tested by the application of these settled doctrines of this court. If the statement of Mr. Justice Curtis, as elucidated in Hurtado v. California, is to be taken literally, that alone might almost be decisive. For nothing is more certain, in point of historical fact, than that the practice of compulsory self-incrimination in the courts and elsewhere existed for four hundred years after the granting of Magna Carta, continued throughout the reign of Charles I (though then beginning to be seriously questioned), gained at least some foothold among the early colonists of this country, and was not entirely omitted at trials in England until the eighteenth century. Wigmore on Evidence, § 2250 (see for the Colonies, note 108); Hallam's Constitutional History of England, ch. VIII, 2 Widdleton's American ed., 37 (describing the criminal jurisdiction of the Court of Star Chamber); Bentham's Rationale of Judicial Evidence, book IX, ch. III, § IV. * * *

But without repudiating or questioning the test proposed by Mr. Justice Curtis for the court, or rejecting the inference drawn from English law, we prefer to rest our decision on broader grounds, and inquire whether the exemption from self-incrimination is of such a nature that it must be included in the conception of due process. * * * One aid to the solution of the question is to inquire how the right was rated during the time when the meaning of due process was in a formative state and before it was incorporated in American constitutional law. Did those who then were formulating and insisting upon the rights of the people entertain the view that the right was so fundamental that there could be no due process without it? It has already appeared that, prior to the formation of the American constitutions, in which the exemption from compulsory self-incrimination was specifically secured, separately, independently, and side by side with the requirement of due process, the doctrine was formed, as other doctrines of the law of evidence have been formed, by the course of decisions in the courts covering a long period of time. Searching further, we find nothing to show that it was then thought to be other than a just and useful principle of law. None of the great instruments in which we are accustomed to look for the declaration of the fundamental rights made reference to it. The privilege was not dreamed of for hundreds of years after Magna Carta (1215), and could not have been implied in the "law of the land" there secured. The Petition of Right (1629), though it insists upon the right, secured by Magna Carta, to be condemned only by the law of the land, and sets forth by way of grievance divers violations of it, is silent upon the practice of compulsory self-incrimination, though it was then a matter of common occurrence in all the courts of the realm. The Bill of Rights of the first year of the reign of William and Mary (1689) is likewise silent, though the practice of questioning the prisoner at his trial had not then ceased. The negative argument which arises out of the omission of all reference to any exemption from compulsory self-incrimination in these three great declarations of English liberty (though it is not supposed to amount to a demonstration) is supported by the positive argument that the English Courts and Parliaments, as we have seen, have dealt with the exemption as they would have dealt with any other rule of evidence, apparently without a thought that the question was affected by the law of the land of Magna Carta, or the due process of law which is its equivalent.

We pass by the meager records of the early colonial time, so far as they have come to our attention, as affording light too uncertain for guidance. * * *

But the history of the incorporation of the privilege in an amendment to the National Constitution is full of significance in this connection. Five states, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Georgia and Connecticut, ratified the Constitution without proposing amendments. Massachusetts then followed with a ratification, accompanied by a recommendation of nine amendments, none of which referred to the privilege; Maryland with a ratification without proposing amendments; South Carolina with a ratification accompanied by a recommendation of four amendments, none of which referred to the privilege, and New Hampshire with a ratification accompanied by a recommendation of twelve amendments, none of which referred to the privilege. The nine states requisite to put the Constitution in operation ratified it without a suggestion of incorporating this privilege. Virginia was the tenth state to ratify, proposing, by separate resolution, an elaborate Bill of Rights under twenty heads, and in addition twenty amendments to the body of the Constitution. Among the rights enumerated as "essential and inalienable" is that no man "can be compelled to give evidence against himself," and "no freeman ought to be deprived of his life, liberty or property but by the law of the land." New York ratified with a proposal of numerous amendments and a declaration of rights which the convention declared ought not be violated and were consistent with the Constitution. One of these rights was that "No person ought to be taken, imprisoned or deprived of his freehold, or be exiled or deprived of his priveleges, franchises, life, liberty or property but by due process of law;" and another was that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused * * * should not be compelled to give evidence against himself." North Carolina and Rhode Island were the last to ratify, each proposing a large number of amendments, including the provision that no man "can be compelled to give evidence against himself;" and North Carolina, that "no freeman ought to be * * * deprived of his life, liberty or property but by the law of the land;" and Rhode Island, that "no freeman ought to be * * * deprived of his life, liberty or property but by the trial by jury, or by the law of the land."

Thus it appears that four only of the thirteen original states insisted upon incorporating the privilege in the Constitution, and they separately and simultaneously with the requirement of due process of law, and that three states proposing amendments were silent upon this subject. It is worthy of note that two of these four states did not incorporate the privilege in their own constitutions, where it would have had a much wider field of usefulness, until many years after. New York in 1821 and Rhode Island in 1842 (its first constitution). This survey does not tend to show that it was then in this country the universal or even general belief that the privilege ranked among the fundamental and inalienable rights of mankind; and what is more important here, it affirmatively shows that the privilege was not conceived to be inherent in due process of law, but on the other hand a right separate, independent and outside of due process. Congress, in submitting the amendments to the several states, treated the two rights as exclusive of each other. Such also has been the view of the states in framing their own constitutions, for in every case, except in New Jersey and Iowa, where the due process clause or its equivalent is included, it has been thought necessary to include separately the privilege clause. Nor have we been referred to any decision of a state court save one (State v. Height, 117 Iowa, 650), where the exemption has been held to be required by due process of law. The inference is irresistible that it has been the opinion of constitution makers that the privilege, if fundamental in any sense, is not fundamental in due process of law, nor an essential part of it. We believe that this opinion is proved to have been correct by every historical test by which the meaning of the phrase can be tried.

The decisions of this court, though they are silent on the precise question before us, ought to be searched to discover if they present any analogies which are helpful in its decision. The essential elements of due process of law, already established by them, are singularly few, though of wide application and deep significance. We are not here concerned with the effect of due process in restraining substantive laws, as, for example, that which forbids the taking of private property for public use without compensation. We need notice now only those cases which deal with the principles which must be observed in the trial of criminal and civil causes. Due process requires that the court which assumes to determine the rights of parties shall have jurisdiction, Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 733; Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 34; Old Wayne Life Association v. McDonough, 204 U. S. 8, and that there shall be notice and opportunity for hearing given the parties, Hovey v. Elliott, 167 U. S. 409; Roller v. Holly, 176 U. S. 398; and see Londoner v. Denver, 210 U. S. 373. Subject to these two fundamental conditions, which seem to be universally prescribed in all systems of law established by civilized countries, this court has up to this time sustained all state laws, statutory or judicially declared, regulating procedure, evidence and methods of trial, and held them to be consistent with due process of law. * * *

Salutary as the principle may seem to the great majority, it cannot be ranked with the right to hearing before condemnation, the immunity from arbitrary power not acting by general laws, and the inviolability of private property. The wisdom of the exemption has never been universally assented to since the days of Bentham; many doubt it today, and it is best defended not as an unchangeable principle of universal justice but as a law proved by experience to be expedient. See Wigmore, § 2251. It has no place in the jurisprudence of civilized and free countries outside the domain of the common law, and it is nowhere observed among our own people in the search for truth outside the administration of the law. It should, must and will be rigidly observed where it is secured by specific constitutional safeguards, but there is nothing in it which gives it a sanctity above and before constitutions themselves. Much might be said in favor of the view that the privilege was guaranteed against state impairment as a privilege and immunity of national citizenship, but, as has been shown, the decisions of this court have foreclosed that view. There seems to be no reason whatever, however, for straining the meaning of due process of law to include this privilege within it, because, perhaps, we may think it of great value. The states had guarded the privilege to the satisfaction of their own people up to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. No reason is perceived why they cannot continue to do so. The power of their people ought not to be fettered, their sense of responsibility lessened, and their capacity for sober and restrained self-government weakened by forced construction of the federal Constitution. If the people of New Jersey are not content with the law as declared in repeated decisions of their courts, the remedy is in their own hands. They may, if they choose, alter it by legislation, as the people of Maine did when the courts of that state made the same ruling. State v. Bartlett, 55 Maine, 200; State v. Lawrence, 57 Maine, 574; State v. Cleaves, 59 Maine, 298; State v. Banks, 78 Maine, 490, 492; Rev. Stat. ch. 135, § 19.

We have assumed only for the purpose of discussion that what was done in the case at bar was an infringement of the privilege against self-incrimination. We do not intend, however, to lend any countenance to the truth of that assumption. The courts of New Jersey, in adopting the rule of law which is complained of here, have deemed it consistent with the privilege itself and not a denial of it. The reasoning by which this view is supported will be found in the cases cited from New Jersey and Maine, and see Reg. v. Rhodes (1899), 1 Q. B. 77; Ex parte Kops (1894), A. C. 650. The authorities upon the question are in conflict. We do not pass upon the conflict, because, for the reasons given, we think that the exemption from compulsory self-incrimination in the courts of the states is not secured by any part of the Federal Constitution.

TUMEY v. STATE OF OHIO.

[Tumey was convicted in the mayor's court of the Village of North College Hill, Ohio, of possessing intoxicating liquor in violation of state law, over his objection that trial by the mayor would not accord him due process of law as required by the Fourteenth Amendment. This contention was based on the following facts. This rural village which had a population of about 1100 people is located in Hamilton County, which had a population of half a million, including the City of Cincinnati. By state statute village mayors had jurisdiction to try violations of the state prohibition law occurring in any part of the county. Tumey's offense as charged was committed in another village of Hamilton County. Trial was to be without a jury for offenses punishable by fine only. On appeal the finding of fact by the mayor could be set aside only if so clearly unsupported by the evidence "as to indicate some misapprehension or mistake or bias on the part of the trial court, or a wilful disregard of duties." The statute prescribed a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1000, half to go to the state and half to the village. Also in cases of convictions the mayor was entitled by state statute to fees charged as costs to the convicted defendants. He received no fees except in case of conviction. By authority of state statute the village by ordinance appropriated one-half of its share of fines to a secret service fund, 15% of which was allotted to deputy marshals as compensation for services in obtaining evidence of violation of the liquor laws, 10% to payment of counsel fees, and 15% for services of detectives in securing evidence. The balance was used for village improvements and repairs. The Mayor owned a house in the village.] Between May 11, 1923 and December 31, 1923, the total amount of fines for violation of the prohibition law, collected by this village court, was upwards of $20,000, from which the state received $8,992.50, North College Hill received $4,471.25 for its general uses, $2,697.25 was placed to the credit of the village safety fund, and the balance was put in the secret service fund. Out of this, the person acting as prosecutor in the liquor court received in that period $1,796.50; the deputy marshals, inspectors and other employees, including the detectives, received $2,697.75, and $438.50 was paid for costs in transporting prisoners, serving writs and other services in connection with the trial of these cases. Mayor Pugh received $696.35

Mr. Chief Justice Taft delivered the opinion of the court.

That officers acting in a judicial or quasi judicial capacity are disqualified by their interest in the controversy to be decided is of course the general rule. * * * Nice questions, however, often arise as to what the degree or nature of the interest must be. One is in respect of the effect of the membership of a judge in a class of taxpayers or others to be affected by a principle of law, statutory or constitutional, to be applied in a case between other parties and in which the judge has no other interest. Then the circumstance that there is no judge not equally disqualified to act in such a case has been held to affect the question. * * * We are not embarrassed by such considerations here, for there were available in this case other judicial officers who had no disqualification either by reason of the character of their compensation or their relation to the village government. All questions of judicial qualification may not involve constitutional validity. Thus matters of kinship, personal bias, state policy, remoteness of interest would seem generally to be matters merely of legislative discretion. Wheeling v. Black, 25 W. Va. 266, 270. But it certainly violates the Fourteenth Amendment and deprives a defendant in a criminal case of due process of law to subject his liberty or property to the judgment of a court, the judge of which has a direct, personal, substantial pecuniary interest in reaching a conclusion against him in his case.

The mayor of the village of North College Hill, Ohio, had a direct personal pecuniary interest in convicting the defendant who came before him for trial, in the $12 of costs imposed in his behalf, which he would not have received if the defendant had been acquitted. This was not exceptional, but was the result of the normal operation of the law and the ordinance. Counsel for the state do not deny this, but assert the validity of the practice as an exception to the general rule. They rely upon the cases of Ownbey v. Morgan, 256 U. S. 94; Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land & Improvement Co., 18 How. 272, 276-280.

These cases show that in determining what due process of law is, under the Fifth or Fourteenth Amendment, the court must look to those settled usages and modes of proceeding existing in the common and statute law of England before the emigration of our ancestors, which were shown not to have been unsuited to their civil and political condition by having been acted on by them after the settlement of this country. Counsel contend that in Ohio and in other states, in the economy which it is found necessary to maintain in the administration of justice in the inferior courts by justices of the peace and by judicial officers of like jurisdiction, the only compensation which the state and county and township can afford is the fees and costs earned by them, and that such compensation is so small that it is not to be regarded as likely to influence improperly a judicial officer in the discharge of his duty, or as prejudicing the defendant in securing justice, even though the magistrate will receive nothing if the defendant is not convicted.

We have been referred to no cases at common law in England, prior to the separation of colonies from the mother country, showing a practice that inferior judicial officers were dependent upon the conviction of the defendant for receiving their compensation. Indeed, in analogous cases it is very clear that the slightest pecuniary interest of any officer, judicial or quasi judicial, in the resolving of the subject-matter which he was to decide, rendered the decision voidable. Bonham's Case, 8 Coke, 118a; s. c. 2 Brownlow & Goldesborough's Rep. 255; City of London v. Wood, 12 Modern Rep. 669, 687; Day v. Savage, Hobart, 85, 87; Hesketh v. Braddock, 3 Burrows, 1847, 1856, 1857, 1858.[11] * * *

That practice has prevailed, and still prevails, in Arkansas, Kentucky, Nebraska, North Carolina, Georgia, Ohio, and Texas, and it seems at one time to have obtained in Indiana, Oregon, Illinois, and Alabama. * * *

The strict common law rule was adopted in this country as one to be enforced where nothing but the common law controlled, and citizens and taxpayers have been held incompetent to sit in suits against the municipal corporation of which they have been residents. Diveny v. Elmira, 51 N. Y. 506; Corwein v. Hames, 11 Johns. 76; Clark v. Lamb, 2 Allen 396; Dively v. Cedar Falls, 21 Iowa 565; Fulweiler v. St. Louis, 61 Mo. 479; Petition of New Boston, 49 N. H. 328; Commonwealth v. McLane, 4 Gray 427; Fine v. St. Louis Public Schools, 30 Mo. 166, 173. With other courts, however, and with the legislatures, the strict rule seemed to be inconvenient, impracticable and unnecessary, and the view was taken that such remote or minute interest in the litigation might be declared by the Legislature not to be a reason for disqualification of a judge or juror. * * * Mr. Justice Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 7th edition, page 594, points out that the real ground of the ruling in these cases is that "interest is so remote, trifling and insignificant that it may fairly be supposed to be incapable of affecting the judgment of or of influencing the conduct of an individual. And where penalties are imposed, to be recovered only in a municipal court, the judge or jurors in which would be interested as corporators in the recovery, the law providing for such recovery must be regarded as precluding the objection of interest." But the learned judge then proceeds:

[11] See the first three of these cases printed ante, pp. 3, 6.

"But except in cases resting upon such reasons, we do not see how the legislature can have any power to abolish a maxim which is among the fundamentals of judicial authority." * * *

From this review we conclude that a system by which an inferior judge is paid for his service only when he convicts the defendant has not become so embedded by custom in the general practice, either at common law or in this country, that it can be regarded as due process of law, unless the costs usually imposed are so small that they may be properly ignored as within the maxim "de minimis non curat lex."

The mayor received for his fees and costs in the present case $12, and from such costs under the Prohibition Act for seven months he made about $100 a month, in addition to his salary. We cannot regard the prospect of receipt or loss of such an emolument in each case as a minute, remote, trifling, or insignificant interest. It is certainly not fair to each defendant brought before the mayor for the careful and judicial consideration of his guilt or innocence that the prospect of such a loss by the mayor should weigh against his acquittal.

These are not cases in which the penalties and the costs are negligible. The field of jurisdiction is not that of a small community, engaged in enforcing its own local regulations. The court is a state agency, imposing substantial punishment, and the cases to be considered are gathered from the whole county by the energy of the village marshals and detectives regularly employed by the village for the purpose. * * * Every procedure which would offer a possible temptation to the average man as a judge to forget the burden of proof required to convict the defendant, or which might lead him not to hold the balance nice, clear, and true between the state and the accused denies the latter due process of law.

But the pecuniary interest of the mayor in the result of his judgment is not the only reason for holding that due process of law is denied to the defendant here. The statutes were drawn to stimulate small municipalities in the country part of counties in which there are large cities to organize and maintain courts to try persons accused of violations of the Prohibition Act everywhere in the county. The inducement is offered of dividing between the state and the village the large fines provided by the law for its violations. * * * The mayor represents the village and cannot escape his representative capacity. * * * With his interest as mayor in the financial condition of the village and his responsibility therefor, might not a defendant with reason say that he feared he could not get a fair trial or a fair sentence from one who would have so strong a motive to help his village by conviction and a heavy fine? The old English cases cited above of the days of Coke and Holt and Mansfield are not nearly so strong. A situation in which an official perforce occupies two practically and seriously inconsistent positions, one partisan and the other judicial, necessarily involves a lack of due process of law in the trial of defendants charged with crimes before him. * * *

It is also correctly pointed out that it is completely within the power of the legislature to dispose of the fines collected in criminal cases as it will, and it may therefore divide the fines as it does here, one-half to the state and one-half to the village by whose mayor they are imposed and collected. It is further said with truth that the legislature of a state may and often ought to stimulate prosecutions for crime by offering to those who shall initiate and carry on such prosecutions rewards for thus acting in the interest of the state and the people. The legislature may offer rewards or a percentage of the recovery to informers. United States v. Murphy & Morgan, 16 Pet. 203. It may authorize the employment of detectives. But these principles do not at all affect the question whether the state, by the operation of the statutes we have considered, has not vested the judicial power in one who by reason of his interest, both as an individual and as chief executive of the village, is disqualified to exercise it in the trial of the defendant. * * *

[12] In Dugan v. Ohio (1928) 277 U. S. 61, 72 L. ed. 784, Dugan was convicted before the mayor's court of the city of Xenia, Ohio, on a charge of possession of intoxicating liquor in violation of a state statute. The offense was committed within the corporate limits of Xenia. The mayor received a fixed salary and no fees. Nevertheless Dugan contended that because of the interest of the mayor the conviction was not by due process of law. Distinguishing the case from Tumey v. Ohio, the court by Taft, C. J. said: "The mayor of Xenia receives a salary which is not dependent on whether he convicts in any case or not. While it is true that his salary is paid out of a fund to which fines accumulated from his court under all laws contribute, it is a general fund, and he receives a salary in any event, whether he convicts or acquits. There is no reason to infer on any showing that failure to convict in any case or cases would deprive him of or affect his fixed compensation. The mayor has himself as such no executive, but only judicial, duties. His relation under the Xenia charter, as one of five members of the city commission, to the fund contributed to by his fines as judge, or to the executive or financial policy of the city, is remote."

of the suit was published in a newspaper. Neff did not appear or answer. In 1866 judgment for Mitchell was given by default. Land in Oregon belonging to Neff was sold at sheriff's sale in execution of this judgment. Pennoyer was the purchaser.

Neff later brought this action against Pennoyer in the Circuit Court of the United States in Oregon to recover the land. The court gave judgment for Neff. Pennoyer appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States.]

MR. JUSTICE FIELD delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

It was * * * contended in that court [the Circuit Court of the United States] and is insisted upon here, that the judgment in the state court against the plaintiff was void for want of personal service of process on him, or of his appearance in the action in which it was rendered, and that the premises in controversy could not be subjected to the payment of the demand of a resident creditor except by a proceeding in rem; that is, by a direct proceeding against the property for that purpose. If these positions are sound, the ruling of the Circuit Court as to the invalidity of that judgment must be sustained, * * *. And that they are sound would seem to follow from two well-established principles of public law respecting the jurisdiction of an independent state over persons and property. The several states of the Union are not, it is true, in every respect independent, many of the rights and powers which originally belonged to them being now vested in the government created by the Constitution. But, except as restrained and limited by that instrument, they possess and exercise the authority of independent states, and the principles of public law to which we have referred are applicable to them. One of these principles is, that every state possesses exclusive jurisdiction and sovereignty over persons and property within its territory. As a consequence, every state has the power to determine for itself the civil status and capacities of its inhabitants; to prescribe the subjects upon which they may contract, the forms and solemnities with which their contracts shall be executed, the rights and obligations arising from them, and the mode in which their validity shall be determined and their obligations enforced; and also to regulate the manner and conditions upon which property situated within such territory, both personal and real, may be acquired, enjoyed, and transferred. The other principle of public law referred to follows from the one mentioned; that is, that no state can exercise direct jurisdiction and authority over persons or property without its territory. Story, Confl. Laws, c. 2; Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 2, c. 2. The several states are of equal dignity and authority, and the independence of one implies the exclusion of power from all others. And so it is laid down by jurists, as an elementary principle, that the laws of one state have no operation outside of its territory, except so far as is allowed by comity; and that no tribunal established by it can extend its process beyond that territory so as to subject either persons or property to its decisions. "Any exertion of authority of this sort beyond this limit," says Story, "is a mere nullity, and incapable of binding such persons or property in any other tribunals." Story, Confl. Laws, sec. 539. * * *

These views are not new. They have been frequently expressed, with more or less distinctness, in opinions of eminent judges, and have been carried into adjudications in numerous cases. Thus, in Picquet v. Swan, 5 Mas. 35, Mr. Justice Story said:

"Where a party is within a territory, he may justly be subjected to its process, and bound personally by the judgment pronounced on such process against him. Where he is not within such territory, and is not personally subject to its laws, if, on account of his supposed or actual property being within the territory, process by the local laws may, by attachment, go to compel his appearance, and for his default to appear judgment may be pronounced against him, such a judgment must, upon general principles, be deemed only to bind him to the extent of such property, and cannot have the effect of a conclusive judgment in personam, for the plain reason, that, except so far as the property is concerned, it is a judgment coram non judice."

And in Boswell's Lessee v. Otis, 9 How. 336, where the title of the plantiff in ejectment was acquired on a sheriff's sale, under a money decree rendered upon publication of notice against nonresidents, in a suit brought to enforce a contract relating to land, Mr. Justice McLean said:

"Jurisdiction is acquired in one of two modes: first, as against the person of the defendant by the service of process; or, secondly, by a procedure against the property of the defendant within the jurisdiction of the court. In the latter case, the defendant is not personally bound by the judgment beyond the property in question. And it is immaterial whether the proceeding against the property be by an attachment or bill in chancery. It must be substantially a proceeding in rem." * * *

If, without personal service, judgments in personam, obtained ex parte against nonresidents and absent parties, upon mere publication of process, which, in the great majority of cases, would never be seen by the parties interested, could be upheld and enforced, they would be the constant instruments of fraud and oppression. Judgments for all sorts of claims upon contracts and for torts, real or pretended, would be thus obtained, under which property would be seized, when the evidence of the transactions upon which they were founded, if they ever had any existence, had perished.

Substituted service by publication, or in any other authorized form, may be sufficient to inform parties of the object of proceedings taken where property is once brought under the control of the court by seizure or some equivalent act. The law assumes that property is always in the possession of its owner, in person or by agent; and it proceeds upon the theory that its seizure will inform him, not only that it is taken into the custody of the court, but that he must look to any proceedings authorized by law upon such seizure for its condemnation and sale. Such service may also be sufficient in cases where the object of the action is to reach and dispose of property in the state, or of some interest therein, by enforcing a contract or a lien respecting the same, or to partition it among different owners, or, when the public is a party, to condemn and appropriate it for a public purpose. In other words, such service may answer in all actions which are substantially proceedings in rem. But where the entire object of the action is to determine the personal rights and obligations of the defendants, that is, where the suit is merely in personam, constructive service in this form upon a nonresident is ineffectual for any purpose. Process from the tribunals of one state cannot run into another state, and summon parties there domiciled to leave its territory and respond to proceedings against them. Publication of process or notice within the state where the tribunal sits cannot create any greater obligation upon the nonresident to appear. Process sent to him out of the state, and process published within it, are equally unavailing in proceedings to establish his personal liability.

The want of authority of the tribunals of a state to adjudicate upon the obligations of nonresidents, where they have no property with its limits, is not denied * * *; but the position is assumed, that, where they have property within the state, it is immaterial whether the property is in the first instance brought under the control of the court by attachment or some other equivalent act, and afterwards applied by its judgment to the satisfaction of demands against its owner; or such demands be first established in a personal action, and the property of the nonresident be afterwards seized and sold on execution. But the answer to this position has already been given in the statement, that the jurisdiction of the court to inquire into and determine his obligations at all is only incidental to its jurisdiction over the property. Its jurisdiction in that respect cannot be made to depend upon facts to be ascertained after it has tried the cause and rendered the judgment. * * *

The force and effect of judgments rendered against nonresidents without personal service of process upon them, or their voluntary appearance, have been the subject of frequent consideration in the courts of the United States and of the several states, as attempts have been made to enforce such judgments in states other than those in which they were rendered, under the provision of the Constitution requiring that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state;" and the act of Congress providing for the mode of authenticating such acts, records, and proceedings, and declaring that, when thus authenticated, "they shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from which they are or shall be taken." In the earlier cases, it was supposed that the act gave to all judgments the same effect in other states which they had by law in the state where rendered. But this view was afterwards qualified so as to make the act applicable only when the court rendering the judgment had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, and not to preclude an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court in which the judgment was rendered, or the right of the state itself to exercise authority over the person or the subject-matter. * * * [Here several cases are cited and discussed.]

In several of the cases, the decision has been accompanied with the observation that a personal judgment thus recovered has no binding force without the state in which it is rendered, implying that in such state it may be valid and binding. * * * In later cases, this language is repeated with less frequency than formerly, it beginning to be considered, as it always ought to have been, that a judgment which can be treated in any state of this union as contrary to the first principles of justice, and as an absolute nullity, because rendered without any jurisdiction of the tribunal over the party, is not entitled to any respect in the state where rendered. Smith v. McCutchen, 38 Mo. 415; Darrance v. Preston, 18 Iowa, 396; Hakes v. Shupe, 27 id. 465; Mitchell's Administrator v. Gray, 18 Ind. 123.

Be that as it may, the courts of the United States are not required to give effect to judgments of this character when any right is claimed under them. Whilst they are not foreign tribunals in their relations to the state courts, they are tribunals of a different sovereignty, exercising a distinct and independent jurisdiction, and are bound to give to the judgments of the state courts only the same faith and credit which the courts of another state are bound to give to them.

Since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, the validity of such judgments may be directly questioned, and their enforcement in the state resisted on the ground that proceedings in a court of justice to determine the personal rights and obligations of parties over whom that court has no jurisdiction do not constitute due process of law. Whatever difficulty may be experienced in giving to those terms a definition which will embrace every permissible exertion of power affecting private rights, and exclude such as is forbidden, there can be no doubt of their meaning when applied to judicial proceedings. They then mean a course of legal proceedings according to those rules and principles which have been established in our systems of jurisprudence for the protection and enforcement of private rights. To give such proceedings any validity, there must be a tribunal competent by its constitution—that is, by the law of its creation—to pass upon the subject-matter of the suit; and, if that involves merely a determination of the personal liability of the defendant, he must be brought within its jurisdiction by service of process within the state, or his voluntary appearance.

Except in cases affecting the personal status[13] of the plaintiff, and cases in which that mode of service may be considered to have been assented to in advance, * * * the substituted service of process by publication, allowed by the law of Oregon and by similar laws in other states, where actions are brought against nonresidents, is effectual only where, in connection with process against the person for commencing the action, property in the state is brought under the control of the court, and subjected to its disposition by process adapted to that purpose, or where the judgment is sought as a means of reaching such property or affecting some interest therein; in other words, where the action is in the nature of a proceeding in rem. As stated by Cooley in his Treatise on Constitutional Limitations, 405, for any other purpose than to subject the property of a nonresident to valid claims against him in the state, "due process of law would require appearance or personal service before the defendant could be personally bound by any judgment rendered."

It is true that, in a strict sense, a proceeding in rem is one taken directly against property, and has for its object the disposition of the property, without reference to the title of individual claimants; but, in a larger and more general sense, the terms are applied to actions between parties, where the direct object is to reach and dispose of property owned by them, or of some interest therein. Such are cases commenced by attachment against the property of debtors, or instituted to partition real estate, foreclose a mortgage, or foreclose a lien. So far as they affect property in the state, they are substantially proceedings in rem in the broader sense which we have mentioned.

[13] "The rule as to notice necessary to give effect to a decree of divorce is different from that which is required in suits in personam." Atherton v. Atherton (1901) 181 U. S. 155, 162, 45 L. ed. 794. Compare Haddock v. Haddock (1906) 201 U. S. 562, 50 L. ed. 867, 5 Ann. Cas. 1. The difficult question, to what extent decrees of divorce granted in one state are respected or must be respected by other states, is usually fully considered in courses on Conflict of Laws.

It is hardly necessary to observe, that in all we have said we have had reference to proceedings in courts of first instance, and to their jurisdiction, and not to proceedings in an appellate tribunal to review the action of such courts. The latter may be taken upon such notice, personal or constructive, as the state creating the tribunal may provide. They are considered as rather a continuation of the original litigation than the commencement of a new action. Nations et al. v. Johnson et al., 24 How. 195.

It follows from the views expressed that the personal judgment recovered in the state court of Oregon against the plaintiff herein, then a nonresident of the state, was without any validity, and did not authorize a sale of the property in controversy.

Judgment affirmed.[14]

[Dissenting opinion of MR. JUSTICE HUNT is omitted.]

WUCHTER v. PIZZUTTI.

1928. Supreme Court of the United States. 276 U. S. 13.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE TAFT delivered the opinion of the court.

Pizzutti was driving a team of horses attached to a wagon on a public highway in New Jersey. Wuchter was a resident of Pennsylvania, who was following the wagon with his automobile. Wuchter drove his car so as to crash into the rear of the wagon, damaging it, and injuring Pizzutti and his horses. Pizzutti instituted a suit against Wuchter in the Supreme Court of New Jersey. Wuchter was served with process under the provisions of the act known as chapter 232 of the Laws of 1924 (P. L. 1924, p. 517) by leaving process with the secretary of state. Wuchter interposed no defense. A judgment interlocutory was taken against him and a writ of inquiry of damages was issued. Although the statute did not require it, notice of its proposed execution was actually served personally on Wuchter in Pennsylvania. Wuchter did not appear. A final judgment was entered. Wuchter then appealed to the court below, contending that the act under which the process was served upon him was unconstitutional, because it deprived him of his property without due process of law, in contravention of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution.

[14] Prior to the decision in Pennoyer v. Neff (1877) 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565, "it occasionally was intimated, if not held, by some of the state courts, that a personal judgment effective within the territory of the state could be rendered against a nonresident defendant who did not appear and submit himself to the jurisdiction, provided notice of the suit had been served upon him in the state of his residence, or had been published in the state within which the court was situate, pursuant to the provisions of a local statute. See Smith v. Colloty, 69 N. J. L. 365, 371. As was said by Mr. Justice Field, speaking for this court in Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 732, it is difficult to see how such a judgment could legitimately have force even within the state. But until the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment (1868) this remained a question of state law; the effect of the 'due process' clause of that Amendment being, as was held in the case just mentioned, to establish it as the law for all the states that a judgment rendered against a nonresident who had neither been served with process nor appeared in the suit was devoid of validity within as well as without the territory of the state whose court had rendered it, and to make the assertion of its invalidity a matter of federal right.

"The fundamental requisite of due process of law in judicial proceedings is the opportunity to be heard. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Schmidt, 177 U. S. 230, 236; Simon v. Craft, 182 U. S. 427, 436; Grannis v. Ordean, 234 U. S. 385, 394. To hold one bound by the judgment who has not had such opportunity is contrary to the first principles of justice. And to assume that a party resident beyond the confines of a state is required to come within its borders and submit his personal controversy to its tribunals upon receiving notice of the suit at the place of his residence is a futile attempt to extend the authority and control of a state beyond its own territory." Pitney, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Baker v. Baker, Eccles & Co. (1917) 242 U. S. 394, 402-403, 61 L. ed. 386.

Section 1 of the act complained of, under which the process was served in this case, was as follows:

"From and after the passage of this act any chauffeur, operator or owner of any motor vehicle, not licensed under the laws of the State of New Jersey, providing for the registration and licensing of motor vehicles, who shall accept the privilege extended to nonresident chauffeurs, operators and owners by law of driving such a motor vehicle or of having the same driven or operated in the State of New Jersey, without a New Jersey registration or license, shall, by such acceptance and the operation of such automobile within the State of New Jersey, make and constitute the secretary of state of the State of New Jersey, his, her or their agent for the acceptance of process in any civil suit or proceeding by any resident of the State of New Jersey against such chauffeur, operator or the owner of such motor vehicle, arising out of or by reason of any accident or collision occurring within the state in which a motor vehicle operated by such chauffeur, or operator, or such motor vehicle is involved." * * *

By the general state motor law, as amended by chapter 211, Laws of 1924, provision is made for the registration and license of automobiles owned by nonresidents who use the highways of the state, P. L. 1924, § 9, par. 4, p. 451. They are required to agree that original process against the owner made by leaving it in the office of the secretary of state shall have the same effect as if served on the owner within the state, and the statute provides that the commissioner of motor vehicles shall notify the owner of such motor car by letter directed to him at the post office address stated in his application for registration and license already filed with the commissioner.

The act first above referred to, No. 232, under which process in this case was served, applies to the owners of automobiles who are not licensed, but who come into the state and use the highways of the state without registration, and is not to be confused with the license act or its provisions.

It is settled by our decisions that a state's power to regulate the use of its highways extends to their use by nonresidents as well as by residents. Hendrick v. Maryland, 235 U. S. 610, 622. We have further held that, in advance of the operation of a motor vehicle on its highways by a nonresident, a state may require him to take out a license and to appoint one of its officials as his agent, on whom process may be served in suits growing out of accidents in such operation. This was under the license act of New Jersey, last above referred to, and not No. 232. Kane v. New Jersey, 242 U. S. 160, 167. We have also recognized it to be a valid exercise of power by a state, because of its right to regulate the use of its highways by nonresidents, to declare, without exacting a license, that the use of the highway by the nonresident may by statute be treated as the equivalent of the appointment by him of a state official as agent on whom process in such a case may be served. Hess v. Pawloski, 274 U. S. 352.

The question made in the present case is whether a statute, making the secretary of state the person to receive the process, must, in order to be valid, contain a provision making it reasonably probable that notice of the service on the secretary will be communicated to the nonresident defendant who is sued. Section 232 of the Laws of 1924 makes no such requirement and we have not been shown any provision in any applicable law of the State of New Jersey requiring such communication. We think that a law with the effect of this one should make a reasonable provision for such probable communication. We quite agree, and, indeed, have so held in the Pawloski Case, that the act of a nonresident in using the highways of another state may properly be declared to be an agreement to accept service of summons in a suit growing out of the use of the highway by the owner of the automobile, but the enforced acceptance of the service of process on a state officer by the defendant would not be fair or due process unless such officer or the plaintiff is required to mail the notice to the defendant, or to advise him, by some written communication, so as to make it reasonably probable that he will receive actual notice. Otherwise, where the service of summons is limited to a service on the secretary of state or some officer of the state, without more, it will be entirely possible for a person injured to sue any nonresident he chooses, and through service upon the state official obtain a default judgment against a nonresident who has never been in the state, who had nothing to do with the accident, or whose automobile having been in the state has never injured anybody. A provision of law for service that leaves open such a clear opportunity for the commission of fraud (Heinemann v. Pier, 110 Wis. 185), or injustice is not a reasonable provision, and in the case supposed would certainly be depriving a defendant of his property without due process of law. The Massachusetts statute, considered in Hess v. Pawloski, really made necessary actual personal service to be evidenced by the written admission of the defendant.[15] In Kane v. New Jersey, the service provided for by statute was by mail to the necessarily known registered address of the licensed defendant.

In determining the reasonableness of provision for service we should consider the situation of both parties. The person injured must find out to whom the offending automobile belongs. This may be a difficult task. It is easy when the owner of the automobile is present after the accident. That is provided for in the second section of this act by apprehending him or his operator. But the vehicle may be operated by some one who having committed the injury successfully escapes capture or identification. In such a case, the person injured must be left without a remedy by suit at law, as every one must be who does not know or cannot discover the person who injured him. The burden is necessarily on him to investigate and learn. In finding out who it was, and whether the person is of such financial responsibility as to warrant a suit, he almost necessarily will secure knowledge of his post office address or his place of residence, and thereby be enabled to point out how notice may be communicated to him. With this information at hand the state may properly authorize service to be made on one of its own officials, if it also requires that notice of that service shall be communicated to the person sued. Every statute of this kind, therefore, should require the plaintiff bringing the suit to show in the summons to be served the post office address or residence of the defendant being sued, and should impose either on the plaintiff himself or upon the official receiving service or some other, the duty of communication by mail or otherwise with the defendant.

The cases, in which statutes have been upheld providing that nonresident corporations may properly be served by leaving a summons with a state official, where the corporation has not indicated a resident agent to be served, are not especially applicable to the present statute. Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Co. v. Gold Issue Mining Co., 243 U. S. 93; Simon v. Southern Ry. Co.. 236 U. S. 115; Old

[15] The statute of Massachusetts required a copy of the process or notice filed with the state official to be forthwith sent by registered mail by the plaintiff to the defendant, and the defendant's return receipt to be filed in the court together with an affidavit by the plaintiff that he had complied with these requirements.

Wayne Mutual Life Association v. McDonough, 204 U. S. 8. Such corporations may properly be required to accept service through a public officer as a condition of their doing business in the state. Their knowledge of the statutory requirement may perhaps prompt frequent inquiry as to suits against them, of their appointed agent or at the office of the public official to be served, but it could hardly be fair or reasonable to require a nonresident individual owner of a motor vehicle who may use the state highways to make constant inquiry of the secretary of state to learn whether he has been sued. Even in cases of nonresident corporations, it has been held that a statute directing service upon them by leaving process with a state official is void if it contains no provision requiring the official, upon whom the service may be made, to give the foreign corporations notice that suit has been brought and citation served. Southern Railway Co. v. Simon, 184 Fed. 959, 961; Gouner v. Missouri Valley Bridge Co., 123 La. 964. * * * The question is mooted in Simon v. Southern Railway, 236 U. S. 115, 129 * * * but it was not found necessary to decide the point. * * *

In McDonald v. Mabee, 243 U. S. 90, 91, a person domiciled in Texas left the state to make his home in another state. An action for money was begun by publication in a newspaper after his departure, and a judgment recovered and sustained by the state supreme court was held void by this court. This court said:

"The foundation of jurisdiction is physical power, although in civilized times it is not necessary to maintain that power throughout proceedings properly begun, and although submission to the jurisdiction by appearance may take the place of service upon the person. * * * No doubt there may be some extension of the means of acquiring jurisdiction beyond service or appearance, but the foundation should be borne in mind. Subject to its conception of sovereignty even the common law required a judgment not to be contrary to natural justice. * * * And in states bound together by a Constitution and subject to the Fourteenth Amendment, great caution should be used not to let fiction deny the fair play that can be secured only by a pretty close adhesion to fact." See, also, Roller v. Holly, 176 U. S. 398.

These cases and others indicate a general trend of authority toward sustaining the validity of service of process, if the statutory provisions in themselves indicate that there is reasonable probability that if the statutes are complied with, the defendant will receive actual notice, and that is the principle that we think should apply here.

But it is said that the defendant here had actual notice by service out of New Jersey in Pennsylvania. He did not, however, appear in the cause and such notice was not required by the statute. Not having been directed by the statute it cannot, therefore, supply constitutional validity to the statute or to service under it. * * *

Judgment reversed.[16]

[BRANDEIS and HOLMES, JJ., dissented, chiefly on the ground that notice having actually been given, the defendant should not be heard to complain of a defect in the statute which had not operated to his prejudice; and STONE, J., on the ground that it should be left to the state court to decide whether the statute should be construed as impliedly requiring notice to be given a defendant. Otherwise these justices concurred in the principles announced.]

MOORE ET AL. v. DEMPSEY, KEEPER OF ARKANSAS STATE PENITENTIARY.

1923. Supreme Court of the United States. 261 U. S. 86.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

Habeas corpus proceedings by Frank Moore and others against E. H. Dempsey, Keeper of the Arkansas State Penitentiary. From an order dismissing the writ upon demurrer, the petitioners appeal.

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS, dissenting.

We are asked to overrule the judgment of the District Court discharging a writ of habeas corpus by means of which five negroes sought to escape electrocution for the murder of Clinton Lee. Sec. 753, Rev. Stats. They were convicted and sentenced in the circuit court of Phillips county, Arkansas, two years before the writ issued. The petition for the writ was supported by affidavits of these five ignorant men whose lives were at stake, the ex parte affidavits of three other negroes who had pleaded guilty and were then confined in the penitentiary under sentences for the same murder, and the affidavits of two white men—low villains according to their own admissions. It should be remembered that to narrate the allegations of the petition is but to repeat statements from these sources. Considering all the circumstances—the course of the cause in the state courts and upon application here for certiorari, etc.—the District Court held the alleged facts insufficient prima facie to show nullity of the original judgment.

[16] For discussions of the issues decided or referred to in this and the preceding case see Austin W. Scott, Jurisdiction over Nonresidents Doing Business within a State (1919) 32 Harv. L. Rev. 871; Jurisdiction over Nonresident Motorists (1926) 39 Harv. L. Rev. 533. See also Hess v. Pawloski (1927) 274 U. S. 352, 71 L. ed. 1091; York v. Texas (1890) 137 U. S. 15, 34 L. ed. 604; Flexner v. Farson (1919) 248 U. S. 289, 63 L. ed. 250; McDonald v. Mabee (1917) 243 U. S. 90, 61 L. ed. 608, L. R. A. 1917F, 458; Miedreich v. Lauenstein (1914) 232 U. S. 236, 58 L. ed. 584.

The matter is one of gravity. If every man convicted of crime in a state court may thereafter resort to the federal court and by swearing, as advised, that certain allegations of fact tending to impeach his trial are "true to the best of his knowledge and belief," and thereby obtain as of right further review, another way has been added to a list already unfortunately long to prevent prompt punishment. * * *

Let us consider with some detail what was presented to the court below.

There was the complete record of the cause in the state courts—trial and Supreme—showing no irregularity. After indictment the defendants were arraigned for trial and eminent counsel appointed to defend them. He cross-examined the witnesses, made exceptions, and evidently was careful to preserve a full and complete transcript of the proceedings. The trial was unusually short but there is nothing in the record to indicate that it was illegally hastened. November 3, 1919, the jury returned a verdict of "guilty"; November 11th the defendants were sentenced to be executed on December 27th; December 20th new counsel chosen by them or their friends moved for a new trial and supported the motion by affidavits of defendants and two other negroes who declared they testified falsely because of torture. This motion questioned the validity of the conviction upon the very grounds now advanced—torture, prejudice, mob domination, failure of counsel to protect interests, etc. * * *

A new trial having been denied, an appeal was granted to the State Supreme Court and 60 days allowed for preparing bill of exceptions; March 22, 1920, this appeal was argued orally and by briefs; March 29th the court announced its opinion, reviewed the proceedings and affirmed the judgment. Hicks v. State, 143 Ark. 158. A petition for rehearing was presented April 19th and overruled April 26th.

A petition for certiorari filed in this court May 24, 1920, with the record of proceedings in the state courts, set forth in detail the very grounds of complaint now before us. It was presented October 5th, denied October 11th, 1920.

April 29, 1921, the Governor directed execution of the defendants on June 10th. June 8th the chancery court of Pulaski county granted them a writ of habeas corpus; on June 20th the state Supreme Court held that the chancery court lacked jurisdiction and prohibited further proceedings. State v. Martineau, 149 Ark. 237. August 4th a justice of this court denied writ of error. Thereupon, the Governor fixed September 23d for execution. On September 21st the present habeas corpus proceeding began, and since then the matter has been in the courts. * * *

Under the disclosed circumstances I cannot agree that the solemn adjudications by courts of a great state, which this court has refused to review, can be successfully impeached by the mere ex parte affidavits made upon information and belief of ignorant convicts joined by two white men—confessedly atrocious criminals. The fact that petitioners are poor and ignorant and black naturally arouses sympathy; but that does not release us from enforcing principles which are essential to the orderly operation of our federal system.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Sutherland concurs in this dissent.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from an order of the District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas dismissing a writ of habeas corpus upon demurrer, the presiding judge certifying that there was probable cause for allowing the appeal. There were two cases originally, but by agreement they were consolidated into one. The appellants are five negroes who were convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to death by the Court of the State of Arkansas. The ground of the petition for the writ is that the proceedings in the State Court, although a trial in form, were only a form, and that the appellants were hurried to conviction under the pressure of a mob without any regard for their rights and without according to them due process of law.

The case stated by the petition is as follows, and it will be understood that while we put it in narrative form, we are not affirming the facts to be as stated but only what we must take them to be, as they are admitted by the demurrer: On the night of September 30, 1919, a number of colored people assembled in their church were attacked and fired upon by a body of white men, and in the disturbance that followed a white man was killed. The report of the killing caused great excitement and was followed by the hunting down and shooting of many negroes and also by the killing on October 1 of one Clinton Lee, a white man, for whose murder the petitioners were indicted. They seem to have been arrested with many others on the same day. The petitioners say that Lee must have been killed by other whites, but that, we leave on one side as what we have to deal with is not the petitioners' innocence or guilt but solely the question whether their constitutional rights have been preserved. They say that their meeting was to employ counsel for protection against extortions practiced upon them by the landowners and that the landowners tried to prevent their effort, but that again we pass by as not directly bearing upon the trial. It should be mentioned, however, that O. S. Bratton, a son of the counsel who is said to have been contemplated and who took part in the argument here, arriving for consultation on October 1, is said to have barely escaped being mobbed; that he was arrested and confined during the month on a charge of murder and on October 31 was indicted for barratry, but later in the day was told that he would be discharged but that he must leave secretly by a closed automobile to take the train at West Helena, four miles away, to avoid being mobbed. It is alleged that the judge of the Court in which the petitioners were tried facilitated the departure and went with Bratton to see him safely off.

A Committee of Seven was appointed by the Governor in regard to what the committee called the "insurrection" in the county. The newspapers daily published inflammatory articles. On the 7th a statement by one of the committee was made public to the effect that the present trouble was "a deliberately planned insurrection of the negroes against the whites, directed by an organization known as the 'Progressive Farmers' and 'Household Union of America' established for the purpose of banding negroes together for the killing of white people." According to the statement the organization was started by a swindler to get money from the blacks.

Shortly after the arrest of the petitioners a mob marched to the jail for the purpose of lynching them but were prevented by the presence of United States troops and the promise of some of the Committee of Seven and other leading officials that if the mob would refrain, as the petition puts it, they would execute those found guilty in the form of law. The Committee's own statement was that the reason that the people refrained from mob violence was "that this Committee gave our citizens their solemn promise that the law would be carried out." According to affidavits of two white men and the colored witnesses on whose testimony the petitioners were convicted, produced by the petitioners since the last decision of the Supreme Court hereafter mentioned, the Committee made good their promise by calling colored witnesses and having them whipped and tortured until they would say what was wanted, among them being the two relied on to prove the petitioners' guilt. However this may be, a grand jury of white men was organized on October 27 with one of the Committee of Seven and, it is alleged, with many of a posse organized to fight the blacks, upon it, and on the morning of the 29th the indictment was returned. On November 3 the petitioners were brought into Court, informed that a certain lawyer was appointed their counsel and were placed on trial before a white jury—blacks being systematically excluded from both grand and petit juries. The Court and neighborhood were thronged with an adverse crowd that threatened the most dangerous consequences to anyone interfering with the desired result. The counsel did not venture to demand delay or a change of venue, to challenge a juryman or to ask for separate trials. He had had no preliminary consultation with the accused, called no witnesses for the defence although they could have been produced, and did not put the defendants on the stand. The trial lasted about three-quarters of an hour and in less than five minutes the jury brought in a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree. According to the allegations and affidavits there never was a chance for the petitioners to be acquitted; no juryman could have voted for an acquittal and continued to live in Phillips County and if any prisoner by any chance had been acquitted by a jury he could not have escaped the mob.

The averments as to the prejudice by which the trial was environed have some corroboration in appeals to the Governor, about a year later, earnestly urging him not to interfere with the execution of the petitioners. One came from five members of the Committee of Seven, and stated in addition to what has been quoted heretofore that "all our citizens are of the opinion that the law should take its course." Another from a part of the American Legion protests against a contemplated commutation of the sentence of four of the petitioners and repeats that a "solemn promise was given by the leading citizens of the community that if the guilty parties were not lynched, and let the law take its course, that justice would be done and the majesty of the law upheld." A meeting of the Helena Rotary Club attended by members representing, as it said, seventy-five of the leading industrial and commercial enterprises of Helena, passed a resolution approving and supporting the action of the American Legion post. The Lions Club of Helena at a meeting attended by members said to represent sixty of the leading industrial and commercial enterprises of the city passed a resolution to the same effect. In May of the same year, a trial of six other negroes was coming on and it was represented to the Governor by the white citizens and officials of Phillips County that in all probability those negroes would be lynched. It is alleged that in order to appease the mob spirit and in a measure secure the safety of the six the Governor fixed the date for the execution of the petitioners at June 10, 1921, but that the execution was stayed by proceedings in Court; we presume the proceedings before the Chancellor to which we shall advert.

In Frank v. Mangum, 237 U. S. 309, 335, it was recognized of course that if in fact a trial is dominated by a mob so that there is an actual interference with the course of justice, there is a departure from due process of law; and that "if the state, supplying no corrective process, carries into execution a judgment of death or imprisonment based upon a verdict thus produced by mob domination, the state deprives the accused of his life or liberty without due process of law." We assume in accordance with that case that the corrective process supplied by the state may be so adequate that interference by habeas corpus ought not to be allowed. It certainly is true that mere mistakes of law in the course of a trial are not to be corrected in that way. But if the case is that the whole proceeding is a mask—that counsel, jury and judge were swept to the fatal end by an irresistible wave of public passion, and that the state courts failed to correct the wrong, neither perfection in the machinery for correction nor the possibility that the trial court and counsel saw no other way of avoiding an immediate outbreak of the mob can prevent this court from securing to the petitioners their constitutional rights.

In this case a motion for a new trial on the ground alleged in this petition was overruled and upon exceptions and appeal to the Supreme Court the judgment was affirmed. The Supreme Court said that the complaint of discrimination against petitioners by the exclusion of colored men from the jury came too late and by way of answer to the objection that no fair trial could be had in the circumstances, stated that it could not say "that this must necessarily have been the case"; that eminent counsel was appointed to defend the petitioners, that the trial was had according to law, the jury correctly charged, and the testimony legally sufficient. On June 8, 1921, two days before the date fixed for their execution, a petition for habeas corpus was presented to the Chancellor and he issued the writ and an injunction against the execution of the petitioners; but the Supreme Court of the state held that the Chancellor had no jurisdiction under the state law whatever might be the law of the United States. The present petition perhaps was suggested by the language of the court: "What the result would be of an application to a Federal Court we need not inquire." It was presented to the District Court on September 21. We shall not say more concerning the corrective process afforded to the petitioners than that it does not seem to us sufficient to allow a Judge of the United States to escape the duty of examining the facts for himself when if true as alleged they make the trial absolutely void. We have confined the statement to facts admitted by the demurrer. We will not say that they cannot be met, but it appears to us unavoidable that the District Judge should find whether the facts alleged are true and whether they can be explained so far as to leave the state proceedings undisturbed.

Order reversed. The case to stand for hearing before the District Court.

DUNN ET AL. v. LYONS, SHERIFF.

1928. Circuit Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit. 23 Fed. (2d) 14.

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Louisiana; Benjamin C. Dawkins, Judge.

Petition by Byron Dunn and W. Robert Dunn against J. Horace Lyons, Sheriff, for a writ of habeas corpus. From an order dismissing the petition, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Before Walker, Bryan and Foster, Circuit Judges.

Bryan, Circuit Judge. The District Judge dismissed upon demurrer the petition of appellants for writ of habeas corpus, but certified that in his opinion there was probable cause for an appeal. Appellants were convicted of murder in a state trial court of Louisiana. The judgment of conviction was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Louisiana (161 La. 532, 109 So. 56), and writ of error dismissed by the Supreme Court of the United States (273 U. S. 656, 744, 47 S. Ct. 344, 71 L. Ed. 825.[17] After that the state Supreme Court denied the writ of habeas corpus on a petition containing substantially the same averments of fact that we now have to consider.

The petition is based on the ground that the trial in the state court was one in form only and deprived appellants of their liberty without due process of law. It is alleged that the trial was dominated by an organization commonly known as the Ku Klux Klan; that the judge, the sheriff, the clerk, and at least one of the jurors were all members of that organization; that the person of whose murder appellants were convicted was a member thereof at the time of his death; that during the trial the courtroom was packed with its members; that the judge allowed one of them to sit with him on the bench, and to pay a fine imposed upon one of the attorneys, and failed to require another member to leave the witness room in order that appellants might have a private interview with their counsel. The petition contains other averments tending to support the general statement that this organization exerted its influence to impress upon the jury that a verdict of guilty would meet with popular approval.

It is not alleged that appellants did not have full knowledge of every matter now complained of, either before or during the trial, or at the time they submitted their motion for a new trial, or that they did not have full opportunity to present such matters on their appeal to the State Supreme Court. They did assign as error the overruling of their challenges for cause of certain jurors on the ground that they were members of the Ku Klux, and many other rulings of the trial court. All the rulings that were excepted to and assigned as error were considered and passed upon by the Supreme Court on that appeal. No objection was made to the qualifications or competency of the trial judge or any of the court officials. It is not suggested that counsel for the accused were intimidated by popular clamor or hostile sentiment, and that they fearlessly represented their clients affirmatively appears from the number and nature of exceptions reserved at the trial and presented for review on appeal. The Supreme Court entertained jurisdiction of the petition for a writ of habeas corpus, but declined to issue that writ on the grounds that all questions of law and fact that were reserved and presented had already been decided, and that the matters complained of in that petition for the first time should have been presented in the regular and appropriate way by proper bills of exceptions on the appeal from the judgment of conviction.

[17] This dismissal of the case when it was brought to the court on writ of error, Dunn v. Louisiana, was by memorandum opinion saying, "dismissed for want of substantial federal constitutional question," which seems to mean that the record disclosed no error constituting a denial of a federal constitutional right.—Editor.

Appellants contend that the state trial court lost jurisdiction on account of the influence and activities of the Ku Klux, and that this case is governed by Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U. S. 86, 43 S. Ct. 265, 67 L. Ed. 543. In the cited case it is said: * * * [The omitted quotation is the full paragraph beginning, "In Frank v. Mangum," ante, p. 595.]

It is thus established by these two leading Supreme Court cases that a writ of habeas corpus will not lie where the state supplies and its courts make available process adequate to correct errors committed during the trial of a case. In Ashe v. U. S. ex rel. Valotta, 270 U. S. 424, 46 S. Ct. 333, 70 L. Ed. 662, it is said that the regular administration of the criminal law of a state can only be attacked by collateral habeas corpus proceedings in "extraordinary cases where there is only the form of a court under the domination of a mob." Louisiana recognizes that motions for a new trial are reviewable on appeal, as sufficiently appears from the opinion of its Supreme Court that was rendered in reviewing the judgment of conviction of appellants. State v. Dunn, 161 La. 532, 597, 109 So. 56. It was open to appellants to attack the fitness and qualifications of the trial judge by taking exceptions during the trial, or by motion for a new trial after conviction. All the matters complained of here were reviewable by the Supreme Court. Many of them were in fact made the subject of review, and those that were not were not presented as they ought to have been in the regular way provided by law.

Finally, the judgment of the state trial court was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. It therefore is clear, not only that the state of Louisiana affords adequate corrective process, but that such process was made available to appellants in the state Supreme Court.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

HEBERT v. STATE OF LOUISIANA.

1926. Supreme Court of the United States. 272 U. S. 312.

Mr. Justice Van Devanter delivered the opinion of the court.

The State of Louisiana, like the United States, has a statute making it a criminal offense to manufacture intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes. A judgment of the Supreme Court of the State affirming a conviction under this statute, 158 La. 209, is presented for review by this writ of error. * * *

The accused also assign error on a ruling respecting the maximum period of imprisonment admissible under the state law. Two statutes were involved. The accused took the position that one was special and excluded the other. But the trial court rejected that view, construed the statutes as intended to be taken together, and as a result imposed a more burdensome sentence than was named in the statute which the accused thought controlling. The Supreme Court sustained that construction, and the accused contend here, as they did in that court, that the construction was wrong and, being wrong, operated as a denial of due process of law in the sense of the Fourteenth Amendment. The contention must be overruled. Whether state statutes shall be construed one way or another is a state question, the final decision of which rests with the courts of the state. The due process of law clause in the Fourteenth Amendment does not take up the statutes of the several states and make them the test of what it requires; nor does it enable this court to revise the decisions of the state courts on questions of state law. What it does require is that state action, whether through one agency or another, shall be consistent with the fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions and not infrequently are designated as "law of the land." Those principles are applicable alike in all the states and do not depend upon or vary with local legislation. Castillo v. McConnico, 168 U. S. 674, 682-683; West v. Louisiana, 194 U. S. 258, 261-263; Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U. S. 454, 459; Pullman Co. v. Knott, 235 U. S. 23, 25; Enterprise Irrigation District v. Farmers Mutual Canal Co., 243 U. S. 157, 166. The Supreme Court of the state having held that the two statutes must be taken together in determining the penalty intended we must accept that conclusion as if written into the statutes themselves. Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 73. All that would be open in this court under the due process clause is whether the state had power to impose the penalty fixed by the statutes as thus construed. Rawlins v. Georgia, 201 U. S. 638, 640. That the state had such power is not questioned, but only that the statutes rightly construed show that the power has been exercised.

On this question, as we have said, the decision of the Supreme Court of the state is controlling.

Judgment affirmed.

AMERICAN RAILWAY EXPRESS COMPANY v. COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

1927. Supreme Court of the United States. 273 U. S. 269.

MR. JUSTICE MCREYNOLDS delivered the opinion of the court.

Without opinion the Kentucky Court of Appeals affirmed a judgment by the Harlan Circuit Court against petitioner and in favor of the Commonwealth for the aggregate sum of forty-four judgments against the Adams Express Company theretofore granted on account of alleged defaults during 1916.

The Adams Company is a "joint stock association," organized under the laws of New York. For many years it operated as a common carrier of goods in Kentucky and other states and owned therein valuable property essential to the conduct of this business. In Kentucky it owned no other property.

The petitioner is a Delaware corporation, organized under an agreement of the interested parties for the purpose of taking over the business and operating property of all the principal express companies of the country by issuing stock to the several owners. Directly after its organization, and on July 1, 1918, it acquired the entire express business and all property connected therewith of the Adams Company and issued therefor several million dollars of its capital stock. (Like transfers were made by the other express companies.) The seller immediately ceased to operate in Kentucky and the purchaser continued the business. Neither company made any provision for paying the outstanding obligations of the Adams Company contracted in Kentucky; but the latter held in its treasury at New York the stock received from the purchaser, possessed other valuable property located there, and was solvent.

Respondent claimed that petitioner became liable for unsatisfied obligations of the Adams Company. After a full and fair hearing upon pleadings and proof, the Court of Appeals sustained this theory but assigned no reason. That court, it is said, determined the same issues as here presented in American Railway Express Co. v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 190 Ky. 636, and supported the judgment by an elaborate opinion. But the record now before us fails to show any reference whatever to that opinion when the present cause was decided.

The petition for certiorari affirmed that the cause involved the following questions of constitutional law and because of them asked a review. We go no further than their consideration requires.

(1) Whether it is a lack of due process of law for the Kentucky Court to deprive the petitioner of its property on the following assumptions which are unsupported by the record and contrary to fact; (a) that the Adams Express Company is a corporation; (b) that the State of Kentucky was a creditor of the Adams Express Company on June 30, 1918; (c) that the stock issued to the Adams Express Company was distributed by it among its shareholders.

(2) Whether petitioner is denied the equal protection of the laws by a decision of a state court which holds that a corporation which pays cash for property is a holder for value, but that a corporation which issues less than a controlling interest of its own stock for property is a donee, and takes such property subject to existing claims of the vendor's creditors.

(3) Whether it is lack of due process for the state of Kentucky to enforce a rule that a bona fide purchaser for value of all the Kentucky property of a solvent vendor is liable to Kentucky creditors of the vendor to the extent of the value of the property acquired.

(4) Whether a decision of a state court which is contrary to the common law, and justifiable only as an exercise of the state's police power, can be retroactively applied to affect vested rights.

The grounds upon which the Court of Appeals rested its judgment are not revealed—there was no opinion. Consequently, petitioner's argument which rests upon alleged assumptions is impertinent.

The record discloses no ruling that a corporation which pays cash for property holds for value, but if property is acquired by issuing less than a controlling interest of stock it takes subject to claims of the seller's creditors.

As there was no controlling statute the state court necessarily determined the rights and liabilities of the parties under the general rules of jurisprudence which it deemed part of the law of Kentucky and applicable in the circumstances. It went no further. No earlier opinion was overruled or qualified and no rule was given any retroactive effect. Save in exceptional circumstances not now present we must accept as controlling the decision of the state courts upon questions of local law, both statutory and common. "The due process clause does not take up the laws of the several states and make all questions pertaining to them constitutional questions, nor does it enable this court to revise the decisions of the state courts upon questions of state law." Enterprise Irrigation District v. Farmers Mutual Canal Co., 243 U. S. 157, 165, 166.

The Kentucky court had jurisdiction and has determined only that under common law principles in the peculiar circumstances above narrated, where the facts were or might have been known to the purchasing corporation, it became liable for claims against the vendor resulting from transactions within the state. The action of the court followed a fair hearing, and there is no pretense that the challenged views were adopted in order to evade a constitutional issue. We cannot interfere unless the judgment amounts to mere arbitrary or capricious[18] exercise of power or is in clear conflict with those fundamental "principles which have been established in our systems of jurisprudence for the protection and enforcement of private rights." Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 733; Booth v. Illinois, 184 U. S. 425, 429; Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U. S. 312, 329.

It is firmly established that a merely erroneous decision given by a state court in the regular course of judicial proceedings does not deprive the unsuccessful party of property without due process of law. Arrowsmith v. Harmoning, 118 U. S. 194, 195; Iowa Central Ry. Co. v. Iowa, 160 U. S. 389, 393; Tracy v. Ginsberg, 205 U. S. 170, 177; Bonner v. Gorman, 213 U. S. 86, 91; McDonald v. Oregon R. R. & Nav. Co., 233 U. S. 665, 669.[19]

Considering the circumstances disclosed by the record, there was nothing arbitrary or obviously contrary to the fundamental principles of justice in requiring the petitioner, organized for the purposes shown, to satisfy claims against the Adams Company which arose out of business within the state. The transfer of all the latter's property located in the state materially interfered with the ability of Kentucky creditors to enforce their claims, and, as to them, might have been declared fraudulent. It seems clear that the state, without conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment, might have enacted through its legislative department a statute of precisely the same effect as the rule of law and public policy declared by the Court of Appeals, and its decision is just as valid as such a statute would have been. Prudential Insurance Co. v. Cheek, 259 U. S. 530, 548. * * *

[18] Consider these other vague dicta or vague implications of similar import: "Whenever a wrong judgment is entered against a defendant his property is taken when it should not have been, but whatever the ground may be, if the mistake is not so gross as to be impossible in a rational administration of justice, it is no more than the imperfection of man, not a denial of constitutional rights." Holmes, J., in Chicago Life Ins. Co. v. Cherry (1917) 244 U. S. 25, 30, 61 L. ed. 966.

"Due process implies a tribunal both impartial and mentally competent to afford a hearing." Holmes, J., in Jordan v. Massachusetts (1912) 225 U. S. 167, 176, 56 L. ed. 1038.

[19] "In general the decision of a [state] court upon a question of law, however wrong and however contrary to previous decisions, is not an infraction of the Fourteenth Amendment merely because it is wrong or because earlier decisions are reversed." Holmes, J., in Patterson v. Colorado (1907) 205 U. S. 454, 461, 51 L. ed. 879, 10 Ann. Cas. 689.

"When the parties have been fully heard in the regular course of judicial proceedings, an erroneous decision of a state court does not deprive the unsuccessful party of his property without due process of law." Gray, J., in Central Land Co. v. Laidley (1895) 159 U. S. 103, 112, 40 L. ed. 91. Does this mean that it is with due process that the deprival is made?

"The vice which underlies the entire argument of the plaintiff in error arises from a failure to distinguish between the essentials of due process of law under the Fourteenth Amendment, and matters which may or may not be essential under the terms of a state assessing or taxing law. The two are neither correlative or coterminous. The first, due process of law, must be found in the state statute, and cannot be departed from without violating the Constitution of the United States. The other depends on the lawmaking power of the state, and, as it is solely the result of such authority, may vary or change as the legislative will of the state sees fit to ordain. It follows that, to determine the existence of the one, due process of law, is the final province of this court, whilst the ascertainment of the other, that is, what is merely essential under the state statute, is a state question within the final jurisdiction of courts of last resort of the several states. When, then, a state court decides that a particular formality was or was not essential under the state statute, such decision presents no federal question, providing always the statute as thus construed does not violate the Constitution of the United States, by depriving of property without due process of law. This paramount requirement being fulfilled, as to other matters the state interpretation of its own law is controlling and decisive." White, J., in Castillo v. McConnico (1898) 168 U. S. 674, 683, 42 L. ed. 622.

The judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

Section 2.—As a Standard of Validity of the Substance or Purpose of Legislation.

"Despite arguments to the contrary which had seemed to me persuasive, it is settled that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment applies to matters of substantive law[1] as well as to

[1] To inquire into the origin, development and present working of this remarkable doctrine is the purpose of this section.

The three pre-Fourteenth Amendment New York cases printed in this section have been selected because they are substantially the only state court decisions of that period that subsumed under a due process clause "implied" limitations on the substance of legislation. Commonwealth v. Alger was the leading case in giving "police power" a description widely followed. Is the chief significance of that case found in the apparent assumption of the court that some apology must be found for discovering that the powers of a legislature are extensive? Yet, not too extensive? Limits are assumed, though not definitely disclosed in the opinion. It has been supposed that Chief Justice Shaw's thinking may have been influenced by the peculiar terms in which the constitution of Massachusetts made one of its grants of power to the legislature: "to make, ordain and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes and ordinances * * * ; so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this Commonwealth * * * ." (Professor Thayer traced these words, with slight variation, to the Provincial Charter of 1691. Cases on Constitutional Law, p. 386.) Was there an implication that the legislature should not pass unreasonable laws? If read fully, however, the passage seems to make the legislators judges of the reasonableness of their enactments. It seems more probable that Chief Justice Shaw merely shared the view common to judges elsewhere that there were limitations to be found outside of the expressions of the constitution. It should be noted that he, like most other judges of the period, did not assert that such limitations were to be found in the law of the land clause, the form that the due process clause took in the Massachusetts constitution. It also should be noted that the grant of legislative powers made in other state constitutions was expressed in no such limiting phraseology.

The United States Supreme Court cases following the state cases are arranged in the main in chronological order and include all the instances from the first, in 1857, through the period of forty years thereafter, in which consideration was matters of procedure." Mr. Justice Brandeis, in Whitney v. California (1927) 274 U. S. 357, 373, 71 L. ed. 1095.

TAYLOR v. PORTER & FORD.

1843. Supreme Court of the State of New York. 2 Hill 140.

Trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's close at Milton, in the county of Saratoga, on the 1st of May, 1841, and on divers other days and times etc., and digging up, subverting and carrying away the earth and soil, and breaking down, prostrating and destroying the plaintiff's fence; and also for making and laying out a private road through and over the plaintiff's close, whereby he was prevented from having the use, benefit and enjoyment thereof, to the damage, etc. [The defendant justified his acts as strictly in accordance with a New York statute and the issue was whether this statute was in conflict with the state constitution. The opening paragraph of the opinion is a statement of the provisions of the statute.]

Bronson, J. Every person liable to be assessed for highway labor, may apply to the commissioners of highways of the town in which he resides to lay out a road. Whenever application is made to the commissioners for a private road, they are to summon twelve freeholders of the town to meet on a day certain, of which notice must be given to the owner or occupant of the land through which it is proposed to lay out the road. The freeholders, when met and sworn, are to view the lands through which the road is applied for, and if they determine that the road is necessary, they are to make and subscribe a certificate in writing to that effect, and the commissioners are required thereupon to lay out the road, and cause a record of it to be made in the town clerk's office. The given to due process clauses as limitations on the substance of legislation. Nothing throws more light on this doctrine than does its history. For instance, would the issue decided in Munn v. Illinois in 1877 have been decided the same way if it had come before the court for the first time in 1927? The chronological order is departed from by the insertion of cases intended to conclude the study of the due process limitation as a protection to "property," before consideration of it as a protection to "liberty," which begins at page 732, post. Also some cases are inserted out of chronological order in order to compare recent holdings with earlier ones. The section has not formally been broken into subsections under the titles "property" and "liberty" for fear that an undue emphasis might thereby be given to those vague and overlapping concepts.

The bulk of the section consists of relatively recent cases. No attempt has been made to catalog the numerous applications which have been made to almost every conceivable subject matter. The disposition made of some of the most outstanding issues is deemed adequate to show the nature and operation of the doctrine in action at the present time.

damages of the owner of the land through which the road is laid, if not adjusted by agreement, are to be assessed by a jury of six freeholders of some other town, and are to be paid by the person applying for the road. "Every such private road, when so laid out, shall be for the use of such applicant, his heirs and assigns; but not to be converted to any other use or purpose than that of a road. Nor shall the occupant or owner of the land through which such road shall be laid out, be permitted to use the same as a road, unless he shall have signified his intention of so making use of the same, to the jury or commissioners who ascertained the damages sustained by laying out such road, and before such damages were so ascertained." (1 R. S. 513, §§ 54, 77-79.) The road is paid for and owned by the applicant. The public has no title to, nor interest in it. No citizen has a right to use the road as he does the public highway. He can only use it when he has business with the road owner, or some other lawful occasion for going to the land intended to be benefited by the road. He can only justify an entry on the road, when he could justify an entry on the land on account of which the road was laid out. Even the owner of the land over which the road passes, unless he has given notice of such an intention before the damages are assessed, has no right to use the road for his own purposes; and if he does so, or if his fences encroach upon the road, the owner of the road may have an action against him. (Lambert v. Hoke, 14 John. 383; Herrick v. Stover, 5 Wend. 580.) In short, the road is the private property of the applicant. In the words of the statute, the road "shall be for the use of such applicant, his heirs and assigns."

This right of way is an incorporeal hereditament, in which the owner has an estate of inheritance. The owner of the land over which the road is laid has not lost the entire fee, but he has lost the beneficial use and enjoyment of his property forever. It is not, however, material to enquire what quantum of interest has passed from him. It is enough that some interest—some portion of his estate, no matter how small—has been taken from him without his consent. The property of A. is taken, without his permission, and transferred to B. Can such a thing be rightfully done? Has the legislature any power to say it may be done?

I will not stop to enquire whether the damages must not be paid before the title will pass. The difficulty lies deeper than that. Whatever sum may be tendered, or however ample may be the provision for compensation, the question still remains, can the legislature compel any man to sell his land or his goods, or any interest in them, to his neighbor, when the property is not to be applied to public use? Or, must it be left to the owner to say, when, to whom, and upon what terms he will part with his property, or whether he will part with it at all?

The right to take private property for public purposes is one of the inherent attributes of sovereignty, and exists in every independent government. Private interests must yield to public necessity. But even this right of eminent domain cannot be exercised without making just compensation to the owner of the property. (Const. Art. 7, § 6.) And thus, what would otherwise be a burden upon a single individual, has been made to fall equally upon every member of the state. But there is no provision in the constitution that just compensation shall be made to the owner when his property is taken for private purposes; and if the power exists to take the property of one man without his consent and transfer it to another, it may be exercised without any reference to the question of compensation. The power of making bargains for individuals has not been delegated to any branch of the government, and if the title of A. can, without his fault, be transferred to B., it may as well be done without as with a consideration. This view of the question is sufficient to put us upon the enquiry, where can the power be found to pass such a law as that under which the defendants attempt to justify their entry upon the plaintiff's land? It is not to be presumed that such a power exists, and those who set it up should tell where it may be found.

Under our form of government the legislature is not supreme. It is only one of the organs of that absolute sovereignty which resides in the whole body of the people. Like other departments of the government, it can only exercise such powers as have been delegated to it; and when it steps beyond that boundary, its acts, like those of the most humble magistrate in the state who transcends his jurisdiction, are utterly void. Where, then, shall we find a delegation of power to the legislature to take the property of A. and give it to B., either with or without compensation? Only one clause of the constitution can be cited in support of the power, and that is the first section of the first article, where the people have declared that "the legislative power of this state shall be vested in a senate and assembly." It is readily admitted that the two houses, subject only to the qualified negative of the governor, possess all "the legislative power of this state;" but the question immediately presents itself, what is that "legislative power," and how far does it extend? Does it reach the life, liberty or property of a citizen who is not charged with a transgression of the laws, and when the sacrifice is not demanded by a just regard for the public welfare? In Wilkinson v. Leland, (2 Peters, 657,) Mr. Justice Story says: "The fundamental maxims of a free government seem to require that the rights of personal liberty and private property should be held sacred. At least, no court of justice in this country should be warranted in assuming that the power to violate and disregard them—a power so repugnant to the common principles of justice and civil liberty —lurked under any general grant of legislative authority, or ought to be implied from any general expressions of the will of the people. The people ought not to be presumed to part with rights so vital to their security and well being, without very strong and direct expressions of such an intention." He added: "We know of no case in which a legislative act to transfer the property of A. to B. without his consent, has ever been held a constitutional exercise of legislative power in any state in the union. On the contrary, it has been constantly resisted as inconsistent with just principles, by every judicial tribunal in which it has been attempted to be enforced." (See also 2 Kent's Com. 13, 340, and cases there cited.) The security of life, liberty and property, lies at the foundation of the social compact; and to say that this grant of "legislative power" includes the right to attack private property, is equivalent to saying that the people have delegated to their servants the power of defeating one of the great ends for which the government was established. If there was not one word of qualification in the whole instrument, I should feel great difficulty in bringing myself to the conclusion that the clause under consideration had clothed the legislature with despotic power; and such is the extent of their authority if they can take the property of A., either with or without compensation, and give it to B. "The legislative power of this state" does not reach to such an unwarrantable extent. Neither life, liberty nor property, except when forfeited by crime, or when the latter is taken for public use, falls within the scope of the power. Such, at least, are my present impressions.

But the question does not necessarily turn on the section granting legislative power. The people have added negative words, which should put the matter at rest. "No member of this state shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to any citizen thereof, unless by the law of the land, or the judgment of his peers." (Const. Art. 7, § 1.) The words "by the law of the land," as here used, do not mean a statute passed for the purpose of working the wrong. That construction would render the restriction absolutely nugatory, and turn this part of the constitution into mere nonsense. The people would be made to say to the two houses, "You shall be vested with 'the legislative power of the state;' but no one 'shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of the rights or privileges' of a citizen, unless you pass a statute for that purpose:" in other words, "You shall not do the wrong, unless you choose to do it." The section was taken with some modifications from a part of the 29th chapter of Magna Charta, which provided, that no freeman should be taken, or imprisoned, or be disseised of his freehold etc., but by lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. Lord Coke in his commentary upon this statute says, that these words, "by the law of the land," mean "by the due course and process of law;" which he afterwards explains to be, "by indictment or presentment of good and lawful men, where such deeds be done in due manner, or by writ original of the common law." (2 Inst. 45, 50.) In North Carolina and Tennessee, where they have copied almost literally this part of the 29th chapter of Magna Charta, the terms "law of the land" have received the same construction. (Hoke v. Henderson, 4 Dev. 1; Jones v. Perry, 10 Yerger, 59; and see 3 Story on Const. U. S. 661; 2 Kent's Com. 13.) The meaning of the section then seems to be, that no member of the state shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of his rights or privileges, unless the matter shall be adjudged against him upon trial had according to the course of the common law. It must be ascertained judicially that he has forfeited his privileges, or that some one else has a superior title to the property he possesses, before either of them can be taken from him. It cannot be done by mere legislation.

But if there can be a doubt upon the first section of the seventh article, there can, I think, be none that the seventh section of the same article covers the case. "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." In the matter of Albany-Street, (11 Wend. 149,) where it was held that private property could not be taken for any other than public use, Chief Justice Savage went mainly upon the implication contained in the last member of the clause just cited. He said: "The constitution, by authorizing the appropriation of private property to public use, impliedly declares, that for any other use, private property shall not be taken from one and applied to the private use of another." And in Bloodgood v. The Mohawk & Hudson Rail Road Co. (18 Wend. 59,) Mr. Senator Tracy said, the words should be construed "as equivalent to a constitutional declaration, that private property, without the consent of the owner, shall be taken only for the public use, and then only upon a just compensation." I feel no disposition to question the soundness of these views: but still it seems to me that the case stands stronger upon the first member of the clause: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law." The words "due process of law," in this place, cannot mean less than a prosecution or suit instituted and conducted according to the prescribed forms and solemnities for ascertaining guilt, or determining the title to property. It will be seen that the same measure of protection against legislative encroachment is extended to life, liberty and property; and if the latter can be taken without a forensic trial and judgment, there is no security for the others. If the legislature can take the property of A. and transfer it to B., they can take A. himself, and either shut him up in prison, or put him to death. But none of these things can be done by mere legislation. There must be "due process of law." Perhaps the whole clause should be read together, (Matter of John and Cherry Streets, 19 Wend. 659,) and then if it do not, as I have supposed, amount to a direct prohibition against taking the property of one and giving it to another, it contains, at the least, an implication too strong to be resisted that such an act cannot be done. * * *

Cowen, J., concurred.

Nelson, Ch. J., dissenting. * * * There can be no doubt, the universal opinion heretofore has been, that the law authorizing the laying out of private roads stands upon the same principle with the law in respect to highways; and that all these improvements, if not equally necessary, are at least so much a matter of public concern as to justify the full exercise of the right of eminent domain.

I will add, if the government of this state does not possess the power of authorizing the laying out of private roads, it is probably the only state government in the union to which the power has been denied; and I may probably say, the only government in the world.

COMMONWEALTH v. ALGER.

1851. Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. 7 Cush. 53.

[The defendant was convicted for violation of statutes forbidding the building of wharves beyond harbor lines established by one of the statutes. By the agreed statement of facts the defendant built his wharf on his own flatland, not beyond low water-mark, and although it extended beyond the statutory line, it did not interfere with navigation. The case was reserved for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court on questions of law.]

Shaw, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court. * * *

Assuming, then, that the defendant was owner in fee of the soil and flats upon which the wharf in question was built, it becomes necessary to inquire whether it was competent for the legislature to pass the Acts establishing the harbor lines, and what is the legal validity and effect of those Acts. * * *

The manifest object of these statutes is to prevent injurious obstructions in the harbor of Boston, and to secure the free, common, and unobstructed use thereof, for the citizens of the Commonwealth, and all other persons, for navigation with ships, boats, and vessels of all kinds, as a common and public right. If this can be done, without an unwarrantable encroachment on the rights of private property, it is an object of great importance, and one in which the holders of riparian rights, as well as all other holders of real estate, and the whole community, have a deep and abiding interest.

We think it is a settled principle, growing out of the nature of well-ordered civil society, that every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it may be so regulated, that it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others, having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community. All property in this Commonwealth, as well that in the interior as that bordering on tide-waters, is derived directly or indirectly from the government, and held subject to those general regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare. Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment, as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law, as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient.

This is very different from the right of eminent domain, the right of a government to take and appropriate private property to public use, whenever the public exigency requires it; which can be done only on condition of providing a reasonable compensation therefor. The power we allude to is rather the police power, the power vested in the legislature by the Constitution, to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes, and ordinances, either with penalties or without, not repugnant to the Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the Commonwealth and of the subjects of the same.

It is much easier to perceive and realize the existence and sources of this power, than to mark its boundaries, or prescribe limits to its exercise. There are many cases in which such a power is exercised by all well-ordered governments, and where its fitness is so obvious, that all well-regulated minds will regard it as reasonable. Such are the laws to prohibit the use of warehouses for the storage of gunpowder near habitations or highways; to restrain the height to which wooden buildings may be erected in populous neighborhoods, and require them to be covered with slate or other incombustible material; to prohibit buildings from being used for hospitals for contagious diseases, or for the carrying on of noxious or offensive trades; to prohibit the raising of a dam, and causing stagnant water to spread over meadows, near inhabited villages, thereby raising noxious exhalations, injurious to health and dangerous to life.

Nor does the prohibition of such noxious use of property, a prohibition imposed because such use would be injurious to the public, although it may diminish the profits of the owner, make it an appropriation to a public use, so as to entitle the owner to compensation. If the owner of a vacant lot in the midst of a city could erect thereon a great wooden building, and cover it with shingles, he might obtain a larger profit of his land, than if obliged to build of stone or brick, with a slated roof. If the owner of a warehouse in a cluster of other buildings could store quantities of gunpowder in it for himself and others, he might be saved the great expense of transportation. If a landlord could let his building for a small-pox hospital, or a slaughter-house, he might obtain an increased rent. But he is restrained; not because the public have occasion to make the like use, or to make any use of the property, or to take any benefit or profit to themselves from it; but because it would be a noxious use, contrary to the maxim, Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lædas. It is not an appropriation of the property to a public use, but the restraint of an injurious private use by the owner, and is therefore not within the principle of property taken under the right of eminent domain. The distinction, we think, is manifest in principle, although the facts and circumstances of different cases are so various, that it is often difficult to decide whether a particular exercise of legislation is properly attributable to the one or the other of these two acknowledged powers. * * *

And so in the exercise of the more general power of government, so to restrain the injurious use of property, it seems to apply more significantly and more directly to real estate thus situated on the sea-shore, separating the upland from the sea, to which the public have a common and acknowledged right, so that such estate should be held subject to somewhat more restrictive regulations in its use, than interior and upland estate remote from places in which the public have a common right. The circumstances are different. In respect to land lying in the interior, and used for agricultural purposes, there is little occasion to impose any restraint upon the absolute dominion of the owner, because such restraint is not necessary to prevent it from being injurious. But the circumstances are entirely different in regard to the sea-shore, which lies between the sea, admitted to be common to all, and the use of which is of vast importance to the public, and ports and places, without access to which, the use of the sea for navigation would be of little value.

Wherever there is a general right on the part of the public, and a general duty on the part of a land-owner, or any other person, to respect such rights, we think it is competent for the legislature, by a specific enactment, to prescribe a precise, practical rule for declaring, establishing, and securing such right, and enforcing respect for it. It may be said in general terms, independently of any positive enactment, that it is the right of society, in the midst of a populous settlement, to be exempt from the proximity of dangerous and noxious trades; and that it is the duty of the owner of real estate, in the midst of many habitations, to abstain from erecting buildings thereon, or otherwise using it, for carrying on a trade dangerous to the lives, health, or comfort of the inhabitants of such dwellings; although a trade in itself useful and beneficial to the public. But such general duty and obligation not being fixed by a rule precise enough for practical purposes, we think it is competent for the legislature to interpose, and by a specific enactment to declare what shall be deemed a dangerous or noxious trade, under what circumstances and within what distance of habitations it may or shall not be set up, how the use of it shall be regulated, and to prohibit any other than such regulated use, by specific penalties.

But in reference to the present case, and to the Act of the Legislature, establishing lines in the harbor, beyond which private proprietors are prohibited from building wharves, it is urged that such a restraint upon the estate of an individual, debarring him to some extent from the most beneficial use of it, is in effect taking his estate. If such restraint were in fact imposed upon the estate of one proprietor only, out of several estates on the same line of shore, the objection would be much more formidable. But we are to consider the subject-matter, to which such restraint applies. The value of this species of estate, that of shore and flats, consists mainly in the means it affords of building wharves from the upland towards deep water, to place merchandise and build wharves upon, and principally to afford access, to vessels requiring considerable depth of water, from the sea to suitable landings. Now, if along a shore where there are flats of considerable extent, one were restrained to a certain length, whilst others were allowed to extend further, the damage might be great. So if one were allowed to extend, and the coterminous proprietors adjacent were restrained, it would be obviously more injurious. The one extended would stop or check the current along the others, cause mud to accumulate near them, and thus render the water shoal at those wharves. But where all are permitted to extend alike, and all are restrained alike, by a line judiciously adapted to the course of the current, so that all have the benefit of access to their wharves, with the same depth of water, and the same strength of current at their heads, the damage must be comparatively less.

But of this the legislature must judge. Having once come to the conclusion that a case exists, in which it is competent for the legislature to make a law on the subject, it is for them, under a high sense of duty to the public and to individuals, with a sacred regard to the rights of property and all other private rights, to make such reasonable regulations as they may judge necessary to protect public and private rights, and to impose no larger restraints upon the use and enjoyment of private property, than are in their judgment strictly necessary to preserve and protect the rights of others. * * *

In regard to the other suggestion, that it is found by the case that the particular wharf of Mr. Alger did not obstruct or impede navigation, it is proper to say, that if we are right in principle, we are bound to hold that this circumstance can afford no defence. A consideration of this fact illustrates the principles we have been discussing. The reason why it is necessary to have a certain and authoritative law, is shown by the difficulty, not to say impracticability, of inquiring and deciding as a fact, in each particular case, whether a certain erection in tide-water is a nuisance at common law or not; and when ascertained and adjudged, it affords no rule for any other case, and can have little effect in maintaining and protecting the acknowledged public right. It is this consideration (the expediency and necessity of defining and securing the rights of the public), which creates the exigency, and furnishes the legislature with the authority to make a general and precise law; but when made, because it was just and expedient, and because it is law, it becomes the duty of every person to obey it and comply with it. The question under the statute therefore is, not whether any wharf, built after the statute was made and promulgated, was an actual obstruction to navigation, but whether it was within the prohibited limit.

On the whole, the court are of opinion that the Act fixing a line within the harbor of Boston, beyond which no riparian proprietor should erect a wharf or other permanent structure, although to some extent it prohibited him from building such structure on flats of which he owned the fee, was a constitutional law, and one which it was competent for the legislature to make; that it was binding on the defendant, and rendered him obnoxious to its penalties, if he violated its provisions.

"Police" in the current sense of policeman came into common use in England only after 1829 when the first London police force was established supplanting or supplementing the former watchmen. English writers of the 18th century and earlier used it in senses more closely resembling its original Greek sense of state and government, just as the word "policy" (derived from the same source through the Latin politia) was then used. Thus an English writer said in 1612, "French Pollicie consists of Three Estates, the Princes, Nobles, Commons." To say that the root Greek word polis meant "city" is misleading unless it is remembered that Greek cities were states. The more usual use of "police" (a form derived through the French) in England during the 18th century and the first quarter of the 19th is, administering the affairs of people by organized government; regulation, discipline and control of a community. Thus, Swift wrote in 1761, "Nothing is held more commendable in all great cities * * * than what the French call the police; by which word is meant the government thereof." Erskine, Inst. Laws of Scotl. (1773) II, 714: "Offences against the laws enacted for the police or good government of a country are truly crimes against the state." Blackstone (1769) Comm. Bk. IV, Ch. 13, 162: "By the public policy and economy, I mean the due regulation and domestic order of the Kingdom."

The later narrowing of the sense is seen in: Brougham (1844) Brit. Const. XIX (ed. 1862) 324: "By police is properly meant the care of preventing infractions of the law, detecting offenders, bringing them to justice." The above extracts are from Murray's English Dictionary.

Marshall used the word in the broader sense of regulating all kinds of conduct, thus, in Gibbons v. Ogden (1824) 9 Wheat. 1, 208: "The acknowledged power of a state to regulate its police, its domestic trade, and to govern its own citizens" * * *. Also, in the same case, discussing, without deciding, whether a state has some power to regulate acts of foreign or interstate commerce, which occur within the state, Marshall said: "Since, however, in exercising the power of regulating their own purely internal affairs, whether of trading or police, the states may sometimes enact laws, the validity of which depends on their interfering with, and being contrary to, an act of Congress passed in pursuance of the Constitution, the court will enter upon the inquiry, whether the laws of New York, as expounded by the highest tribunal of that state, have, in their application to this case, come into collision with an act of Congress, and deprived a citizen of a right to which that act entitles him. Should this collision exist, it will be immaterial whether those laws were passed in virtue of a concurrent power 'to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states,' or, in virtue of a power to regulate their domestic trade and police. In one case and the other, the acts of New York must yield to the law of Congress; * * *." pp. 209-210.

It is easy to describe "police power" as power regulatory or prohibitory of individual conduct. It is a different matter to define the scope of a state's police power under the Constitution of the United States. Numerous and somewhat conflicting generalizations may be found in the opinions of judges. These occur in cases where the question is whether the Fourteenth Amendment diminished the powers of the states, or whether the prohibition that a state shall not pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, or the grant to Congress of power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, deprived the states of power which they would have had if these provisions were not in the Constitution. Of course, if the present police power of a state is merely the residuum of regulatory and prohibitory power, the residuum possessed after the subtractions made by all federal constitutional limitations are accounted for, it seems that the concept is of little aid in determining the scope of one of the limitations. You have a single, simple equation containing two unknown quantities.

The assertion that a given act, regulation or command, by a state is within its police power (authority) is a conclusion and not a premise. (In fact it is two conclusions: (1) that it is within the scope of the state's powers, (2) that it is "police power.") A person unconscious that he does not know the scope of a state's police power may assume that he is reasoning when he says that a given regulation put forth by a state is within its police power therefore the constitutional limitation in question is not to be interpreted as depriving the state of power to make the regulation. He is not conscious that he is dealing with two unknowns; that he will know either one only when he settles the limits of the other,—or rather that an authoritative answer to the question, is this specific regulation permissible, simultaneously makes both the unknowns known to that extent. May a state validly regulate employers and employees by prescribing a minimum wage to be paid the employee? This in fact would be a regulation. It is one which a legislature might believe would promote human welfare. It is the sort of thing which causes us to think of "police power." If the court of last resort says the regulation is valid, we then know something of the scope of the police power and something of the scope of the restriction which the Fourteenth Amendment puts upon the states. If the court of last resort holds that the regulation is invalid, we discover that the state's police power is less and that the quantity of the restriction of the Fourteenth Amendment is greater.

Of course Congress also has police power. It may "police" (regulate) the conduct which constitutes the carrying on of foreign and interstate commerce. It may forbid persons to carry lottery tickets from state to state, or transportation of women from state to state for immoral purposes, or require safety devices on trains that operate on tracks over which interstate commerce is carried on. The power to pass a bankruptcy law is a police power. Under it Congress provides for the discharge of creditor's claims without full payment. It is supposed that economic welfare is promoted by giving debtors a fresh start. Congress may to some extent legislate to prevent fraud, e. g., so far as this can be accomplished by "punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States" Const. Art. I, Sec. 8, Cl. 6, or so far as frauds may be prevented by prohibiting the use of the mails for fraudulent purposes. Art. I, Sec. 8, Cl. 7. In those areas in which Congress is the sole governing authority its police power is as full as is that of a state government, even fuller. In the state areas, since the legislative power of the national government is restricted to specified subject matters, its police power is likewise restricted to those same matters. Quite otherwise is it with a state, whose authority extends to all subject matters in the state not excepted by the grants to the national government. May the people of a state in governing themselves as to this wide range of subject matters regulate or prohibit conduct or impose duties or liabilities without limit? Is the "police power" of a state unlimited as to these subject matters? These several statements are made dogmatically in form,—without citation of authority—to challenge contradiction or verification by the student as he proceeds.—Editor.

"This statute passed in the exercise of that particular authority called the police power, the limitations of which no court has yet undertaken to precisely define * * *." Day, J., in Coppage v. Kansas (1915) 236 U. S. 1, 32, 59 L. ed. 441.

"The police power is incapable of exact definition and of a precise limitation. It seems to be a power to which are referred all governmental acts which are incapable of arrangement under any other distinct head, and which are at the same time justifiable, as internal regulations having in view facility of intercourse between citizen and citizen, the preservation of good order, good manners and morals, and the health of the public." George, C. J., in Town of Macon v. Patty (1879) 57 Miss. 378, 407, 34 Am. Rep. 451.

"It would be presumptuous for any court to attempt to formulate an exact definition of the term 'the police power of the state.' Legal definitions do not sum themselves up in single sentences. They are, and of necessity must be, more or less general and elastic in order that the courts may apply them to the infinite variety of circumstances which may arise in the relations and affairs of mankind in civilized society." Tillinghast, J., in State v. Dalton (1900) 22 R. I. 77, 80, 46 Atl. 234, 48 L. R. A. 775, 84 Am. St. Rep. 818.

"State police in its widest sense comprehends the whole system of internal regulation by which the state seeks not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offenses against her authority, but also to establish for the intercourse of one citizen with another those rules of justice, morality and good conduct which are calculated to prevent a conflict of interests and to insure to everyone the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own, as far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of equal rights by others." Clifford, J., in Tennessee v. Davis (1880) 100 U. S. 257, 300, 25 L. ed. 648.

"The learned counsel for the railway company seem to think that the adjudications relating to the police power of the state to protect the public health, the public morals and the public safety are not applicable, in principle, to cases where the police power is exerted for the general well-being of the community apart from any question of the public health, the public morals or the public safety. * * * We hold that the police power of a state embraces regulations designed to promote the public convenience or the general prosperity, as well as regulations designed to promote the public health, the public morals or the public safety." Harlan, J., in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Drainage Comrs. (1906) 200 U. S. 561, 592, 50 L. ed. 596.

"That there is a power, sometimes called the police power, which has never been surrendered by the states, in virtue of which they may, within certain limits, control everything within their respective territories, and upon the proper exercise of which, under some circumstances, may depend the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, is conceded in all the cases. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 203. In its broadest sense, as sometimes defined, it includes all legislation and almost every function of civil government. Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 31. As thus defined, we may, not improperly, refer to that power the authority of the state to create educational and charitable institutions, and provide for the establishment, maintenance, and control of public highways, turnpike roads, canals, wharves, ferries, and telegraph lines, and the draining of swamps. Definitions of the police power must, however, be taken, subject to the condition that the state cannot, in its exercise, for any purpose whatever, encroach upon the powers of the general government, or rights granted or secured by the supreme law of the land." Harlan, J., in New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Louisiana Light &c. Mfg. Co. (1885) 115 U. S. 650, 661, 29 L. ed. 516.

"The term 'police power' is often used as a term of convenience and not of clearly ascertained legal principle. It was found to be the most convenient phrase for designating the extent of state legislation, when such legitimate legislation covered the same ground included in the exclusive power of legislation given to Congress; notably in the wide field covered by the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. As used in this connection the term has acquired a more definite meaning through the many decisions of the United States Supreme Court, but such meaning relates rather to what it has been decided to cover, than to what it may in fact cover." Hamersley, J., in In re Clark (1894) 65 Conn. 17, 40, 31 Atl. 522, 28 L. R. A. 242.

"Broadly speaking, the police power is all of the power of the state which has not been delegated to the general government and which is not restricted by the Constitution. While it is true that there are many definitions of that power and differentiations of the powers of the state, yet it is wholly immaterial what a power may be called, so long as it is known to exist. The General Assembly has all power for general legislation which is not delegated to the general government and which is not inhibited by the federal or state Constitution." Hill, C. J., in Hendricks v. Block (1906) 80 Ark. 333, 338-339, 97 S. W. 63.

"The phrase 'police power' has been sometimes used by writers upon legal subjects as if it denoted some peculiar and transcendent form of legislative authority. The word 'police' does not naturally carry any such meaning. Its use in this connection came into our law early in the nineteenth century. Russell, The Police Power of the State, 231. * * * So, as applied to the state, police laws are laws of general administration and government. Its power to enact such laws extends over all subjects within its territorial limits. Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. 539, 625. The police powers of a state, in the apt words of Chief Justice Taney, 'are nothing more or less than the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty to the extent of its dominions.' The License Cases, 5 How. 504, 583. If they are exercised by legislation which violates any right guaranteed by the national or state Constitution, they are so far forth invalid. Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 108; State v. Conlon, 65 Conn. 478." Baldwin, J., in McKeon v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. Co. (1902) 75 Conn. 343, 347, 53 Atl. 656, 61 L. R. A. 736.

"Assuming that, in the formation of our government, certain powers necessary to the administration of their internal affairs are reserved to the states, and that among these powers are those for the preservation of good order, of the health and comfort of the citizens, and their protection against pauperism and against contagious and infectious diseases, and other matters of legislation of like character, they [counsel] insist that the power here exercised falls within this class, and belongs rightfully to the states.

"This power, frequently referred to in the decisions of this court, has been, in general terms, somewhat loosely called the police power. It is not necessary for the course of this discussion to attempt to define it more accurately than it has been defined already. It is not necessary, because whatever may be the nature and extent of that power, where not otherwise restricted, no definition of it, and no urgency for its use, can authorize a state to exercise it in regard to a subject-matter which has been confided exclusively to the discretion of Congress by the Constitution.

"Nothing is gained in the argument by calling it the police power. Very many statutes, when the authority on which their enactments rest is examined, may be referred to different sources of power, and supported equally well under any of them. A statute may at the same time be an exercise of the taxing power and of the power of eminent domain. A statute punishing counterfeiting may be for the protection of the private citizen against fraud, and a measure for the protection of the currency and for the safety of the government which issues it. It must occur very often that the shading which marks the line between one class of legislation and another is very nice, and not easily distinguishable.

"But, however difficult this may be, it is clear, from the nature of our complex form of government, that, whenever the statute of a state invades the domain of legislation which belongs exclusively to the Congress of the United States, it is void, no matter under what class of powers it may fall, or how closely allied to powers conceded to belong to the states." Miller, J., in Henderson v. Mayor of New York (1875) 92 U. S. 259, 271-272, 23 L. ed. 543.

"The Fourteenth Amendment, in declaring that no state 'shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws,' undoubtedly intended not only that there should be no arbitrary deprivation of life or liberty, or arbitrary spoliation of property, but that equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights. * * * But neither the Amendment—broad and comprehensive as it is—nor any other Amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the state, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the state, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity." Field, J., in Barbier v. Connolly (1885) 113 U. S. 27, 31, 28 L. ed. 923.

"What are the police powers of a state? They are nothing more or less than the powers of government. * * * And whether a state passes a quarantine law, or a law to punish offences, or to establish courts of justice, or requiring certain instruments to be recorded, or to regulate commerce within its own limits, in every case it exercises the same power; that is to say, * * * the power to govern men and things within the limits of its dominion. It is by virtue of this power that it legislates; and its authority to make regulations of commerce is as absolute as its power to pass health laws, except in so far as it has been restricted by the Constitution of the United States." Taney, C. J., in License Cases (1847) 5 How. 504, 583, 12 L. ed. 256.

"Furthermore, the exercise of this power, embracing nearly all legislation of a local character, is not to be interfered with by the courts where it is within the scope of legislative authority and the means adopted reasonably tend to accomplish a lawful purpose. But it is equally well established that the police power, broad as it is, cannot justify the passage of a law or ordinance which runs counter to the limitations of the federal Constitution; that principle has been so frequently affirmed in this court that we need not stop to cite the cases.

"The federal Constitution and the laws passed within its authority are by the express terms of that instrument made the supreme law of the land. The Fourteenth Amendment protects life, liberty, and property from invasion by the states without due process of law." Day, J., in Buchanan v. Warley (1917) 245 U. S. 60, 74, 62 L. ed. 149.

WESTERVELT v. GREGG.

1854. New York Court of Appeals. 12 N. Y. 202.

[The proceedings below were before a surrogate to determine the alleged right of Gregg to a legacy given to Gregg's wife by a will of which Westervelt was executor, the testator having died in 1840. The opposition was based upon the New York statute of 1848 which declared the property of a wife to be her sole and separate property, destroying the common law right of the husband to reduce to his possession the wife's choses in action (including legacies). After holding that the terms of the statute prevented an interpretation that it was not intended to operate retrospectively.]

Denio, J. * * * I am of opinion that the act, in its application to this case, is a violation of the constitution of this state. Among the limitations of the powers of government contained in that instrument is the one which declares that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law." (Const., art. 1, § 6.) That the right which the respondent had to this legacy, the instant before the act of 1848 took effect, was property, in the justest sense of that term, I cannot doubt. An immediate right of action for the recovery of money, which, when recovered, is to belong to the party in whom the right of action exists, subject to be defeated only by the contingency that a person in being may die before judgment can be obtained, is a valuable pecuniary interest, which deserves protection equally with rights which are absolute and unconditional. Besides, this was an interest which the respondent might sell, and for which he might receive the consideration to his own use. This property the act, if valid, has effectually deprived him of. It declares it shall no longer belong to him, but shall be the property of his wife, as though she were a single female. The act does not fall within the meaning of due process of law. That term according to Lord Coke, means being brought in to answer, according to the "old law of the land." (2 Inst, 50; and see, also, Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140, and cases cited by Bronson, J.; 2 Kent's Com., 13.)

The provision was designed to protect the citizen against all mere acts of power, whether flowing from the legislative or executive branches of the government. It does not, of course, touch the right of the state to appropriate private property to public use upon making due compensation, which is fully recognized in another part of the constitution; but no power in the state can legally confer upon one person or class of persons the property of another person or class, without their consent, whatever motives of policy may exist in favor of such transfer.

I have intentionally forborne to rely upon the principle mentioned in some cases, of a supposed implied restriction upon legislative power, arising out of the nature of free institutions; firstly, because I suppose a judgment in favor of the respondent will stand firmly upon express constitutional provisions, but principally because, as at present advised, I am not prepared to assent to the doctrine that the courts can limit the authority of the legislature by exceptions which are not found in the constitution itself. (2 Kent's Com., 340, and cases cited in note (a); Taylor v. Porter, supra; Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet., 657.)

* * * All the judges, except Ruggles, J., who took no part in the decision, concurred.

Judgment accordingly.

WYNEHAMER v. THE PEOPLE.

THE PEOPLE v. TOYNBEE.

1856. New York Court of Appeals. 13 N. Y. 378.

[Wynehamer was indicted in the court of general sessions for the county of Erie, N. Y., for selling intoxicating liquor in violation of a New York statute, entitled "An Act for the Prevention of Intemperance, Pauperism and Crime." The statute is sufficiently stated in the opinion. At the trial there was evidence that the defendant had made several sales of liquor at his bar, to be drunk on the premises. The jury found the defendant guilty. The trial court sentenced him to pay a fine of $50. On appeal the Supreme Court affirmed, and defendant took a writ of error to the New York Court of Appeals, assigning among other alleged errors the exclusion of evidence offered to show that the liquor sold had been lawfully acquired by the defendant before the prohibitory law became operative. The case of People v. Toynbee involved another provision of the statute which authorized trials at special sessions without a jury. Toynbee had been convicted by such procedure. Portions of the opinion of Hubbard, J., dealing with Toynbee's case are omitted. The disposition of his case is shown in the reporter's summary which follows below, after Hubbard's opinion. Wynehamer's case involved only the substantive operation of the statute.]

Hubbard, J. * * * The next question to be considered relates to the prohibitory character of the law, and its vindicatory provisions as it respects existing rights of property in liquor at the time the Act took effect. This is purely a question of legislative power, under the fundamental law. It is needless to say that the courts have no concern with the wisdom or expediency of the enactment to accomplish the beneficent ends indicated by the title. The policy of this government, from its foundation, certainly vindicates the political necessity and economy of stringent laws circumscribing the sale of spirituous liquors. I entertain no doubt of the constitutional competency of the legislature to prohibit entirely the commerce, within the state, in liquor as a beverage, by laws prospective in their operation. If, in the judgment of the legislature, the public welfare required it, the future production, manufacture, or acquisition of liquor might be prohibited. The sovereign power of the state in all matters pertaining to the public good, the health, good order, and morals of the people, is omnipotent. Laws intended to promote the welfare of society are within legislative discretion, and cannot be the just subject of judicial animadversion, except when it is seen that the constitutional guarantees of private property have been invaded. The police power is, of necessity, despotic in its character, commensurate with the sovereignty of the state; and individual rights of property, beyond the express constitutional limits, must yield to its exercise. And in emergencies, it may be exercised to the destruction of property, without compensation to the owner, and even without the formality of a legal investigation. It is upon this principle that health and quarantine laws are established; that a building is blown up to arrest a conflagration in a populous town; that the public market is purged of infectious articles; that merchandise on ship-board, infested with pestilence, is cast into the deep, and public nuisances are abated. It is the public exigency which demands the summary destruction, upon the maxim that the safety of society is the paramount law. It is the application of the personal right or principle of self-preservation to the body politic. I know of no limits to the exercise of the police power vested in the legislature, except the restrictions contained in the written constitution. Under our system of government, with co-ordinate branches, each independent within its sphere, and all deriving their powers from a common source, the fundamental law, one cannot exercise a supremacy over the other, except as it finds its warrant for it in that law. The judiciary possesses no legitimate authority over acts of the legislature, aside from the constitutional grant; and even this authority is exercised in an indirect manner, when its powers are appealed to, to carry a statutory law into effect; and then only as it respects the individual rights of property or person.

It is said that this idea of the omnipotency of the legislature, aside from the express constitutional restrictions, is a fallacy. It is conceded that all power emanates from the people, and that the written constitution clothes the legislature with all the power it possesses. But the grant of power in that instrument is general, of all the legislative power of the state; what this is precisely, is not and cannot well be defined. Aside from the express limitations, it is believed to embrace all the common-law power which the legislature would have possessed had the fundamental law remained, as in England, a part of the unwritten law of the state. This is by no means an alarming proposition. The Declaration of Rights, forming the guarantee of personal liberty and property in the first article of the [New York] Constitution, when construed according to its full spirit and intent, is quite ample to protect the citizen against the unauthorized encroachments of the legislature; to protect against all sumptuary laws and laws of kindred character, which have not the public good for their object. I am opposed to the judiciary attempting to set bounds to legislative authority, or declaring a statute invalid upon any fanciful theory of higher law or first principles of natural right outside the constitution. If the courts may imply limitation, there is no bound to implication except judicial discretion, which must place the courts above the legislature and also the constitution itself. This is hostile to the theory of the government. The constitution is the only standard for the courts to determine the question of statutory validity.

There is no constitutional restriction upon the power of the legislature in the regulation of the sale or traffic in intoxicating drinks, whether affecting existing rights of property in liquor or not. As a scheme of regulation, the degree of the limitation of the sale or traffic is a matter of legislative discretion. The fault of the present law is, that it does not profess to be a scheme of regulation. There is no attempted discrimination between liquor owned at the time the law took effect and that acquired afterwards. I have reflected with much attention to see whether the courts could not make the discrimination, for instance, as a question of fact, to be ascertained in a given case, but I have encountered the insurmountable difficulty, that the legislature plainly intended that there should be no such distinction. No defence on a trial could be admitted on such ground, for the reason that it would be against the manifest policy of the Act. It is the intent of the statute alone which the courts are authorized to execute.

The prohibitory feature of the law must, therefore, be regarded as extending to all liquor in the state at the time the Act took effect. In this aspect I will, in a few words, give my views of its unconstitutionality as it respects vested rights of property in liquor, under the organic law, which forbids the citizen being deprived of his property without due process of law. That liquor is recognized by the law as property, that the constitution knows no distinction in its guarantees of the rights of property of all kinds, that the constitutionality of the law is to be tested the same as though it related to some other and perhaps better species of property, is not questioned. The constitution surrounds liquor, as property, with the same inviolability as any other species of property. There can be no room, I think, for difference of opinion as to the meaning of the phrase, "due process of law," as used in the constitution. It means an ordinary judicial proceeding. In a criminal case, an arraignment, formal complaint, confronting of witnesses, a trial, and regular conviction and judgment. When a forfeiture of property is made a part of the punishment, as in this case, the judgment embracing it would, in its effect, deprive the offender of his property in the constitutional method. I think it competent for the legislature to declare a forfeiture of liquor, which an offender may have in possession, as a mode of punishment; and if the law in question was in other respects constitutional, I should uphold the judgment of forfeiture in this case as entirely proper. But the portion of the law which authorizes the seizure and destruction of liquor, where the prosecution or conviction of the owner is not contemplated, I should not hesitate to pronounce void, as property is thus destroyed or the citizen deprived of it without process of law. It is not pretended, nor can it be, that property which is not per se a nuisance can be annihilated by force of a statute alone, or by proceeding in rem for the punishment of a personal offence. Liquor is not a nuisance per se, nor can it be made so by a simple legislative declaration. It does not stand in the category of common nuisances which of themselves endanger the welfare or safety of society. It is its use and abuse as a beverage which gives it its offensive character. Otherwise it is entirely inoffensive. In my judgment, therefore, it cannot be confiscated to prevent its misuse, except through a prosecution against the owner in personam.

But it is said that this law does not assume to deprive any one of his property in liquor; that the owner is allowed to retain the unmolested custody and personal use of it, according to his pleasure. It is true that the owner may not be molested in this enjoyment, provided he keeps it in his dwelling-house, if fortunate enough to possess a domicil. I apprehend that by a fair construction of the law he is forbidden, under a severe penalty, from keeping it elsewhere, except for mechanical and other specified uses, although innocent of any intent to sell. I have examined the 1st section of the law with care, to see if it could not be construed in such manner as to make the keeping in any place except a dwelling-house, criminal only when accompanied with an intent to sell. But the section cannot be so construed. The language is too clear to admit of a doubt as to the intention of the legislature. The keeping or deposit in any place, except in a dwelling-house, or place where some trade or business is carried on requiring its use, is prohibited, and by the 4th section of the Act such keeping or deposit is a crime. This, certainly, is a most extraordinary provision, which must have the effect to render a person a criminal who was so unfortunate as to have a quantity of liquor on hand in a forbidden place at the time the law took effect, although he had no intent to violate the law by selling. A person thus circumstanced would have but one of two alternatives to avoid criminality, either just before the law took effect to remove the liquor to a dwelling-house, or to a shop for mechanical and other prescribed uses, or destroy it with his own hand. I can scarcely credit that the legislature designed the law to have this effect; but no other construction can be put upon the language of the 1st section of the law, and we are bound to suppose, judicially, that the legislature intended what their words import.

The law does not even countenance the exportation of the liquor after it took effect. The plain design of the law seems to have been to cut off the liquor itself, to insure its destruction, by circumscribing the keeping of it, and authorizing its seizure, if kept in a forbidden place, or with a criminal intent to sell. The entire right of sale, within the state at least, is prohibited, and in this, in my judgment, consists the error of the law as it respects liquor owned when the law went into operation. If there had been any right of sale within the state preserved, for instance, to a licensed vendor, although of minor importance, it would have been sufficient, perhaps, to have impressed the law with a character of regulation, and saved its validity.

But the abolition of all right of sale in the state is equivalent to and is a substantial deprivation of the owner of his property. The right of sale is of the very essence of property in any article of merchandise; it is its chief characteristic; take away its vendible quality and the article is practically destroyed. As applied to merchandise of any description, this effect can be judicially seen. Even if the law allowed exportation, that would be of such minor importance as not to save the law from the charge of effectually depriving the owner of his property in the liquor. It is but of trifling value after the entire domestic market is closed against it.

I am unable, therefore, to avoid the conclusion that the prohibition in the 1st section of the law is invalid, inasmuch as it makes no discrimination, nor allows the courts to make any, but extends to all liquor, irrespective of the time of its acquisition; and that, by closing the domestic or state market, it in effect substantially deprives the owner of liquor, acquired before the law took effect, of his vested right of property therein, without due process of law. * * *

I am of the opinion, therefore, that the judgment of the Supreme Court ought to be affirmed. * * *

[Opinions by COMSTOCK, A. S. JOHNSON, SELDEN, MITCHELL, T. A. JOHNSON, JJ., and by DENIO, C. J., are omitted. The reporter added:]

On deciding these cases, the court passed upon and affirmed the following propositions:

1. That the prohibitory Act, in its operation upon property in intoxicating liquors existing in the hands of any person within this State when the Act took effect, is a violation of the provision in the Constitution of this State which declares that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." That the various provisions, prohibitions, and penalties contained in the Act do substantially destroy the property in such liquors in violation of the terms and spirit of the constitutional provision.

2. That inasmuch as the Act does not discriminate between such liquors existing when it took effect as a law, and such as might thereafter be acquired by importation or manufacture, and does not countenance or warrant any defence based upon the distinction referred to, it cannot be sustained in respect to any such liquor, whether existing at the time the Act took effect or acquired subsequently; although all the judges were of opinion that it would be competent for the legislature to pass such an Act as the one under consideration (except as to some of the forms of proceeding to enforce it), provided such Act should be plainly and distinctly prospective as to the property on which it should operate.

3. That the criminal proceeding in a court of special sessions authorized by the said Act is unconstitutional and void because the accused is thereby deprived of the right of trial by jury, guaranteed by the Constitution.

DENIO, C. J., A. S. JOHNSON, COMSTOCK, SELDEN, and HUBBARD, JS., concurred in the foregoing propositions.

Mitchell, J., dissented from the first and second, and concurred in the third.

T. A. Johnson and Wright, Js., dissented from all of them.

All the judges, except T. A. Johnson, Wright, and Mitchell, were in favor of reversing the judgment of the Supreme Court, and of the court of general sessions in the case of Wynehamer.

All the judges, except T. A. Johnson and Wright, were in favor of affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court, which reversed that of the court of special sessions in the case of Toynbee.

Judgments accordingly.

DRED SCOTT v. SANDFORD.

1857. Supreme Court of the United States. 19 How. 393.

[This case was brought up by writ of error from the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Missouri to review a judgment by that court for the defendant in an action brought to question the asserted right of the defendant to hold Scott, his wife and two children as slaves in Missouri.]

Taney, C. J.: * * * The plaintiff was a negro slave, belonging to Dr. Emerson, who was a surgeon in the army of the United States. In the year 1834, he took the plaintiff from the State of Missouri to the military post at Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, and held him there as a slave until the month of April or May, 1836. At the time last mentioned, said Dr. Emerson removed the plaintiff from said military post at Rock Island to the military post at Fort Snelling, situate on the west bank of the Mississippi river, in the Territory known as Upper Louisiana, acquired by the United States of France, and situate north of the latitude of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north, and north of the State of Missouri. Said Dr. Emerson held the plaintiff in slavery at said Fort Snelling, from said last-mentioned date until the year 1838.
